

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. #### NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

DAVID KORN, Appt.,

GEORGINE CAMPBELL, Respnt.

Covenant — restriction — enforcement — remote grantees.

A remote grantee of a portion of a tract of land cannot enforce against a remote grantee of another portion a restrictive covenant in a grant of the entire tract before its subdivision, as to the character of buildings to be placed on the property, although the original grantor parted with his entire interest in all property in the neighborhood, where deeds and mortgages were given by a subsequent grantee in subdividing the tract, and foreclosure sales made on the various subdivisions, without any reference to such covenant.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of a Special Term, Part IV., for New York County, in his favor in an action brought to enforce a covenant as to the use of real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Louis Marshall, Albert T. Scharps, and James Frank, for appellant:

A court of chancery will enforce a restrictive covenant imposed by the grantor of land upon property conveyed by him, which inures to the benefit of, and is obligatory upon all subsequent grantees having notice, whether the covenant runs with the land, or is cognizable at law, or not, as, once created, it is indestructible otherwise than by the act of all parties, directly or indirectly interested in its enforcement.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff and the defendant are the respective owners of lands which adjoin each other, the titles to which were derived from a common source. The defendant's lot is on the northwest corner of Madison avenue and Seventy-Third street, in the borough of Manhattan, city of New York, having a frontage of 18 feet on the street, and a length of 80 feet on the avenue. The plaintiff's lot is on the avenue immediately 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

north of the defendant's, and has a frontage of 22 feet and 2 inches, with a depth of 92 feet. Each of these lots has upon it the typical dwelling house characteristic of that section of the city. This action is brought to restrain the defendant from making alterations in the building upon his lot, which are designed to render it convenient and suitable for certain business purposes, and the plaintiff predicates his right to this relief upon a restrictive covenant, which, among other things, recites that the premises out of which the respective lots of the plaintiff and the defendant have been carved shall "be used for the erection of first-class private residences only." The question is whether that covenant can be enforced by the plaintiff against the defendant. At special term it was held that it could. At the appellate division a contrary decision was reached, although by a divided court, and the case is now before this court upon plaintiff's appeal.

Since everything depends upon the history of the titles and the covenant referred to, a short statement of the salient facts is necessary to a proper understanding of the precise question involved. On the 10th day of August, 1870, James Lenox conveyed to William Lalor a plot of land which had a frontage of 102 feet and 2 inches on the west side of Madison avenue, and a frontage of 195 feet on the north side of Seventy-Third street. The deed by which this conveyance was made contained the covenant above referred to. This covenant, after prohibiting upon these premises many noxious and objectionable trades, occupations, and structures, provided that the grantee "will use or suffer the said premises to be used for the erection of first-class private residences only." So far as the record discloses, Lenox owned no other lands in that immediate neighborhood, and the lots now owned by the parties to this action are embraced in the tract thus conveyed. On the 12th day of August, 1870, Lalor and wife conveyed to James H. Coleman an undivided one-third interest in the tract of land above described, but the deed contained no reference to the covenant set forth in the deed from Lenox to Lalor. On July 1, 1871, Lalor and Coleman, with their respective wives, conveyed the whole tract to James E. Coburn by a full-covenant warranty deed, which referred to the covenant in the deed from Lenox to Lalor as follows: "Subject to the conditions, covenants, and restrictions against nuisances and buildings contained in deed of James Lenox of the above-described premises." Coincident with the delivery of this deed to Coburn, he executed to the North American Life In-insurance Company eleven separate mortgages, one upon each of eleven lots into which he had divided the whole tract thus derived from Lalor and Coleman. Neither of these mortgages contained any reference to the restrictive covenant in the deed from Lenox. Upon these eleven lots Coburn erected private dwelling houses, which were disposed of to various persons by deeds in which there was no mention of that covenant. In 1879 the mortgages given by Coburn to the insurance company were foreclosed. The premises now owned by the plaintiff then belonged to Mary H. Moore, and title to the lot now owned by the defendant was then in Artemas H. Holmes; both of these grantees holding under deeds subsequent in date to the mortgage above referred to, and both having derived their titles through Coburn by deeds which did not refer to the restrictive covenant in the original deed from Lenox. Thus stood the titles to the premises now owned by the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively, when the mortgages to the insurance company were foreclosed, in 1879, and the premises were sold under referee's deeds which embodied no part of the restrictive covenant and made no reference thereto. The plaintiff's lot was bid in by Gustav Gottheil, and the defendant's lot by Artemas H. Holmes, who was then the owner of the equity of redemption. From that time down to the conveyance by the plaintiff, the title to his lot passed by mesne conveyances in the form of full-covenant warranty deeds, none of which referred to the restrictive covenant in the deed from Lenox; and the title to the defendant's lot passed by similar conveyances, with a single exception in 1897, when Jacob B. Tallman became the owner thereof under a deed "subject to the covenant against nuisances and as to buildings, contained in a certain deed made by James Lenox to William Lalor, dated the 10th day of August, 1870, and recorded in the office of the register aforesaid, in Liber 1154 of conveyances, page 253, August 10, 1870."

There has been much judicial writing upon the subject of restrictive covenants, and, as may be anticipated from the very nature of the topic, the cases abound in fine and subtle distinctions, which have been invented either to overcome the rigor of the common law in courts of equitable cognizance, or to adapt the settled forms of relief to fit special cases. There are many decisions upon this branch of the law which appear to be in hopeless conflict with each other, but which are easily reconcilable when their peculiar circumstances are understood. We shall make no attempt to analyze the decisions, for we think the case is plainly out of L.R.A. (N.S.)

side of any rule under which restrictive covenants can be enforced. For the particular purposes of this case, such covenants may be broadly divided into three classes. In the first class may be placed those which are entered into with the design to carry out a general scheme for the improvement or development of real property. This class embraces all the various plans, generally denominated in the English cases as "building schemes," under which an owner of a large plot or tract of land divides it into building lots to be sold to different purchasers for separate occupancy, by deeds which contain uniform covenants restricting the use which the several grantees may make of their premises. In such cases the covenant is enforceable by any grantee as against any other, upon the theory that there is a mutuality of covenant and consideration, which binds each, and gives to each the appropriate remedy. Such covenants are entered into by the grantees for their mutual protection and benefit, and the consideration therefor lies in the fact that the diminution in the value of a lot burdened with restrictions is partly or wholly offset by the enhancement in its value due to similar restrictions upon all the other lots in the same tract. Illustrations of this class may be found in De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 340, 24 Atl. 388; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632; Nottingham Patent Brick & Tile Co. v. Butler, L. R. 15 Q. B. Div. 261, and Barrow v. Richard, 8 Paige, 351, 35 Am. Dec. 713. The second class embraces those cases in which the grantor exacts the covenant from his grantee, presumptively or actually for the benefit and protection of contiguous or neighboring lands which the former retains. In such cases the grantees, if there are more than one, cannot enforce the covenant as against each other, although the grantor and his assigns of the property benefited may enforce it against either or all of the grantees of the property burdened with the covenant. In this class are the leading cases of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phill. Ch. 774, 1 Hall & Tw. 105, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 83, 13 Jur. 80, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 254; and Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, Seymour v. McDonald, 4 Sandf. Ch. 502, and Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Brennan, 148 N. Y. 661, 43 N. E. 173. Then there is a third class, where there are mutual covenants between owners of adjoining lands, in which the restrictions placed upon each produce a corresponding benefit to the other, and in such a case, of course, either party or his assigns may invoke equitable aid to restrain a violation

We think the case at bar does not fall within either of the three classes referred to. Obviously, it is not in the first class, relating to a division of land into lots conveyed by separate deeds containing covenants entered into by each of the grantees. Lenox conveyed the whole plot to Lalor. That conveyance, it is true, was made subject to the restrictive covenant; but there is no evidence that the land was to be divided, and Lalor was under no obligation to divide it. The covenant was purely for the benefit of Lenox, or his remaining lands, if he had any. In no aspect of the case could the covenant be said to have benefited any part of the land burdened by it. That land all belonged to Lalor. It was all in one piece, and it was all covered by the same restrictions. The same conditions prevailed when Lalor conveyed an undivided one-third interest in the land to Coleman. The latter took with notice of the covenant in the deed from Lenox to Lalor, and, assuming that it was not merely a dry personal covenant, Lenox could have enforced it against Coleman as well as against Lalor. When Lalor and Coleman conveyed to Coburn, subject to the covenant in the deed from Lenox to Lalor, the land was still in a single piece, and Coburn, the absolute owner of it, was free to do with it as he pleased, except as against Lenox, the original covenantee, or those who stood in his shoes. At this juncture in the history of the title there was for the first time a division of the property. Eleven separate lots were mortgaged by Coburn to the insurance company, but none of the mortgages embodied any part of the restrictive covenant or contained any reference thereto. When the separate lots were thereafter conveyed to different grantees, there was no mention of the covenant, and when the mortgages were subsequently foreclosed the referee's deeds were qualified by no restrictions. Upon these facts we cannot assent to the contention of the learned counsel for the plaintiff that Lenox was the common grantor of the parties to this action, that the covenant was exacted by Lenox because the property was to be divided into lots, and that it was taken not for his own benefit, but to protect those who might later become the separate owners of parts of the tract. By the inevitable logic of the transaction, Coburn became the common grantor of the parties. Having the title to the whole of the land, he had the right to do with it as he pleased, except as against Lenox and his assigns. Coburn decided to divide the property and to sell it without restrictions, and he carried his resolution into effect. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant have any different title than that which they derived through the unrestricted deeds from Coburn. The original covenant, which may be good in favor of Lenox or his assigns as against any grantee of Coburn in this tract, is not enforceable as between such grantees.

It is equally clear that the plaintiff has not brought his case within the second class mentioned. It might be within that class if the plaintiff were in court representing Lenox. In that event the question would arise whether the covenant was one purely personal to Lenox, and, if so, whether it would be enforceable at all, or whether it was made for the benefit of land retained by Lenox when he sold to Lalor, but afterward conveyed to the plaintiff. But that is not the situation. The plaintiff represents Coburn, the covenantor. He stands for the land burdened, and not for any land benefited, by the covenant; and in that regard the plaintiff and the defendant are upon precisely the same footing with reference to the original covenant. Neither is under any covenant obligation to the other, although both may possibly be bound to the original covenantee. In other words, the case can only be brought into the second class by a plaintiff who acquired the title of Lenox to lands for the benefit of which the covenant was made.

It is plain, also, that the case is not within the third class referred to. That class includes only those cases in which the owners of adjoining or contiguous lands enter into mutual covenants containing restrictions by which each is burdened for the benefit of the other. It is not even claimed that the plaintiff comes within this rule, and we have referred to it solely for the purpose of demonstrating that the plaintiff is not within either of the three general rules under which such covenants may be enforced. We do not mean to intimate that special circumstances may not exist in which a case not within the three classes above referred to may present considerations which would justify the enforcement of such a covenant in a court of equity. It is enough to say that no such circumstances appear in the case at bar. We have used the foregoing classification as a brief and convenient method of showing that all the authorities relied upon by the plaintiff fall within one or the other of these divisions, and that he is not within either of them. We might have stopped, indeed, with the discussion of the first class; for the plaintiff's whole position rests upon the assertion that when Lenox took the covenant from Lalor, it was contemplated that the property should be divided into lots, and, as it does not appear that Lenox retained any lands to be benefited by the covenant, it must have been made for the mutual benefit of subsequent owners.

We have shown why this position is not tenable upon the facts presented by the record, and we think the order of the Appellate Division should be affirmed, with costs.

JOHN H. BERRYMAN, Appt.,

v.

HOTEL SAVOY COMPANY, Resp't.

Covenant — restriction on use of lot — enforcement by adjoining owner.

1. A covenant in a deed of a parcel of a tract being divided into city lots, which is stated to run with the land, and requires the covenantor to construct a specified building on the property which shall be a certain distance from street and side lines, cannot be enforced by a purchaser of an adjoining lot, whose deed forbids the placing of a building on the lot within the same distance from the street specified in the former deed, on the theory that the obligations are reciprocal.

Same — benefit of entire tract — enforcement.

2. A finding that covenants in a deed of a parcel of a tract of city property, requiring the erection of a building of a certain character placed in a certain way upon the property, were for the benefit of the entire tract, does not require its enforcement at the suit of an adjoining owner, where it is also found that there was no intention to create an easement in favor of any land whatever.

Same — personal — running with land.

3. A covenant imposing a burden on real estate for the benefit of the grantor personally does not follow the land into the possession of an assignee.

Same — location of building.

4. A covenant in a deed of a parcel of a tract of city property, that the grantee shall place a certain described building on the property, having certain relations to the side lines of the lot, is personal to the grantor, and does not run with the remainder of the tract, although the deed states that the covenant runs with the land "herein conveyed."

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County and from an order denying his motion for a new trial in an action brought to enjoin defendant from violating a certain building restriction contained in a deed of a parcel of a tract of city property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cryer & Tuttle, for appellant:

The owner of any part of the land intended to be benefited by a restrictive covenant may enforce the covenant in so far as may be necessary to protect his property.

Hills v. Miller, 3 Paige, 254, 24 Am. Dec. 218; Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190; Muzzarelli v. Hulshizer, 163 Pa. 643, 30 Atl. 291; Hyman v. Tash, — N. J. Eq. —, 71 Atl. 732; Ivarson v. Mulvey, 179 Mass. 141, 60 N. E. 477.

The evidence does not justify the finding that the covenant in the Ross deed was not intended for the benefit of the plaintiff's lot.

The equitable doctrine according to which courts of equity will enforce building restrictions, though they be not true covenants running with the land, obtains in this state.

Mr. Frank G. Finlayson, for respondent:

Covenants in the nature of building restrictions are strictly construed in favor of the covenantor and owner of the land.

Clark v. Jammes, 87 Hun, 215, 33 N. Y. Supp. 1020; Hubbell v. Warren, 8 Allen, 173.

A covenant which is not for the direct benefit of the property granted is not, in this state, a covenant running with the land.

3. A covenant imposing a burden on real estate for the benefit of the grantor personally does not follow the land into the possession of an assignee.

Same — location of building.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County and from an order denying his motion for a new trial in an action brought to enjoin defendant from violating a certain building restriction contained in a deed of a parcel of a tract of city property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cryer & Tuttle, for appellant:

The owner of any part of the land intended to be benefited by a restrictive covenant may enforce the covenant in so far as may be necessary to protect his property.

Hills v. Miller, 3 Paige, 254, 24 Am. Dec. 218; Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190; Muzzarelli v. Hulshizer, 163 Pa. 643, 30 Atl. 291; Hyman v. Tash, — N. J. Eq. —, 71 Atl. 732; Iverson v. Mulvey, 179 Mass. 141, 60 N. E. 477.

The evidence does not justify the finding that the covenant in the Ross deed was not intended for the benefit of the plaintiff's lot.

The equitable doctrine according to which courts of equity will enforce building restrictions, though they be not true covenants running with the land, obtains in this state.

Mr. Frank G. Finlayson, for respondent:

Covenants in the nature of building restrictions are strictly construed in favor of the covenantor and owner of the land.

Clark v. Jammes, 87 Hun, 215, 33 N. Y. Supp. 1020; Hubbell v. Warren, 8 Allen, 173.

A covenant which is not for the direct benefit of the property granted is not, in this state, a covenant running with the land.

A covenant relating to something not in esse does not run with the land, unless the assigns are mentioned; and then only as to such assigns as are mentioned.

Melvin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the defendant corporation from violating a certain building restriction contained in a deed from the common grantors of the predecessors in interest of both parties. Judgment was given in favor of defendant, and we are called upon to consider appeals from said judgment and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

There is very little, if any, material difference between the parties respecting the facts of the case; the only serious subject of controversy being the proper interpretation of the building restriction contained in the original deed, and the effect of a subsequent quitclaim deed, whereby the original grantors sought to release the present defendant from any binding force of such restriction. In July, 1901, Abbott Kinney and Matilda Dudley were the owners of the Bay View tract in Santa Monica. Three lots and part of a fourth (all adjoining and forming one parcel) were sold to Abner L. Ross, defendant's predecessor in title. The deed of conveyance from Kinney and Dudley, parties of the first part, to Ross, contained, in addition to the usual covenants in a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, the following: "It is provided and covenanted with a covenant running with the land herein conveyed, that a building and improvements shall be erected upon these premises to be maintained as a first-class hotel, to cost not less than five thousand ($5,000) dollars, and the main part thereof shall be located not less than seven (7) feet from the front line, and eight (8) feet from the N. E. side line, and twelve (12) feet from the S. W. side line of said lot, which spaces between buildings and side lines are to be maintained as flower gardens; and all front porches shall be kept open and unobstructed on the front and ends thereof; said hotel to be erected and opened within sixty (60) days from date hereof. . . . And it is hereby covenanted that if the hotel should be removed from said grounds, or should be destroyed by fire or other elements, that parties of the second part shall rebuild said hotel, or make other improvements on said lots to the full value as heretofore agreed upon; and on failure so to do within one year, the said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, shall reconvey the said premises to the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, on payment of $1,250."

The hotel was constructed in accordance with the covenant above quoted. In September, 1902, one Junipher purchased from Kinney and Dudley's grantees of her interest in Bay View tract property adjoining that previously conveyed to Ross. The deed to Junipher contained a restriction against placing any building nearer than 7 feet to the front line of the property conveyed. By means conveyances the title to this property was vested in Mary A. Berryman, in 1903. She erected a three-story building, one wall of which was on the line between her land and that of defendant. There are many windows for the admission of light and air to this building, overlooking the 12-foot space on defendant's property. Mary A. Berryman, on May 15, 1906, conveyed this last-mentioned property to her husband, the plaintiff, who owned it at the time when it is alleged defendant threatened to build on the 12-foot strip above mentioned in such a manner as to shut off light and air from the windows on that side of the building adjacent to defendant's land. In May, 1908, Kinney and Dudley quitclaimed to the Hotel Savoy Company all of the property previously conveyed by them to Ross; such conveyance being "given especially for the purpose of quitclaiming and releasing the covenants and restrictions contained in and provided by" their deed to Ross.

After a trial of the issues, the court found that the covenant providing for the maintenance of an open space next to the land afterwards acquired by plaintiff was not inserted in the deed for the benefit of "any particular property whatsoever;" that it was not the intention of any of the parties to the deed to create an easement for the benefit of the land now owned by plaintiff; and that it "was the intention of the parties that said covenant should be for the benefit of the entire tract of land, of which the land in controversy was a part." The court also found that the title did not pass to defendant subject to the covenants contained in the deed to Ross; that such covenants created a mere personal right in favor of Kinney and Dudley; that this right was surrendered by the quitclaim deed; and that the covenants in the deed to Ross did not run with the land. It was also found that the wall of plaintiff's building encroached slightly on defendant's land.

Appellant contends that the deed to Ross and that to Juniper, each containing a restriction against building nearer the front line of the property than 7 feet, creates reciprocal obligations enforceable in equity, either as covenants that run with the land, or as personal covenants with which a court of chancery will compel compliance by persons taking the respective parcels with due notice of the mutual agreements. We cannot accept this view of the law.

As was said in Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 42, 68 Pac. 310: "That there are personal covenants enforceable in equity against the grantee of the covenant is conceded; but that proposition is far from being applicable in all cases, for, if it were, it would result that all purely personal covenants in any manner relating to land would have the same effect as those which do run with the land." The covenant in the deed to Ross is affirmative. By it the covenantor agrees, in the future, to erect a building at a certain cost and in a certain manner. On the other hand, the deed to Juniper contains a negative covenant, a typical building restriction whereby the covenantor agrees to place no building nearer the front line of his property than 7 feet. There is no mention of adjoining property in the deed to Ross. Indeed, there is nothing in that deed to show that Kinney and Dudley, the grantors of Ross, had any interest in any property other than that described in the said deed. In other words, no dominant tenement is described to which the restriction in the deed to Ross might make his land a servient tenement.

Appellant insists that judgment should have been entered upon the findings, because the court found that the parties intended the covenant in question to be "for the benefit of the entire tract of land of which the land in controversy was a part." Since the whole includes a part, we are asked to interpret this finding as giving to the plaintiff the right to enforce the covenant made for the benefit of his land which was included in the original Bay View tract. The finding upon this matter, however, must be read in its entirety. That part of it which declares that Ross and his grantors intended the covenant to operate for the benefit of the whole tract of land immediately follows a finding that the parties did not intend to create an easement for the benefit of the land subsequently acquired by Berryman, "or of any land whatever." Read as a whole, the finding is neither ambiguous nor in opposition to respondent's theory of the case.

A covenant not running with the land may be for the benefit of property owned by the persons who may enforce it, but that fact does not take it out of the category of personal covenants and make it an easement. Examining the words of the covenant itself, we cannot see that it creates an easement running with plaintiff's land.

It purports to be a covenant running with the "land conveyed," and there is nothing in the deed itself to show that the grantors owned another foot of land in that vicinity. Defendant, therefore, as a subsequent purchaser of the land, could not be charged with knowledge, derived from the record, that Kinney and Dudley owned other property to be benefited, and the evidence adduced at the trial showed no such knowledge. He had the right to read the covenant in the deed to Ross, imposing as it did a burden on his property, as one creating no servitude that would pass with the land. To that covenant the language of this court in Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, supra, is entirely applicable: "It was not made for the benefit of the lot conveyed, but purported to impose a burden thereon by restricting its use; and while a benefit will pass with the land to which it is incident, a burden will adhere exclusively to the original covenantor, unless a privity of estate or tenure subsist or be created between the covenantor and covenantee at the time when the covenant is made. Webb v. Russell, 3 T. R. 393, 402, 1 Revised Rep. 725; Hurd v. Curtis, 19 Pick. 459; Bally v. Wells, 3 Wils. 25, 29.

"Here there was no privity of estate between the parties, for by the same instrument which contained the covenant, the fee was conveyed to the covenantor. Under the feudal system the transfer of every estate created privity of tenure between the parties, and hence both the burden and the benefit of all covenants made by either bound and profited the assignee of either as an incident to the land. 'But when the statute of quia emptores abolished subinfeudation, this privity no longer existed in cases where a fee was transferred, and no reversion was left in the donor, and it became a rule that covenants which imposed any charge, burden, or obligation upon the land were held not to be incident to it, and therefore incapable of passing with it to an assignee.

. . . But on the other hand, if the covenant were one intended to benefit the land, it was considered to be incident to and run with the land, and therefore whoever might become the owner of the land would also become entitled to the benefit of the covenant.' Rawle, Covenants for Title, p. 314. So our Civil Code (§ 1462) provides: 'Every covenant contained in a grant of an estate in real property, which is made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it then in existence, runs with the land;' and § 1461 of the Civil Code provides that 'the only covenants which run with the land are those specified in this title, and those which are incidental thereto.'"

Appellant says that the judgment enables Kinney and Dudley to profit by their own wrong; that, after selling their property at high prices because of the improvements on the lots now owned by respondent, they quitclaim for a consideration to the hotel company that restriction upon which appellant had depended as insuring the free admission of light and air to one side of his building. But they are not parties to this action, nor are they seeking equitable relief. Respondent, in purchasing the land in question, had a right to depend upon the title as conveyed to his predecessors and to him. In the deed to Ross he found a provision which possessed all of the characteristics of a personal covenant. The deed provided that, in the event of the destruction of the hotel by fire, it must be rebuilt, or improvements on the land must be made "to the full value as heretofore agreed upon," or otherwise the vendors or their assigns might repurchase at a stipulated price. There was no provision that the building restriction should apply to such new structure or improvements. True, as appellant says, this contingency never arose, but nevertheless the provision with reference to rebuilding in case of fire is very illuminating. It indicates that the parties did not intend the building restriction theretofore expressed in the deed to be perpetual and to pass as an easement, for, if such had been their intention, there would have been some effort to require the reconstruction of the building, in case of fire, upon the same lines and for the same uses as the original structure.

The intention of the parties should be "determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reserve creating the easement." Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 549. As was said in Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 341, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 695: "It seems to us that in all these cases it is better to get 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) at the intention of the grantor from the language of the deed, interpreted in the light of the attending circumstances, than to conjecture the intent from the circumstances, and then to make the language of the deed bend to that."

Authority is not lacking to support the interpretation given by the trial court to the deed which was the basis of this action. In Badger v. Boardman, 16 Gray, 559, the facts were as follows: One Downing, the owner of a tract of land, conveyed to the defendant a certain lot, "subject to the following restriction: that no outbuildings or shed shall ever be erected westerly of the main building of a greater height than those now standing thereon." Downing subsequently conveyed the adjoining lot to another person, and plaintiff, through various mesne conveyances, acquired title to it. The bill whereby the plaintiff sought to enforce the restriction in the deed was dismissed, and, in upholding this course, the supreme court of Massachusetts said: "The infirmity of the plaintiff's case is that there is nothing from which the court can infer that the restriction in the deed from Downing to Boardman was inserted for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. If it appeared that the parties to that conveyance intended to create or reserve a right in the nature of a servitude or easement in the estate granted, which should be attached to, and be deemed an appurtenance of, the whole of the remaining parcel belonging to the grantor, of which the plaintiff's land forms a part, then it is clear, on the principles declared in the recent decision of Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, that the plaintiff would be entitled to insist on its enjoyment, and to enforce his rights by a remedy in equity. But there is an entire absence of any language in the deeds under which the parties claim, from which it can be fairly inferred that the restriction in the deed to the defendant against erecting his building above a certain height was intended to inure to the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. The restriction is in the most general terms, and no words are used which indicate the object of the grantor in inserting it in the deed. Nor is there any language in the deeds under which the plaintiff claims title, which refers specifically to this restriction, or from which any intent is shown to annex the benefit of this particular restriction to the plaintiff's estate. Generally, when such a right or privilege is reserved, the purpose intended to be accomplished by it is stated in the conveyance, or can be gathered from a plan referred to therein, or from the situation of the property with reference to other land of the grantor. All parties then take with notice of the right reserved and the burden or easement imposed. But the conveyances in the present case contain no such clause, nor is there anything in the terms of the grant, or in the circumstances surrounding the parties when it was made, to lead to an inference in favor of the claim set up by the plaintiff. For aught that appears, it might have been intended by the parties for the benefit of the grantor only so long as he remained the owner of any of the land of which that conveyed to the plaintiff originally formed a part. However this may be, it is certain that the defendant took his grant without any notice, either express or constructive, that this restriction was intended for the benefit of the plaintiff's estate. This is the material distinction between the case at bar and that of Whitney v. Union R. Co. above cited. And it is vital to the rights of the parties, because, as the case stands, the plaintiff is not entitled to avail himself of the equitable principle that the defendant has taken his estate with notice of a stipulation for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff, which in equity, by accepting the grant, the defendant would be bound to observe. We are therefore of opinion that the clause in the deed to the defendant, creating the restriction on the enjoyment of his estate, must be construed as a personal covenant merely with the original grantor, which the plaintiff cannot ask to have enforced in this suit."

Jewell v. Lee, 14 Allen, 145, 92 Am. Dec. 744, has many features resembling the case at bar. One Bates, who was the owner of land lying on both sides of Orient street, Swampscott, conveyed a portion on the southerly side, bordering upon the ocean, "upon condition that the granted premises shall be used for no other purpose or purposes than those for which they are now used, namely, for bathing and boating upon the beach, excepting only that low bathing houses may be built thereon; it being understood and agreed that the grantee, his heirs or assigns, may ornament the granted premises in such manner as shall not be inconsistent with the foregoing condition." Subsequently, Stephen Wardwell released his interest to Eben, and the latter conveyed the westerly part thereof to plaintiff, subject to the condition expressed in the deed from Bates. In the following year Wardwell conveyed to Gray the lot adjoining plaintiff's property on the east, subject also to the aforementioned condition, and Gray quitclaimed to defendant. The property on the north side of Orient street was also conveyed by Bates to the Wardwells, and through mesne conveyances Jewell and Lee obtained title to lots immediately opposite their respective holdings on the south side of the street. Defendant, with full knowledge of the restrictions in the deed from Bates to Wardwell, prepared, in violation thereof, to move a house onto his lot. Plaintiff sued to enjoin him from so doing. After the suit was instituted, defendant procured, and caused to be recorded, instruments releasing all the owners of land on the south side of the street from the condition in the deed to the Wardwells. Plaintiff's bill was dismissed, the court saying, among other things: "So far as we are able to see, there is nothing to indicate that the original grantor of the premises, in annexing the condition, had any intent to regulate or control the possession or enjoyment of the premises for the benefit of subsequent owners or grantees of the estate, or any part of it; but that it was imposed by him solely for his own private and personal benefit, as the owner of other lots in the vicinity, in which the present plaintiff has no interest whatever."

Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381, was a case in which the owner of a tract of land subdivided it into lots for sale. Two adjoining parcels were sold subject, for the term of fifteen years, to certain restrictions, one of which was that no building should be erected within 20 feet of the street. Plaintiff and defendant were subsequent grantees, and the former sought to enjoin the latter from building within 20 feet of the street. In discussing the bill the court used the following language: "It is not claimed that in regard to any of the lots there was any written covenant by the grantor, and it does not appear that there was any express stipulation or direct assurance on his part that any person who should purchase a lot on the north side of that street should have the benefit of a restriction binding all the other purchasers to leave an open space between their dwelling houses and the street. The only ground upon which the plaintiff can rest her claim that the restriction in question was intended to operate for the benefit of all the purchasers, and to establish a general plan of building by which each one would acquire a right in the nature of an easement in the land purchased by the others, is to be found in the fact that in his transactions with two separate and independent purchasers, the grantor conveyed a portion of the land in each case, subject to the terms and conditions set forth in the bill of complaint. . . . It is undoubtedly true, and has often been decided, that where a tract of land is subdivided into lots, and those lots are conveyed to separate purchasers subject to conditions that are of a nature to operate as inducements to the purchase, and to give to each purchaser the benefit of a general plan of building or occupation, so that each shall have attached to his own lot a right in the nature of an easement or incorporeal hereditament in the lots of the others, a right is thereby acquired by each grantee, which he may enforce against any other grantee. Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632; Linzee v. Mixer, 101 Mass. 512; Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phill. Ch. 774, 1 Hall & Tw. 105, 18 L. J. Ch. N. S. 83, 13 Jur. 89, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 254. But in the case at bar there is nothing from which the court can infer that the restriction contained in the deed from Heath to the defendant was intended for the benefit of the estate now owned by the plaintiff. No such purpose can be gathered from the plan, or from the situation of the property with reference to other land of the grantor. It purports to be a condition imposed by the grantor, and the deed points out the mode in which he, his heirs, or devisees may enforce it. Neither of the deeds under which these parties respectively claim purports to give the grantee any such right against any other grantee. For aught that appears, the condition may have been intended for the benefit of the grantor or his family, as long as they continued to own the dwelling house. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff, if she insists upon giving to that condition any wider application, and this burden we do not find that she has sustained."

Of a similar restriction the same court said in Skinner v. Shepard, 130 Mass. 181: "Undoubtedly Willis Bucknam might have enforced the first restriction while he lived; but there is nothing in the deed which shows that the parties intended that the restriction as to building within 25 feet of Green street should create a servitude or easement in the granted land, which should attach to, and be an appurtenance to, any neighboring land. The mere fact which the plaintiffs offered to prove, that Willis Bucknam, at the time when he conveyed to Munroe and others, was the owner of land separated from the estate granted by the Woburn Branch Railroad, is not sufficient to show that the object of the restriction was to benefit this land. In the absence of any words in the deed to this effect, or any reference to a plan showing a general scheme of improvement, the grantees took their estate without any notice, express or constructive, that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the adjoining estate. For anything that appears, it may have been intended only for the benefit of the grantor and for his personal convenience. Jeffries v. Jeffries, 117 Mass. 184; Jewell v. Lee, 14 Allen, 145, 92 Am. Dec. 744; Badger v. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Boardman, 16 Gray, 559. We are therefore of opinion that the restriction as to building must be construed, not as a condition which the heirs of the grantor can enforce, but as a personal covenant merely with the grantor; and that, after his death, it created no encumbrance or servitude upon the estate for which the plaintiffs can maintain this action." See also Lowell Inst. for Sav. v. Lowell, 153 Mass. 530, 27 N. E. 518, which holds that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show from the terms of the grant, or from the situation and circumstances, that the grantor intended to create a servitude inuring to the land itself. Beals v. Case, 138 Mass. 138; Clapp v. Wilder, 176 Mass. 341, 50 L.R.A. 120, 57 N. E. 692; Krekeler v. Aulbach, 51 App. Div. 591, 64 N. Y. Supp. 908.

The case of Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, 92 Pac. 724, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1018, was one in which an owner of property in Colorado Springs sought to enforce a condition against the sale of intoxicating liquors, contained in an original deed to defendant's grantor. Plaintiff had secured his title by mesne conveyances from the same original source. The deed provided that no intoxicating liquor should ever be sold or disposed of at a place of public resort on the premises thereby granted, and the supreme court held that the condition was valid and enforceable as between the grantor and its grantees (citing Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 3 Colo. 82, and Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547), but that it by no means followed that any owner of a lot in Colorado Springs might enforce the clause against any other lot owner. In pointing out the distinction between a personal covenant and one inuring to the benefit of the neighboring land, the court said: "De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388, is one of the numerous authorities relied upon by appellants to sustain their right to maintain this action. The covenant in the deed in this action was: 'And the said party of the second part, for himself, his heirs and assigns, doth hereby covenant to and with the said Daniel Dodd and Francis Mackin, their heirs, executors, and administrators, that he, the said party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, will not at any time hereafter erect or permit upon any part of the said lot any hotel, drinking saloon, gaming house, slaughterhouse, furnace, manufactory, brewery, distillery, or building for the curing of fish, or for any other uses or purposes that shall depreciate the value of the neighboring property for dwelling houses.' The opinion reviews the English and American authorities upon the subject here under discussion, and sums up the conclusion of the court as follows, at page 340: 'The law deducible from these principles and the authorities applicable to this case is that where there is a general scheme or plan, adopted and made public by the owner of a tract, for the development and improvement of the property, by which it is divided into streets, avenues, and lots, and contemplating a restriction as to the uses to which buildings or lots may be put, to be secured by a covenant embodying the restriction, to be inserted in each deed to a purchaser, and it appears by writings, or by the circumstances that such covenants are intended for the benefit of all the lands, and that each purchaser is to be subject to and to have the benefit thereof, and the covenants are actually inserted in all deeds for lots sold in pursuance of the plan, one purchaser and his assigns may enforce the covenant against any other purchaser and his assigns, if he has bought with knowledge of the scheme, and the covenant has been part of the subject-matter of his purchase.' It affirmatively appears from the amended complaint that appellants were not parties to the original covenant contained in the deed under which appellee Robinson derives title to her property. In such cases it is held that an action is not maintainable (1), in which it does not appear that the covenant was entered into for the benefit of the land of which plaintiff has become the owner, and (2), in which it appears that the covenant has not entered into the consideration of plaintiff's purchase. From the very nature of the case, a covenant restricting the use of land will not be enforced against a subsequent purchaser without notice, actual or constructive, of the covenant. . . . By its terms the covenant is limited to the land 'hereby granted.' In this respect it differs widely from covenants which in express terms, or by reasonable or necessary implication, give notice that they are intended for the development or improvement of premises within a designated area, or for adjacent lots or neighboring property, as was the case in the New Jersey case, above cited, as indicated by that portion of the covenant which we have italicized."

Without further citation we may say that we think the great weight of authority is in favor of the conclusion reached by the trial court that the covenant in question was a personal one, not running with the land, and not capable of enforcement by the owner of adjoining property, who was a subsequent grantee deriving title from the grantors in the deed to Ross.

We have examined the authorities cited by appellant, and find that they are all readily distinguishable in their facts from the case at bar. We have already shown how one of these (De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co.) has been analyzed by the supreme court of Colorado, and found not applicable to a case like this. Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 546, and Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289, were cases in each of which the covenant was made in favor of the owner of adjoining property occupied as a homestead at the time the covenant was made. In each case the immediately adjacent property was the only land possessed by the grantor, while in the case at bar the original grantors owned many lots in Bay View tract and elsewhere in Santa Monica, any one of which might have been benefited in some degree by the restriction set forth in the deed. In each of the cases last cited the grantor, who was the covenantee, owned but one lot of land in the vicinity of that taken by the grantee, who was the covenantor, and in each case the covenantee's land not only adjoined that of the covenantor, but was occupied by him at the time of the execution of the deed as a homestead. Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190, is not in point, as the deed itself by its terms provided that the covenant should be for the benefit of the land retained by the grantor. The court said: "The covenant, it will be remembered, expressly declares that it shall be lawful for any person who shall become the owner of any of the land described in the ten deeds recited in the conveyance to the complainant, to maintain an action for a violation of the covenant against such person as may be the owner of complainant's land when the violation is committed. The language of the covenant makes it certain, beyond all doubt, that the parties mutually intended that the restrictions put upon the land conveyed should have the effect to confer an important benefit on the grantor's adjacent land." In Hills v. Miller, 3 Paige, 254, 24 Am. Dec. 218, the covenant was one by the grantor for the direct benefit of the land, and the plaintiff bought directly from the covenantee, the covenant itself operating as an inducement for him to make the purchase. Muzzarelli v. Hulshizer, 163 Pa. 643, 30 Atl. 291, was a case in which, from the language of the grant itself, it was evident that the common grantor intended the restrictions to apply to all of the lots granted. In Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715, and in Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632, the very language of the instruments creating the covenants showed that they were for the benefit of all of the grantor's lots, and that the restrictions might be enforced by subsequent owners. Hemsley v. Marlborough House Co. 68 N. J. Eq. 596, 61

Atl. 455, was like Clark v. Martin and Peck v. Conway, supra, a case in which the owner of a homestead granted certain property with a building restriction obviously for the benefit of her property, reserving to herself and heirs the right to consent to a different plan of building.

Owing to the conclusion which we have reached with reference to the covenant which we have been discussing, it will be unnecessary to examine respondent's point that appellant is a trespasser upon its property, having built slightly over its line, as found by the court, and that as such trespasser appellant has no standing in a court of equity without first doing equity himself.

There are no other points that require special notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

I. Introduction.

This note is limited to a discussion of the question of who may enforce restrictive covenants or agreements, besides the parties thereto. It is assumed that parties to such contracts, or their heirs or assigns, may enforce them.<sup>1</sup> It is not intended to cover the question of the right to enforce pure easements, such as reservations of rights of way;<sup>2</sup> nor are cases on positive covenants,<sup>3</sup> such as covenants to fence,<sup>4</sup> included. Other cases excluded are those relating to the enforcement of covenants against subsequent grantees of the covenantor;<sup>5</sup> the enforcement of restrictive covenants, as between lessees;<sup>6</sup> the effect of acquiescence of the complainant on the right to enforce such covenants;<sup>7</sup> statutory rights to enforce covenants;<sup>8</sup> and the right of purchasers of lots according to a plat on which a public square or public streets are designated, to have them kept open.<sup>9</sup>

Whether a person not a party to a restrictive covenant has the right to enforce it depends upon the intention of the parties in imposing it.<sup>10</sup> If the language of the covenant, or the instrument in which it appears, is the only guide to this intention, it would seem that the ordinary rules for the interpretation of written contracts would be applicable.<sup>11</sup> And the intention is to be ascertained as in any other case, not by learn-of the original grantor. Hay v. St. Paul M. E. Church, 196 Ill. 633, 63 N. E. 1040.

It is always a question of the intention of the parties. In order to make this rule applicable, it must appear from the terms of the grant, or from the situation of the surrounding circumstances, that it was the intention of the grantor in inserting a restriction, to create a servitude or right which should inure to the benefit of the plaintiff's land and should be annexed to it as an appurtenance. Beals v. Case, 138 Mass. 138.

In cases of this kind it is important to ascertain the purposes of the grantor in imposing the restrictions, whether they are intended for his personal benefit, or for the benefit of the lot owners generally. His intention is to be gathered from his acts and the circumstances. Hano v. Bigelow, 155 Mass. 341, 29 N. E. 628.

<sup>11</sup> "A covenant is simply a contract of a special nature, and the primary rule for the interpretation thereof is to gather the intention of the parties from their words, by reading not simply a single clause of the agreement, but the entire context, and where the meaning is doubtful, by considering such surrounding circumstances as they are presumed to have considered when their minds met." Clark v. Devoe, 124 N. Y. 120, ing some secret or unexpressed intention in the mind of the grantor, but through the language of the deed itself, construed in connection with the circumstances existing at the time it was executed, as the defendant is bound by what he had notice of, not by the secret intention of the grantor.<sup>12</sup> The vendor's object in imposing the restrictions must in general be gathered from all the circumstances of the case, including the nature of the restrictions. If the general observance of the restriction is in fact calculated to enhance the values of the several lots offered for sale, it is an easy inference that the vendor intended the restriction to be for the benefit of all the lots, even though he might have retained other land, the value of which might be similarly enhanced, for the vendor might naturally be expected to aim at obtaining the highest price for his land.<sup>13</sup> Where the manifest intention of the parties to a deed is to grant a negative easement for the benefit of land retained by the grantor, it is not necessary that this purpose should be expressed in the deed, but the omission from the deed of such an expression is an evidentiary circumstance to be taken into consideration.<sup>14</sup>

The action to enforce agreements imposing restrictions on the use of property, by persons not parties thereto, is equitable, and governed by the rules applicable to that kind of actions.<sup>15</sup> If an action at law cannot be maintained, that is an additional reason for entertaining jurisdiction in equity and preventing injustice.<sup>16</sup> If the action is based upon a covenant, it is not necessary that it be a covenant running with the land,<sup>17</sup> or that there be any privity be-

The purpose of the grantor with whom the restrictive covenant is made can be evidenced by the language of the covenant itself, or by other language in the deed which contains the covenant. Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14.

"Generally," said the court in Badger v. Boardman, 16 Gray, 559, "when such a right or privilege is reserved, the purpose intended to be accomplished by it is stated in the conveyance, or can be gathered from a plan referred to therein, or from the situation of the property with reference to other land of the grantor."

Where there was nothing in a deed containing a dwelling house restriction indicating that the covenant was for the benefit of anyone but the grantor, and there was no provision for the insertion of similar covenants in other deeds to be made by the grantor, and there was no other feature of the transaction which would disclose an intention that the covenant should attach to and be for the benefit of other land of the grantor, it was held that the complainant could not enforce it. Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14.

<sup>14</sup> Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54. The question whether such an easement is a personal right, or is to be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate, is generally determined by the fair interpretation of the terms of grant or reservation creating the easement, aided, if necessary, by reference to the situation of the property and the surrounding circumstances.

Where the common grantor sold to the defendant's predecessor in title a lot containing a building restriction, and imposed no such restriction on the lots he retained, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) and did not impose such restrictions on the majority of the lots he subsequently granted to others, this has been said to be a strong evidentiary circumstance tending to show that the purpose of the restriction was personal. Ibid.

<sup>15</sup> Agreements and stipulations may be enforced at law between the original parties only; but in equity those claiming title under them may resort to the whole instrument, including the covenants and agreements in gross, for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the right intended to be conveyed, and when ascertained, the court will enforce in favor of such persons that use or mode of enjoyment which the grantor has seen fit to impress upon it. The effect of the grant will thus be given to that which is in the form of an agreement binding only between the original parties. Schwoerer v. Boylston Market Asso. 99 Mass. 285.

The jurisdiction of courts of equity in these cases is not confined by the limitations, nor is it founded upon the principles, of the action of covenant in courts of law. Brouwer v. Jones, 23 Barb. 153.

A restrictive building covenant may be enforced by the owner of land for the benefit of which it was imposed, and by the grantor who imposed the restriction, although no longer the owner, who may appear in aid of the enforcement of the restriction for the benefit of the grantees. Riverbank Improv. Co. v. Bancroft, 209 Mass. 217, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 730, 95 N. E. 216.

<sup>17</sup> It is not necessary, to have such a restriction enforced in equity, that it should be a covenant running with the land. Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54. The court said: "The question whether the covenant runs with the land seems to be material in equity only on the question of notice; if the covenant runs with the land, then it binds the owner of the land, whether he had knowledge of it or not; for he takes tween the parties.<sup>18</sup> It has been said that it is a principle upon which all the courts unite, that the right to equitable relief in these cases depends upon the following considerations: First. A precedent agreement in some form by which a restriction is imposed upon the lot owned or held by defendant, for the benefit of the lot owned or held by the plaintiff. Second. In case the agreement is made by the defendant's predecessor in title, notice in some form to the defendant of the fact and nature of the agreement, either from the language of the title deed under which he holds, or otherwise.<sup>19</sup> The important requirement in all cases is that the agreement be not personal,<sup>20</sup> but no greater title than his predecessors had to convey. But if the covenant does not run with the land, but the land is subject to what is sometimes called an 'equity,' and at other times a 'negative easement,' in favor of the adjoining land, then, in order to enforce this easement against the land, it is essential that the owner should have taken the land with notice of it."

In Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615, where the action was by the covenantee against an assign of the covenantor, it was urged that the action would not lie because the covenant did not run with the land, but the court said this was of no importance. "Whether it was a covenant running with the land, or a collateral covenant, or a covenant in gross, or whether an action at law could be sustained upon it, is not material as affecting the jurisdiction of a court of equity, or the right of the owners of the dominant tenement to relief upon a disturbance of the easements."

Any grantee of the land to which such a right is appurtenant acquires by his grant a right to have the servitude or easement, or right of amenity, protected in equity, notwithstanding that his right may not rest on the covenant which simply runs with the title to his land, and notwithstanding that it may also be true that he may not be able to maintain an action at law for the vindication of his right. Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190.

<sup>18</sup> It is not necessary, in order to sustain the action, that there should be privity either of estate or contract; nor is it essential that an action at law should be maintainable on the covenant; but there must be found somewhere the clear intent to establish the restriction for the benefit of the party suing or his grantor, of which right the defendant must have either actual or constructive notice. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Brennan, 148 N. Y. 681, 43 N. E. 173, reversing 74 Hun, 576, 26 N. Y. Supp. 600.

"Easements of all kinds may be created and exist in favor of any third person, irrespective of any privity of estate or community of interest between the parties; and, in this respect, there is no distinction between negative easements and those rights that are more generally known as easements, as a way, etc." Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615.

In the absence of any privity between the complainant and the defendant, the right of the former rests upon a basis purely equitable. Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14.

The questions primarily involved are: "Does the complainant stand in the attitude of a subsequent purchaser from the vendor with whom the defendant's predecessor in title made his or her covenant?" And secondly, "Was such covenant made for the benefit of the land subsequently sold to complainant's predecessor in title?" Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14.

Where the person seeking to enforce the covenant was not a party to it, an action is not maintainable, (1) where it does not appear that the covenant was entered into for the benefit of the land of which the plaintiff has become the owner, and (2) where it appears that the covenant has not entered into the consideration of the plaintiff's purchase. Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, 92 Pac. 724, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1018.

In Elliston v. Reacher [1908] 2 Ch. 374, 77 L. J. Ch. N. S. 617, 99 L. T. N. S. 346, affirmed in [1908] 2 Ch. 665, it is said that, in order to enforce such covenants as between purchasers, it must be proved (1) that both the plaintiffs and defendants derived title under a common vendor; (2) that previously to the selling of the lands to which the plaintiffs and defendants are respectively entitled, the vendor laid out his estate, or a definite portion thereof (including the land purchased by the plaintiffs and defendants respectively), for sale, in lots subject to restrictions intended to be imposed on all the lots, and which, though varying in details as to particular lots, are consistent, and consistent only with some general scheme of development; (3) that these restrictions were intended by the common vendor to be and were for the benefit of all the lots intended to be sold, whether or not they were also intended to be and were for the benefit of other land retained by the vendor; (4) and that both the plaintiffs and defendants, or their predecessors in title purchased other lots from the common vendor upon a footing that the restrictions subject to which the purchases were made were to inure for the benefit of the other lots included in the general scheme, whether or not they were also to inure for the benefit of other lands retained by the vendors.

the for the benefit of the particular piece of ground in favor of which the restriction is sought to be enforced. In making a conveyance the grantor has the legal right to impose a condition from any motive, and it is immaterial what that motive is; and it has even been said that he can impose it in favor of property he does not own, if he sees fit to do so.<sup>21</sup> If restrictions on lots of a tract of land are for the benefit of purchasers and their grantees, they cannot be released to a purchaser or his grantee without the assent of other purchasers or their grantees for whose benefit they were imposed.<sup>22</sup>

Naturally, in this class of cases as in others, the complainant carries the burden. If he seeks to enforce a restriction in favor of the land he owns, not having been a party thereto, he must show that it was the intention of the original parties that the restriction should inure to the benefit of his land;<sup>23</sup> and the burden is on the plaintiff if he insists upon giving the condition any wider application than it purports to have on its face.<sup>24</sup>

Restrictive covenants may be divided into three classes, with reference to the benefit intended. First, those imposed for the benefit of the land retained; second, those imposed for the benefit of the land conveyed; and third, those imposed for the benefit of the whole tract, usually evidenced by some general plan or scheme for the development and improvement of the property. These will be considered in their order.

II. Restrictions for benefit of land retained.

A very common purpose of restrictions as to the use of property conveyed is to benefit land retained by the grantor,<sup>25</sup> the

An owner may subject his lands to any servitude, and transmit them to others charged with the same; and one taking title to lands, with notice of any equity attached thereto, or any outstanding right or claim affecting the title or the use and enjoyment of the lands, takes subject to such equities and such right or claim, and stands in the place of his grantor, bound to do, or forbear to do, whatever he would have been bound to do or forbear to do. Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615.

The burden is upon the complainant to prove that the covenant was made for the benefit of his property, and not merely for the benefit of the grantor. Hemsley v. Marlborough House Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14.

The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show from the terms of the grant, or from the situation and circumstances, that it was the intention of the grantor in inserting the condition, to create a servitude or right which should inure to the benefit of the lot of land owned by the plaintiff, and which should be annexed to it as an appurtenance. Lowell Inst. for Savings v. Lowell, 153 Mass. 530, 27 N. E. 518.

Where a deed to a city of a lot on one side of a street, opposite to which the city intended to build a school, contained a restriction that it should not be built, and the deed contained no mention that the condition was imposed for the benefit of adjacent land, and no earlier deed had mentioned any scheme or plan, and the lot owned by the party seeking to enforce the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) restriction was then vacant land, it was held that he could not enforce the restriction, especially where plaintiff's deed executed several years afterward, contained no mention that such right or easement existed for his benefit. Ibid.

Where the grantor restricts the use of the land which he conveys, for the benefit of land which he retains, his subsequent conveyance of the land will pass such benefit to his grantee. Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190.

In Nottingham Patent Brick & Tile Co. v. Butler, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 778. Lord Esher, M. R., said: "There are two lines of cases to be found in the books. The first is where there has been a sale of part of a property with no then existing intention of selling the rest, and subsequently there is a sale of another part; then, as regards the later sale, you cannot look at the conditions of the former sale; you must look only at the conditions relating to the later sale. The other line of cases is where the whole of a property is put up for sale (not necessarily under a building scheme), but is put up for sale in lots subject to certain restrictive covenants; then it is a question of fact whether it was or was not the intention that the restrictive covenants should be entered into for the benefit of each of the purchasers as against all the others, and it is a most material circumstance whether the vendor reserves any part of the property for himself. If he does not reserve any part, that is almost, if not quite, difficulty in this class of cases being to distinguish between agreements for the grantor's own benefit, and agreements for the benefit of the land itself. If it sufficiently appears that it is the land retained that is to reap the advantage, then any person into whose hands the property passes may enforce the restrictions as well as if he were the original party to it. It is well settled that the owner, upon selling a portion of his land, may by appropriate covenant or agreement lawfully restrict the use of the part conveyed for the benefit of the unsold portion, providing that the nature of the restricted use is not contrary to public policy. In such case a subsequent purchaser of a part of the remaining land, for the benefit of which the stipulation was made, may in equity enforce the observance of the stipulation against a prior grantee, upon the principle that the rights created by such a stipulation are transferable, and part of the land to which they are attached, and such subsequent purchasers may in equity enforce the stipulation against a person who holds title under a prior purchaser who has acquired title with notice of the restriction, upon the principle which prevents a party having knowledge of the just rights of another, from contracting such rights.<sup>26</sup>

The principle upon which a person not a party to a restrictive covenant is permitted to enforce it is based upon the idea that the subsequent purchaser of lands to be benefited by the enforcement has made his purchase, and paid his consideration, in the expectation of the benefit to accrue to the land bought, from the observance of the restriction imposed by his grantor upon the use of the lots previously conveyed to the covenantor; and no injustice is worked upon the covenantor, or his assigns with notice of the covenant, by restraining them from using the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract under which they obtained title, and which fixed the price they paid with relation to the restrictions imposed.<sup>27</sup> The action being in equity, objections which would be fatal at law are here immaterial.<sup>28</sup>

conclusive (unless there is something contradictory) that the covenants which he takes from the purchasers are intended for the benefit of each purchaser as against the others." It is an inference of fact in each case whether the purchasers are bound inter se by such covenants.

A prior purchaser from the common grantor, by reason of the restrictions imposed, paid less price for his land; the party who subsequently purchased from the common grantor a part or the whole of the land to be benefited by the restrictions bought in consideration of the benefits coming to his lot because of the restrictions. This relation is such a privity as supports an equity in the subsequent purchaser of the lot benefited by the covenant to enforce it. Roberts v. Scull, 58 N. J. Eq. 396, 43 Atl. 583.

As no privity exists between a subsequent purchaser from the common grantor, and the original grantee or the persons holding under him, a right of action is necessarily dependent upon the existence of the fact that the stipulation was originally made for the benefit of the remaining land of the common grantor. Ibid.

But the fact that the grantor of a parcel of land with a restriction that no tavern or public house be built upon the same holds, at the time, a mortgage on the adjoining piece of land, is not sufficient to fasten a restrictive easement on the mortgaged land, so that a subsequent purchaser thereof can enforce the restriction against a subsequent purchaser of the restricted land. Tibbetts v. Tibbetts, 66 N. H. 360, 20 Atl. 979.

A building line restriction entered into between the first owner of the land and the first grantee thereof, the grantor retaining the adjoining land, and each covenanting to maintain a certain building line, the parties agreeing to insert in every future conveyance by them of any of the said land a similar covenant on the part of the grantee, was held enforceable as between subsequent grantees claiming under the person who derived title from the covenantor alone, the deeds to both being made subject to such covenants, although their common source of title parted with the land conveyed to the plaintiff, and he conveyed to the defendant. The doctrine of the enforceability of restrictive covenants, by persons not parties thereto is established upon the principle that otherwise grantees of the covenantor would have no remedy at law by an action for damages, and the covenantor would be entitled only to nominal damages, after he had parted with his interest in the land to be benefited. Perkins v. Coddington, 4 Robt. 647.

<sup>28</sup> The fact that the covenants were made with mortgagors of the land only, and not with the mortgagees, so that in contemplation of the law they were made with strangers to the land, will not affect the right of such purchasers to enforce the covenants in equity. Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388. The court said: "When the covenant was clearly made for the benefit of certain lands, with the person who, in the contemplation of such a court, was the true owner of it, it would be regarded as annexed to and running with that land, just as it would have been at law but for the technical difficulty."

tion the restrictive covenant in a deed to land for the benefit of which it is made, in order that the purchaser of such land may enforce it;<sup>30</sup> nor is it necessary to establish a general building scheme;<sup>30</sup> or, by the better opinion, to show that the person seeking to enforce the restriction had notice of it at the time he obtained title to his land, so that it could be said to have entered into the consideration for the purchase;<sup>31</sup> or to prove that the grantor, at the time of imposing the restriction, found the land retained by a reciprocal obligation.<sup>32</sup>

It would seem that, under the circumstances here considered, where no purpose in imposing the restriction is stated, the presumption that the covenant was inserted in the deed to the premises conveyed for the benefit of the land retained is a very easy and natural one; but, no doubt, this is dependent largely upon the nature of the covenant itself.<sup>33</sup> Such a presumption does not invariably follow from the fact that the grantor retains property adjoining or in the vicinity of that conveyed to the covenantor.<sup>34</sup>

The fact that there is no evidence that a particular restriction was part of a general plan does not necessarily negative the conclusion that it was intended for the benefit of a particular adjacent estate. The situation of the two parcels of land in respect of each other may be such as to render such a conclusion unavoidable, as, for instance, where a vendor sells one adjoining parcel, with an agreement not to build upon the other, in which case the conclusion is unavoidable that he annexes to the parcel sold an easement of light, air, and view in respect to the parcel retained. Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54.

<sup>32</sup> Where by the express declaration on the face of the conveyance containing restrictive building covenants, the benefits of the covenants were intended for all or any of the vendor's lots near to or adjoining the plot sold, it was held that the representatives of the vendee of a part of the land retained by the vendor could enforce the covenant, although at the time he took his deed, he had no notice of the restrictions in favor of his land. Rogers v. Hosegood [1900] 2 Ch. 388.

And upon this point Farwell, J., upon the trial, said: "The plaintiff's right in such an action does not depend upon what he believes himself to have bought, but upon what he has in fact bought, and he has bought the land with the covenants annexed. The defendant is not injured, for he bought the land with knowledge of the covenant, and he can claim no more than the land with that burden upon it." Ibid.

But it has been said that the action is not maintainable between purchasers not parties, if it appears that the covenant has not entered into the consideration of the complainant's purchase. De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388.

<sup>33</sup> Nor is it necessary that the purpose be expressed in the deed or that the deed contain a reciprocal covenant on the part of the grantor to observe a like restriction in respect of the land retained by him. "To illustrate this," said the court, "let us suppose the case of the owner of two adjoining lots, desiring to build upon the one, and willing to sell the other. He sells the other with a restriction for a certain building line, but he imposes upon himself no restriction to observe the same building line in respect of the lot which he retains. He builds upon his own lot to the line of the street, and he enforces the restriction against his grantee, by which he is obliged to build back to the building line. It can be well seen that the grantor may intend this restriction for the mere purpose of retaining for himself a greater easement of light and view, without imposing upon himself a similar restriction." Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54.

<sup>34</sup> In every case where the owner of a piece of property divides it and sells a part of it, imposing upon his vendee a restriction as to its use, there is a presumption that he imposes the restriction for the benefit of the land he retains, but this presumption is rebuttable. Ibid.

Where the original grantor owned adjoining parcels of land, and occupied one of them as a homestead, and sold the other with the express reservation that no building be erected by the grantee, his heirs or assigns, upon the land conveyed, it was held that the fair inference was that the parties intended to create an easement for the benefit of the estate retained by the grantor, and that a subsequent grantee of the original vendee could be prevented from building upon it. Peck v. Conway, 119 Mass. 546.

<sup>34</sup> The cases do not appear to have recognized that a restrictive covenant may be presumed to have been made for the benefit of the remaining land of the grantor, in the absence of some evidence of the fact. McNichol v. Townsend, 73 N. J. Eq. 276, 67 Atl. 938.

Where the vendor sells part of his land, and takes from the vendee restrictive covenants as to buildings, the law does not invariably regard such stipulations as having been made for the benefit of the land retained, so as to attach them to the reserved property and to pass them to vendees

The rule adopted in this class of cases has been well stated to be that where the common grantor of two adjoining lots sells one and retains the other, and puts in the deed of the one which he sells a covenant against building in a certain way, which covenant is manifestly intended for the benefit of the lot which is retained, and he afterwards sells this lot to another, the covenant passes to the assign of such lot as an appurtenance to it, or as an easement for the benefit of it, and such assign may enforce it against the owner of the other lot, whether he acquired the other lot immediately from the original vendor, or through mesne conveyances, or by devise, descent, or otherwise, from him, provided he took with notice of it, actual or constructive.<sup>35</sup> So where the vendor, owning land on both sides of the river, sold land on one side, and, for the purpose of protecting a ferry, provided in the deed that neither the vendee nor his heirs and assigns should establish a common ferryboat landing on the property conveyed, it was held that this was enforceable by the devisees of the vendor.<sup>36</sup> And where the owner of three adjoining lots, upon the sale of the eastern and western lots, covenanted for himself, his heirs and assigns, with the grantee, his heirs and as-

on a subsequent sale of such property; and the vendor under such circumstances cannot be presumed to have intended to fetter himself in the exercise of the power which he possesses of dealing with the whole of his estate as he sees fit. Keates v. Lyon, L. R. 4 Ch. 218, 38 L. J. Ch. N. S. 357, 20 L. T. N. S. 255, 17 Week. Rep. 338.

An easement or servitude in the nature of a building restriction ought not to be held to be imposed for the benefit of an adjacent lot of land in the absence of any words in the grant itself implying it, unless circumstances and situation at the time of the grant were such as to make it manifest that the condition or restriction or reservation was intended to be for the benefit of such adjacent lot, and to be annexed to it as an appurtenance. Lowell Inst. for Savings v. Lowell, 153 Mass. 530, 27 N. E. 518.

<sup>35</sup> Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54. The court said: "In every case there is a very strong argument in favor of the view that such restrictions ought to be construed as imposing what is termed a negative easement upon the land conveyed, for the benefit of the land retained, or what is sometimes termed an equity in the land retained as against the land conveyed. To the argument that the grantor intended the restriction for his own personal benefit, and that it was a mere personal covenant, and not a covenant running with the land, it may generally be answered that the grantor could not intend it for his own personal benefit, except for his benefit as owner of the land retained, and that he should be benefited by it from no other circumstance than from the circumstance that it benefited the land which he retained. In dealing with this subject, equity does not concern itself with the form of the language in which the restriction is couched, but deals only with its substance. It disregards the inquiry whether it is a condition or a covenant, and enforces it when it was plainly intended by the parties that it should be for the benefit of the land held by the plaintiff."

Where it appears by the true construction of the terms of the grant, that it was the well-understood purpose of the parties to create or reserve a right in the nature of a servitude or easement in the property granted, for the benefit of other land owned by the grantor, no matter in what form such purpose may be expressed, whether in the form of a condition or covenant or reservation or exception, such right, if not against public policy, will be held to be appurtenant to the land of the grantor, and binding on that conveyed to the grantee; and the right and burden thus created and imposed will pass with the land to all subsequent grantees. Coudert v. Sayre, 46 N. J. Eq. 386, 19 Atl. 190.

Where a grantor, retaining a portion of the land out of which the grant is made, enters into an express written understanding with his grantee, whatever may be its form, whether covenant, condition, reservation, or exception, which restricts the enjoyment of the portion of the land which is conveyed, in order to benefit the portion retained, and the restriction is reasonable and consonant with public policy, whether it runs with the land and is binding at law or not, it will be enforced in equity against the grantee and anyone subsequently acquiring title to the land with notice of it, at the instance of the grantor or any subsequent owner or owners of parts of the remaining land, when its violation results in material detriment to the portion of the remaining land, which the complainant in the suit holds. Hayes v. Waverly & P. R. Co. 51 N. J. Eq. 345, 27 Atl. 648.

When a restrictive covenant is included in a deed to the grantee, and such covenant is made for the benefit of the remaining land of the vendor, the right to enforce the covenant passes to the subsequent grantee of the vendor. Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14, affirmed in 63 N. J. Eq. 804, 52 Atl. 1132.

That the bill is brought by the grantee of the original owner will not affect the property involved, as the grantee succeeds to all the rights of the original grantor in equity, even if he does not do so at law. Ibid.

A restriction as to the sale of intoxicating liquors, made for the benefit of land retained by the grantor, is enforceable by and against the assignees of the parties thereto. Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 363, 24 N. W. 104.

signs, that the center lot then owned by the grantor should be further restricted from having any building attached to a building already erected thereon, of a greater height than 10 feet from the surface of the lot, it was held that this was a covenant running with the land for the benefit of the eastern and western lots.<sup>87</sup>

It was also held that the owner of neither the eastern nor western lots could, by his independent act or deed, relinquish the subserviency of the center lot so as to affect the other.<sup>88</sup>

But the mere fact that the grantor of land with a building restriction was, at the time of the conveyance, the owner of other land separated by a railroad from the land granted, was held not sufficient to show that the object of the restriction was to benefit this land, and it was also held that, in the absence of words in the deed to this effect, or any reference to the plan showing a general scheme of improvement, the grantees took their estate without any notice, express or constructive, that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the adjoining estate, and that the restriction is not enforceable thereafter by the heirs of the grantor.<sup>89</sup>

And where the provision in the defend-

When the owner of two adjoining lots conveys one, and incorporates into the deed of the lot conveyed a covenant restricting the right of the grantee to build in a certain specified manner, which covenant is intended for the benefit of the other land held by the grantor, a subsequent conveyance will pass or transfer the covenant to the grantee or grantees of such lot, as an easement for the benefit of the lot, and the grantee may enforce the covenant against the owner of the other lot in an appropriate action. Clark v. McGee, 159 Ill. 518, 42 N. E. 965.

In Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Continental Ins. Co. 87 N. Y. 400, there was a building restriction in the grantee's deed against building on the strip of land adjoining the southerly line of the remaining land of the grantor. The question in the case was whether the defendant could build on the strip, by the payment to the plaintiff, the successor in title of the grantor's remaining land, of a certain sum of money specified in the deed as liquidated damages in case of the violation of the covenant, and in holding that the penalty could not be offered in lieu of performance of the covenant, the court said that there could be no doubt that the right to enforce the covenant passed to the plaintiff, as grantee of the dominant premises.

Harrison v. Good, L. R. 11 Eq. 338, a vendee of a piece of land from the owners of an estate covenanted not to do, or suffer to be done, on such property, anything which should be a nuisance to the vendor or any of his tenants, "or the occupiers or owners of the adjoining property." The vendee then put up the land for sale at auction in thirty-four lots, subject to the same restriction. It was held that the word "adjoining" meant the property adjoining each lot, and that the covenant was enforceable by purchasers between themselves.

In Clark v. Martin, 49 Pa. 289, the grantor conveyed a lot adjoining the one he retained, stipulating in the deed that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, should not erect any building on the back part of the lot higher than 10 feet. It was held that this restriction was enforceable against a subsequent grantee of the lot sold, by the subsequent grantee of the property retained by the vendor, the restriction having evidently been intended for the benefit of the latter lot.

A building restriction covenant by the purchaser of a part of the vendor's land, entered into for the benefit of the land retained, is enforceable by a subsequent purchaser of a part of the land retained, although the vendor after the sale attempts to release the land from the benefit of the covenant. Western v. Macdermot, L. R. 1 Eq. 499 on Appeal L. R. 2 Ch. 72, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 76, 12 Jur. N. S. 366, 15 L. T. N. S. 641, 15 Week. Rep. 265.

In Hills v. Miller, 3 Paige, 254, 24 Am. Dec. 218, the vendor, upon conveying land upon one side of a street, agreed not to build on a triangular strip of ground owned by him opposite the land sold, and gave a bond for the performance of the condition by himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators. Both pieces of the property passed into other hands. It was held that the burdened land could not be released without the consent of the owner of the first parcel sold, and that the complainant, the present owner, could enforce the covenant. The court said: "If the privilege was of no value to that part of the property, the mention of the fact of the bond would have been no commendation; and if it was calculated to enhance the value of the property in the opinion of the purchaser, it would be inequitable to permit the seller to release the right he had secured by the bond, after he had by that means induced the complainant to become the buyer. If such a privilege did increase the value of the property, or render its possession more desirable, either in reference to its present or future use for village lots, the legal presumption is that the purchaser took that privilege into the account in deciding upon the expediency of taking the property at the price he concluded to give."

There is disagreement as to the rights of one holding land under a subsequent conveyance from a common vendor to enant's deed was that no structure should be erected on the lot "further east or nearer Ashland avenue than is the house or building immediately south of said property," it was held that the mere reference to the complainant's house as a monument was not sufficient to show that the grantor designed to protect the light, air, or view, or to give an interest in the property.<sup>40</sup>

If the vendor owns more than one piece of property, or if, having sold part of his land subject to a restrictive covenant, he afterwards transfers a portion of the remainder, the question arises whether the covenant or agreement was intended for the benefit of the particular parcel which passes into the hands of such grantee. Where the vendor put up a tract for sale at auction, subject to certain building restrictions sufficient to be an inducement to the purchase of the lots, and only part of the lots were sold, it was held that the purchaser of one of such lots had the right to insist that the vendor insert similar restrictions in the deeds to the remainder of the lots, although the vendor had other land besides, which it was urged on his behalf was the property intended to be benefited by the restrictive covenant.<sup>41</sup>

In general it may be said that in order that the plaintiff may enforce a building restriction in a deed under which the defendant claims, where neither the plaintiff nor defendant was a party thereto, it must appear that the restriction was inserted in the deed for the purpose of creating a restrictive force a restrictive covenant in an earlier conveyance, when there is no proof that the covenant was intended for the benefit of the later grantee, except that it was contained in the prior deed. In some cases like that the covenant has been regarded as not appurtenant to the land retained by the vendor, but as personal to him, and the right of a subsequent vendee to enforce it has been denied. Doerr v. Cobbs, 146 Mo. App. 342, 123 S. W. 547.

The mere fact that a grantor at the time of a conveyance with a restrictive covenant was the owner of land separate from the land conveyed is not sufficient to enable the grantee of the latter to enforce a covenant, in the absence of any words in the deed to that effect, or any reference to a plan showing a general scheme for improvement, and evidence that the grantee took the land notice, express or implied, that the restriction was for the benefit of the remaining land. Hemsley v. Marlborough Hotel Co. 62 N. J. Eq. 164, 50 Atl. 14.

Where the owner of a tract of land sold part of it subject to certain restrictive covenants as to buildings, but did not himself enter into any covenants in respect thereto, and afterwards sold other parts of the land retained to other persons, nothing appearing as to restrictions, and then repurchased the part of the land which he first sold, it was held that he could then reconvey the land purchased free from the restrictions, since such restrictions could not be taken to have been entered into for the benefit of the purchasers of the land retained. *Keates v. covenant owned an adjoining estate, the restriction must be taken to have been entered into for the protection of such estate, and that the purchaser of a portion of the latter estate was entitled to the benefit of this restriction, irrespective of whether or not any representation that such a covenant had been entered into by the purchaser from the vendor was made to the purchaser of the other property; and that any contract by the vendor with such purchaser should have the benefit of such covenant; but it was held that, in order to enable the purchaser as an assign—such purchaser not being an assign of all that the vendor retained when he executed the conveyance containing the covenant, and the conveyance not showing that the benefit of the covenant was intended to inure, for the time being, to each portion of the estate so retained, or of the portion of the estate of which the plaintiff is assign—to claim the benefit of the restrictive covenant, this, at least, must appear, that the assign acquired his property with the benefit of the covenant; that is, it must appear that the benefit of the covenant was a part of the subject-matter of the purchase.

Where a church sold a tract of land for cemetery purposes, reserving a certain portion "for a church site," and the land was conveyed to trustees, who executed a declaration of trust for the benefit of the purchasers, and to reconvey the portion reserved, to the church for the church site, and the trustees afterwards conveyed the land for cemetery purpose to a cemetery association, and the portion selected for the church site to the church, under a deed reciting that it was "reserved as a site for a church," it was held that, in the absence of any statement in the bill to enjoin the church from selling the land for other purposes, under a release of the condition from the trustees, that the trustees were at the time of the transfer to the church individually interested in other land in the neighborhood which would be affected by the enforcement of the restriction, the restriction would inure to the benefit of the land owned by the cemetery association, and that easeinent in favor of the ground which includes plaintiff's particular lot, and that the circumstances were such as to impart to the defendant notice, from the terms of the deed, that such was its purpose.<sup>42</sup> And in determining whether a building restriction was intended for the benefit of particular adjacent lots or parcels of ground, an important evidentiary circumstance is that similar restrictions were inserted in other deeds conveying such other lots or parcels, or that the deeds conveying such other lots or parcels contain reference to the restrictive clause in the particular deed.<sup>43</sup> But the coincidence that all the deeds conveying any portion of the property contained the same covenants would not be sufficient of itself to show that the covenant in the deed to defendant's predecessor in title was intended to be for the benefit of complainant's lot, which had been sold by the common grantor six years before.<sup>44</sup>

In determining the question whether the restriction was intended for the benefit of the land retained, or for the benefit of plaintiff's lot, the nature of the restriction may have some bearing. In a Massachusetts case it is said that, assuming that the covenant is valid as a contract between the parties, in order to be enforceable by others, it must be of a kind which the law permits to be attached to the land in such a sense as to restrict the use of one parcel in all hands for the benefit of whoever may hold the other, whatever the principle invoked. For equity will no more enforce the church, at the suit of such association, would be enjoined from selling the land for other purposes. Fairmount Cemetery Asso. v. First Presby. Church, 60 N. J. Eq. 142, 46 Atl. 213.

Where the restriction is no part of a general plan, and there is nothing in the language of the deed, when interpreted by surrounding circumstances, from which it can be fairly inferred that the restriction was intended for the benefit of any particular piece of land retained by the vendor, the covenant cannot be enforced by one who subsequently acquires from the vendor the particular piece of land, or by the vendor for the exclusive benefit of such subsequent purchaser. Ibid.

An action is held not maintainable between purchasers not parties, if it does not appear that the covenant was entered into for the benefit of the land of which the complainant has become the owner. De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388.

A subsequent purchaser cannot enforce, as against a prior purchaser, a restrictive covenant, in the absence of proof that the covenant was made for the benefit of the land retained by the common grantor, or of proof of a building scheme. McNichol v. Townsend, 73 N. J. Eq. 276, 67 Atl. 938.

The right of the owner of a lot of land to enforce a covenant restrictive to the use of another tract, which covenant has been entered into by the owner of such other tract with the former owner of both, but has not been expressly assigned, depends primarily on the covenant having been made for the benefit of the land embracing such lot. It has been so made, the benefit of the covenant inures to the subsequent purchasers of the land. De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 340, 24 Atl. 388.

tions, and after he had conveyed complainant's lot with similar restrictions, and there was no proof that when the deed for the complainant's land was made there was either a grant of any right in the residue of the land retained by the grantor, or a stipulation that the restrictions put upon the first lot should also be imposed on the remaining property when sales were made to subsequent purchasers, it was held that the complainant could not enforce the covenant in the subsequent deed, because not made for the benefit of complainant's lot. Ibid.

In Badger v. Boardman, 16 Gray, 559, a grantor conveyed a parcel of land designated on a plan, "subject to the following restriction: that no out buildings or shed should ever be erected westerly of the main building of a greater height than those now standing thereon," and afterwards conveyed another parcel on the same plan to the grantee under which the plaintiff claimed. It was held that the plaintiff could not enforce the covenant, there being nothing in the deeds to show that the restriction in the first deed was inserted for the benefit of the estate owned by the plaintiff, and there being no language in the deeds under which the plaintiff claimed title, which referred specifically to this restriction.

Where two lots of a parcel of land designated on a plan were conveyed to different grantees, the grantor having previously built a house on a different lot in the same tract, and the deeds contained a provision that for fifteen years no building should be placed on the granted premises within 20 feet of the street, and no trade offensive to dwelling houses in that neighborhood should be carried on, and that a violation of the restriction should not work a forfeiture, and that the grantor and his heirs might enter upon the land and remove anything violating the restrictions, it was held that the restriction was not enforceable against one grantee by another, there being nothing in the deed to show that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the estate owned by the plaintiff. Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass.

every restriction that can be devised, than the common law will recognize, as creating an easement, every grant purporting to limit the use of land in favor of other land. The principle or policy applied to affirmative covenants applies also to negative ones. They must "touch or concern," or "extend to the support of, the thing" conveyed. They must be "for the benefit of the estate." Or, as it is said more broadly, new and unusual incidents cannot be attached to land, by way either of benefit or of burden.<sup>48</sup>

Ordinarily, where the owner of a tract of land sells part of it subject to restrictions, it is a purchaser of part of the land retained who seeks to enforce the restrictions; but where the land sold burdened with the restriction is afterwards divided up, and passes into the hands of different purchasers, the question has been raised whether such purchasers from the original vendee can enforce, as between themselves, the restrictions imposed upon their grantor's land. The courts are not in harmony on this question, but in this class of cases it would seem that the rights of portions of the servient estate to enforce the restriction would be exceedingly doubtful, since the restriction was imposed for the benefit of a different tract of land, that is, the land retained by the grantor,—the dominant estate. So it has been held that, in the absence of any fact or circumstance to show that a building restriction was annexed to a grant for the purpose of improving or

381. The court said no such purpose can be gathered from the plan, or from the situation of the property with reference to other land of the grantor. It purports to be a condition imposed by the grantor, and the deed pointed out the mode in which he, his heirs or devisees, may enforce it. Neither of the deeds under which the respective parties claim purports to give to the grantee any such right against any other grantee. For ought that appears, the condition may have been intended for the benefit of the grantor or his family as long as they continued to own the dwelling house.

Where plaintiffs' father, the equitable owner of a tract of land, caused a map to be made representing the property to be laid out in blocks, around a central block laid down on the map as a park, and caused the lots to be conveyed to different owners, and it was covenanted that the land designated as a park should be used for no other purpose, it was held that, the title to the park and the contiguous lots having passed from the plaintiffs' father in his lifetime, they inherited no right to either, and that, as they had no title, either to the park or to any land for the benefit of which the park was created, they could not enforce the covenant. Graves v. Deterling, 120 N. Y. 447, 24 N. E. 655.

A covenant not to work a quarry is personal. "In what way," said the court, "does it extend to the support of the plaintiff's quarry? It does not make the use or occupation of it more convenient. It does not in any way affect the use or occupation; it simply tends indirectly to increase its value, by excluding a competitor from the market for its products. If it be asked what is the difference in principle between an easement to have land unbuild upon, such as was recognized in Brooks v. Reynolds, 106 Mass. 31, and an easement to have a quarry left unopened, the answer is that, whether a difference of degree or of kind, the distinction is plain between a grant or covenant that looks to direct physical advantage in the occupation of the dominant estate, such as light and air, and one which only concerns it in the indirect way which we have mentioned. The scope of the covenant and the circumstances show that it is not directed to the quiet enjoyment of the dominant land." Ibid.

And it was held that a covenant providing, among other things, that the premises conveyed shall not be used for any business or store purposes other than for hotel or lodging house or club purposes, purports upon its face to be a personal covenant not binding upon the assigns of the covenantor, nor inuring to the successors or assigns of the covenantee. Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, 136 Cal. 36, 68 Pac. 310.

When the covenant is limited to the land "hereby granted," and where the covenants stipulated, "for themselves, their heirs, successors, and legal representatives," not to manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors on the premises, the covenant is thereby expressly limited to the particular persons named, the intention being further manifested by the condition of the forfeiture clause in the covenant, to the effect that upon condition broken the premises "shall revert to the party of the first part, its heirs, successors, and assigns." Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, 92 Pac. 724, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1018.

In Krekeler v. Aulbach, 51 App. Div. 591, 64 N. Y. Supp. 908, where a grantor conveyed land adjoining a lot retained by him, to a grantee, "subject, nevertheless, to the express condition that no building or edifice of any description whatsoever exceeding 8 feet in height shall at any time hereafter be erected within 32 feet of the rear line of the said two lots," and the question was whether it constituted an encumbrance upon the servient estate, it was held that the agreement was a mere personal covenant, there being no reservation in this deed of this condition to the heirs or assigns of the grantor, and its burden not being charged upon the heirs or assigns of the grantee, and, all the property having been subsequently conveyed, none of the deeds of conveyance, either by rendering more beneficial or advantageous the occupation of the estate granted, when it should become divided into separate parcels and be owned by different individuals, or when the manifest object of the restriction on the use of an estate was for the benefit of another tract joining to, or in the vicinity of, the land on which the restriction is imposed, the condition annexed to the grant can have no effect or operation, either at law or in equity, beyond that which attaches to it by the rules of the common law. The benefit of the condition would, in such case, inure to the grantor and his heirs or devisees, and the burden of it would rest on the estate to which it was annexed, and on those who held it, or any part of it, subject to the condition.<sup>46</sup> And that, if a building restriction is assumed to be in the nature of an easement imposed for the benefit of land retained by the grantor, and the land conveyed is afterwards subdivided and sold to different persons, one of the subsequent grantees cannot enforce the covenant against another.<sup>47</sup> But in a New Jersey case, it was held that a restrictive covenant could be enforced as between grantees of the covenantor, where the covenant was entered into for the benefit of the land retained by the covenantor. The court said that both parties were bound to the grantor in the original deed, in respect to the restrictive covenant. Each was subject to an easement on the other's lot in favor of those subsequently deriving title from the covenantor, and each was equitably entitled to the advantage which the observance of this stipulation by his neighbor might be to him. If all were relieved from the encumbrance, none perhaps could complain. But to be restrained from extending his own building to the street, and to let his neighbor on each side project in front of him, would be a greater grievance to any of these lot owners than was contained in the stipulation in the deed through which he derived title.<sup>48</sup>

It has been held that a tenant in common with the grantor cannot enforce an equitable restriction in a deed by his cotenant to which he was not a party, and therefore property so conveyed is not subject to an encumbrance by way of equitable restriction.<sup>49</sup>

III. Restrictions for benefit of land conveyed.

Another, but much rarer, class of cases in which restrictive covenants may be enforced by persons not parties thereto is that in which a vendor, instead of imposing the burden on the property sold for the benefit of that retained, reverses the servitude, laying the restriction on the land retained for the benefit of the land sold. It would seem that the same reasoning ought to apply as well in the one case as the other, and that the parties themselves or the representatives of their estates, containing any mention or reference to the condition; and there being nothing in the history of the land itself, and the purpose to which it had been devoted, which in anywise showed that for its proper enjoyment there was any necessity that the condition should be kept alive.

Where the grantor, owning land on both sides of a street, conveyed land bordering on the ocean on one side of the street subject to the restriction that it should be used for boating and bathing only, and that only low bathing houses should be built, and it did not appear that he had in contemplation the division of the lot into separate parcels which would be held by different owners, or that the condition was inserted in the grant for the purpose of creating a restriction on the use of the ground as between subsequent grantees of different lots or parcels thereof, it was held that, after the lot had been so subdivided, one grantee could not enforce the restriction against another. Ibid.

Where the original vendee bought a number of lots in a tract of land, to be held subject to the restrictions mentioned in a plan of the estate contained in an earlier indenture, which plan was subject to such alterations as should be made and approved by the vendor, his heirs, etc., but the vendee never intended to bind the vendor to the observance of the restrictions which he, the vendee, had entered into, and the vendee afterwards sold two of the lots subject to the restrictions entered into between the original vendor and the original vendee, and then reconveyed the balance of the land to the original vendor without any stipulations, it was held that the purchaser of two of the lots from the original vendee could not enforce the restrictions as against the purchaser of other lots in the parcel conveyed to the original vendee. Schreiber v. Creed, 10 Sim. 9, 3 Jur. 625, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 346. <sup>47</sup> Graham v. Hite, 93 Ky. 474, 20 S. W. 506.

Where the restriction in a deed was, among other things, that the buildings should be set back the same distance from the street as a certain house mentioned, and the grantee afterwards sold a portion of the land to different vendees, it was held that one of these vendees could not enforce the restriction against the other, since the original vendor did not intend to subject any one of the lots into which the parcel conveyed to the original vendee was divided, to a restriction in its use for the benefit of another or others of such lots. Ibid.

the rule should here be that such restrictions may be enforced by the grantees of the covenantee against the covenantor or his grantees, but that an action may not be maintained to enforce the restriction between grantees of the servient estate. It has been held that, an owner having sold a portion of his land, covenanting that he would not permit the land retained to be used for the purpose of a tavern, public house, or beer shop, a grantee of the covenantee may enforce the same against a grantee of the covenantor taking with notice;<sup>50</sup> and that a covenant in a conveyance to a vendee not to erect or suffer to be erected any structure on the street, highway, or common owned by the grantor, in front of the premises conveyed, is a covenant running with the land, and the grant is a grant of a privilege or easement, which passes to a purchaser of the land conveyed without the assignment of the covenant, and the grantee of such an easement is entitled to an injunction to restrain the owner of the servient tenement from erecting buildings thereon in violation of his covenant.<sup>51</sup>

IV. Restrictions for benefit of whole tract.

a. Where whole tract is sold.

If the vendor, upon conveying property burdened with restrictions, does not retain any land himself, the reasons given for the rules discussed in the last subdivision of the note do not, of course, apply. What are the rights of purchasers under such circumstances, as between themselves? It has been held in England that when an estate is put up for sale in lots, subject to the condition that restrictive covenants are to be entered into by each of the purchasers with the vendor, and the vendor is intending at that sale to sell the whole of the property, the question whether it is intended that each of the purchasers shall be liable in respect of these restrictive covenants, to each of the other purchasers, is a question of fact to be determined by the intention of the vendor and of the purchasers, and that question must be determined by the same rules of evidence as every other question of intention. If it is found that it was the intention that the purchasers should be bound by the covenants inter se, a court of equity will, in favor of any one of the purchasers, insist upon the performance of the covenants by any other of them, and will do so under such circumstances without introducing the vendor into the matter. It is not necessary that there should be any covenant by the vendor in writing or otherwise, in express terms, that each purchaser would consider himself bound to the other purchasers.<sup>52</sup> The rule as to the enforceability of restrictive covenants by purchasers

In Mann v. Stephens, 15 Sim. 377, 10 Jur. 650, a vendor, upon the sale of part of his property, bound the remainder by a restrictive building covenant. It was held that a subsequent alienee of the vendee could enforce the covenant against a subsequent alienee of the vendor.

Evidence of a parol agreement by the common grantor of plaintiff's and defendant's lots, to the effect that no hotel should ever be built on the defendant's lot, is not competent to show a restrictive easement in the defendant's lot in favor of the plaintiff's lot, since such an easement cannot be created except by deed or by prescription, which presupposes a grant. Tibbetts v. Tibbetts, 66 N. H. 360, 20 Atl. 979.

Where, upon the conveyance of a parcel of land to the grantor's daughter, there was no agreement with her upon which she could base any right to enforce a building restriction subsequently placed upon his remaining land adjoining that conveyed to the daughter, it was held that she could not invoke the aid of equity to enforce such a restriction. That the whole of the property was not sold at once will not defeat the rights of purchasers to enforce the covenant between themselves. Lapse of time is a matter to be taken into consideration, but it is not a bar. Ibid.

Restrictive covenants may be enforced between purchasers, although the original vendor sold the whole of the tract. Re Birmingham & District Land Co. [1893] 1 Ch. 342. Stirling, J., said: "It is a question of fact [to be decided from all the circumstances of the case] whether the restrictions are merely matters of agreement between the vendor himself and his vendees, imposed for his own benefit and protection; or are meant by him and understood by the buyers, to be for the common advantage of the several purchasers." The contention was that, the vendor having retained adjacent lands, restrictive provisions in the deeds to vendees of the smaller tract of land must be taken to have been introduced for the protection of the property held by them, instead of the remaining lands of the tract put up for sale. This was a case under the vendor and purchaser act of 1874, raising the question of the right of the purchaser of a part of a tract of land to have restrictive covenants similar to those in his deed inserted in the deeds of the lots of the remainder of the tract.

between themselves is applicable to a case where the vendor is really desirous of selling the whole of the property, though not of selling the whole at one and the same time.<sup>53</sup> And the facts that the restrictive conditions are different as regards different lots, and that there is more than one property put up for sale, and that some of the lots are free from conditions, that some of the lots were first put up for sale subject to conditions, and were afterwards sold free from conditions, will not prevent one purchaser, even though he has bought part of his land free from restrictions, from enforcing covenants as against another purchaser.<sup>54</sup>

b. Mutual covenants.

If the grantor and grantee mutually bind themselves to observe the restrictions, then the covenants or agreements are enforceable by the grantees of each,<sup>55</sup> whether they be prior or subsequent purchasers. So, it has been held that where the grantor covenants with the purchaser of one of several lots in a tract, that he will include certain building restrictions in deeds of the other lots, subsequent purchasers of such lots may enforce such restrictions against one of such grantees who violates them.<sup>56</sup> And where the vendors agreed that the vendee should secure to him, for the benefit of his lot, a certain right or easement of light in, and prospect over, a strip of land bordering on the street, the vendee at the same time stipulating with them to leave a strip of a lot purchased by him of the same width free from obstruction for the benefit of others who might build on the street, and the vendors afterwards sold a parcel of the tract of land to another, and inserted such a covenant in the deed, the subsequent vendee having notice of the agreement with the first vendee, it was held that the agreement was one enforceable in equity in favor of the vendee of the first parcel, against the vendee of the other. The court said it was one of the cases in which equity would charge the conscience of the grantee of the

<sup>54</sup> Collins v. Castle, supra. The vendors in this case put up for sale at auction part of a tract of land, one of the conditions of the sale as to some of the lots being that the purchasers were to enter into certain restrictive covenants with the vendors similar to restrictions imposed upon a part of the estate previously sold. Other lands were to be burdened with different restrictions, and some of the lots were to be sold free from restrictions. Afterwards, the unsold lots and another piece of land composing the rest of the estate were sold, some with building restrictions, and some without any restrictions as to building. It was held that the restrictions imposed were for the common benefit of the purchasers and enforceable between themselves.

<sup>55</sup> Where the covenants are mutual, there is no difficulty in dealing with the question. "Thus," said the court in Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54, "where the owner of a particular piece of land on which a row of houses is intended to be built executes a deed reciting that it has been laid out, and is intended to be dealt with in a particular manner, and declares that it shall be a general and indispensable condition of the sale of all or of any part of the land, that the several proprietors, for the time being, shall observe and abide by the several restrictions and stipulations therein contained, and that he, himself, will at all times observe the like restrictions and stipulations; and these restrictions and stipulations are also enforced by mutual covenants; although the question may afterwards arise between subsequent purchasers of different portions of the land, one of the subsequent lot owners will be bound, and another will be entitled to enforce the covenant."

A court of equity will restrain the violation of a covenant entered into by a grantee, restrictive of the lands conveyed, not only against the grantee covenantor, but against all subsequent purchasers with notice of the covenant, whether it runs with the land or not. There is, however, this distinction: The original grantor, in imposing the covenant upon the grantee, either may or may not bind himself. If he does not bind himself, then his grantee, having no right of action against him, cannot pursue any other grantee to whom he may subsequently convey the whole or part of the remaining lands. Leaver v. Gorman, 73 N. J. Eq. 129, 67 Atl. 111.

In Coles v. Sims, 5 DeG. M. & G. 1, 2 Eq. Rep. 951, 23 L. J. Ch. N. S. 258, 18 Jur. 683; 2 Week. Rep. 151, the rule was recognized that where the vendor and vendee bound themselves by mutual restrictive covenants, the grantee of the vendor may enforce the same against the grantee of the vendee having notice of the same.

It seems that an agreement between the vendor and vendee, to leave a plot of land open for the common advantage of both parties, would be enforceable by subsequent holders of the title of either party as between themselves. McLean v. McKay, L. R. 5 P. C. 327, 29 L. T. N. S. 352, 21 Week. Rep. 798.

land with an agreement relating to the land, although the agreement neither creates an easement nor runs with the land.<sup>57</sup> In a much-cited New York case, there were mutual building restriction covenants entered into between adjoining owners by which they bound themselves, their heirs and successors, and all persons who might thereafter become interested in the lands, to the observance thereof. The question in the case was whether a vendee of one of the original owners was bound by the restriction, and it was held that the restriction was enforceable against such vendee, the court recognizing the doctrine that the vendees of the other party would have been likewise bound by the reciprocal obligation. The court said that upon the breach of such a covenant it would be enforceable by the owner of the dominant tenement at the time of the violation of the covenant.<sup>58</sup>

And where the plaintiff and defendants each entered into restrictive building covenants with their common vendors, but in neither the conveyance to the plaintiff nor in that to the defendant did the vendors enter into any covenant that if they themselves built, they would observe these covenants, or that if they sold the land for building purposes, they would cause the purchasers to enter into similar covenants, the plaintiff's right to enforce the covenant was regarded as so doubtful that his bill was dismissed.<sup>59</sup>

Mutual restrictive covenants may be entered into by grantors and grantees, or by owners of different tracts or lots of land for their mutual benefit; and in the latter case it would seem that the same rule as to their enforceability by the subsequent owners of the property not parties thereto should prevail as in the former. It has been held that where the owners of different lots enter into a covenant for a building restriction, and it appears that the intention of the parties was that their respective promises should be for the benefit of the promisees as owners of the neighbor-

A land company, having opened up a tract of land, sold a lot, the deed containing the following provision: "It is mutually agreed by and between the parties hereto, as and for a part of the consideration heretofore mentioned, that the premises hereinbefore described are conveyed subject to the following covenants, conditions, and restrictions, which shall be binding upon the parties hereto, their heirs, successors, and assigns," etc. Among the covenants was one that the premises should be used for residential purposes only, and another that similar covenants and conditions and restrictions should be contained in all the conveyances of property in the tract. The lot was afterwards conveyed to the defendant by a deed without restrictions, the defendant having notice of the restrictions in plaintiff's deed, and the defendant began the erection of a church. An injunction was upheld. Hisey v. Eastminster Presby. Church, 130 Mo. App. 566, 109 S. W. 60.

<sup>58</sup> Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615. It was said that had the covenantees parted with their title, it might be questionable whether they could maintain the action. The right, it was said, exists for the benefit of the owners of the lands for the time being, and it may be waived or released by them; and the court thought that they would be the proper parties to bring the action.

In Raynor v. Lyon, 46 Hun, 227, the owner of a block of land cut it up into lots, and sold each lot subject to a covenant against the use of the same for the carrying on of any offensive trade. The question in the case was whether the subsequent owner of two of the lots could convey title free from the restriction, and it was held that he could not, notwithstanding that these lots had been conveyed back to the original owner without reserving such restrictions. It was held that the stipulations in the original deeds, while made with the original grantor, were manifestly for the benefit of whoever should become owners of the other portion of the block, and that it was not in the power of the original grantor to release the lots from the burden of this restriction.

The express language of a covenant to the original owners being "as well for their own use as for the use of each and all persons who may purchase or derive title through or from them to any part of the tracts of land laid down on the aforesaid map," being the map described in said deeds, and the further language of the covenants being that it shall "inure to the benefit of parties of the first part, and each of them, and of their grantees, who may at any time own any of the land laid down on said map, and may be enforced by any of them by action, injunction, or otherwise," it is enforceable by any of the owners of land thereon, upon the theory that there is a mutuality of covenant and construction which binds each, and gives to each the appropriate remedy. Coates v. Cullingford, 131 N. Y. Supp. 700.

ing land, and of the subsequent owners of such land, they are enforceable in equity by such subsequent owners, and it is not necessary that the owner himself should have been the promisee.<sup>60</sup>

Agreements relating to uniform building schemes really belong to this class of covenants or agreements. This, however, has been doubted in an English case, on the ground that mutuality cannot exist under certain circumstances, between prior and subsequent purchasers.<sup>61</sup> But the mutuality referred to is not the mutuality between prior and subsequent purchasers, but mutuality between the seller and his purchasers, which the purchasers may take advantage of through the reciprocal obligation of their vendor.

c. Building scheme.

The most familiar cases in which courts of equity have upheld the right of owners of land to enforce covenants to which they were not parties are those in which it has appeared that a general building scheme or plan for the development of a tract of property has been adopted, designed to make it more attractive for residential purposes by reason of certain restrictions to be imposed on each of the separate lots sold.<sup>62</sup> This forms an inducement to each purchaser to buy. It may be assumed that he pays an enhanced price for the property purchased. The agreement therefore enters into and becomes a part of the consideration. The buyer submits to a burden upon his own land,

In Kountze v. Helmuth, 67 Hun, 343, 22 N. Y. Supp. 204, the question was whether restrictive agreements were an encumbrance upon land, so that the vendor could not give a clear title. In this case tenants in common owning a block of land entered into a building restriction agreement, and afterwards the owners of the block entered into another agreement as to a uniform building line, it being agreed that the covenant should run with the land and be binding on all future owners, and that all deeds executed by the parties of any of the lots should be made subject to the conditions of the agreement. The court said that the covenants in each of the agreements constituted reciprocal easements, to which subsequent grantees became entitled, and by which they were bound.

<sup>61</sup> Elliston v. Reacher [1908] 2 Ch. 374. Parker, Judge, said that in his opinion the implication of mutual contract is not always a particularly satisfactory explanation of the equity arising out of purchasers under a building scheme as to an enforcement of restrictive covenants. That this may be satisfactory where all the lots are sold at auction at the same time, but that where the sales are private and at various intervals, the circumstances may, at the date of one or more of the sales, be such as to preclude the possibility of any actual contract. "For example," said he, "a prior purchaser may be dead or incapable of contracting at the time of a subsequent purchase, and in any event it is unlikely that the prior and subsequent purchasers are ever brought into personal relationship, and yet the equity may exist between them." He said that it was enough that a community of interests imports in equity a reciprocity of obligation, which is in fact contemplated by each at the time of his own purchase.

ing it out in streets, avenues, and lots, adopting some uniform settled building scheme regulating the number, location, size, or style of house, or the use to which the buildings or property may be put. De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388.

Restrictive covenants in deeds to grantees of a residential section of a city inure to the benefit of all the owners. Fete v. Foerstel, 159 Mo. App. 75, 139 S. W. 820.

If no uniform scheme of improvement is adopted when a tract is divided into lots and sold to various persons, the restrictions in the several deeds are not enforceable by the grantees as between themselves. Schubert v. Eastman Realty Co. 25 Ohio C. C. 336.

Where the defendant's grantor acquired title from the common grantor of all the property, in a certain lot subject to a building line restriction of which he had notice, it was held that the covenant was enforceable by an opposite owner acquiring title from the common grantor. Francis v. Ziering, 128 App. Div. 253, 112 N. Y. Supp. 647.

When an owner of a tract of land lays it out into streets and lots, and adopts a restrictive covenant with reference to the location and use of buildings to be erected on the lots, with a view to secure the defined conditions named in the covenant for the benefit of the entire tract which he seeks to develop, and inserts the covenant in all deeds as a part of the defined scheme, and as an exaction from all purchasers for the benefit of each purchaser, the equitable right to enforcement of the covenant inures to each purchaser irrespective of the time of his purchase. Bowen v. Simth, 76 N. J. Eq. 456, 74 Atl. 675.

If building restriction covenants were intended solely for the benefit of the grantor, subsequent grantees of the original grantee cannot take advantage of them; but if they were intended for the common advantage of all persons purchasing lots from the original grantee, such purchasers and their assigns may enforce them inter sese for their own benefit. Peabody Heights Co. v. Willson, 82 Md. 186, 36 L.R.A. 393, 32 Atl. 386, 1077.

because of the fact that a like burden imposed on his neighbor's lot will be beneficial to both lots. The covenant or agreement between the original owner and each purchaser is therefore mutual.<sup>63</sup> Under such circumstances the question of priority of purchase does not affect the right, as between the different owners of the separate portions of the tract sold, to enforce the agreement as between themselves. Cases in this country and England therefore uphold the doctrine that,

A building association having adopted a plan to maintain a uniform system of building and improvement, and inserted restrictive building covenants in its deeds, for the purpose of carrying out such plan, it was held that one lot owner could enforce such covenant against an adjoining lot owner. Newbery v. Barkalow, 75 N. J. Eq. 128, 71 Atl. 752.

Where a tract of land is subdivided into lots, and these lots are conveyed to separate purchasers subject to conditions that are to operate as inducements to the purchase, and to give to each purchaser the benefit of a general plan of building or occupation, so that each shall have attached to his own lot a right in the nature of an easement or incorporeal hereditament in the lots of the others, a right is thereby acquired by each grantee which he may enforce against any other grantee. Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381.

The initial inquiry in every such case is whether the building restriction sought to be enforced was imposed upon the lot owned by the defendant for the benefit of the lot owned by the plaintiff. If this inquiry is answered in the negative, all other questions must be laid out in view. Coughlin v. Barker, 46 Mo. App. 54.

The equity would seem to spring from the presumption that each purchaser has paid an enhanced price for his property, relying on the general plan by which all property is to be subjected to the restricted use being carried out, and that, while he is bound by and observes the covenant, it would be inequitable of him to allow any other owner of lands subject to the same restrictions to violate it. De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. supra.

although the legal title be absolute and unrestricted, yet the owner may, by parol contract with the purchasers of successive parcels in respect to the manner of its improvement and occupation, affect the remaining parcels with an equity requiring them also to be occupied in conformity to the general plan, which is binding upon a subsequent purchaser with notice.<sup>64</sup>

subsequent grantee against a prior grantee, as well as in favor of a prior grantee against a subsequent grantee; but it is unnecessary in this case to examine or decide that question."

Where there has been an actual execution of a plan and common understanding with reference to the establishment of a building line for the improvement of a street, and it has been exactly conformed to and observed in good faith for many years, large investments having been made by the lot owners in reference thereto, the rights of all of the owners should be regarded as being as clear and certain as their legal rights would have been, if all had covenanted with each other before any building was erected, that such plan should be conformed to in building. Maxwell v. East River Bank, 3 Bosw. 124.

In Spicer v. Martin, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 12, Lord Macnaghten said, obiter: "If the site of the houses now known as Cromwell Gardens had been put up for sale by auction, in building lots according to a plan, . . . and if the conditions of sale had prescribed that houses should be built such as those which have actually been erected, and that every purchaser should bind himself by a covenant in the terms of the restrictive covenant now in question, no one, I think, could have doubted that each purchaser would, as against the vendor, and as against every copurchaser, have had a right to the benefit of the covenant, although there might have been no direct stipulation to that effect, and no express provision for mutual covenants by the purchasers inter se."

In McDougall v. Schneider, 134 App. Div. 208, 118 N. Y. Supp. 861, the owner of a large tract of land divided into blocks and lots, and caused a map of it to be recorded, printed copies of the map containing these words: "This property when sold is restricted, that making it a first-class residential locality." He thereafter sold the entire tract in separate parcels to various persons, each of the deeds, except those on a certain avenue, containing uniform restrictions, and providing that the covenants should run with the land until a certain date. It was held that the covenants were entered into with a design to carry out a general scheme for the improvements or development of the property, because of the statement contained in the printed copies of the maps, and because of express pro-

Club House Co. Case,<sup>65</sup> which is the leading authority on the question in this country, the equity in this particular class of actions is dependent as much on the existence of the general scheme of improvement or development, as on the covenant,—a very important consideration in a case in which the question arises whether certain acts are in violation of the covenant, if any ambiguity exists as to its scope and meaning. And, as before stated, courts of equity, in relation to restrictions which contemplate a general building plan for the common benefit of purchasers of lots, recognize and enforce them at the instance of the original grantor or subsequent purchaser of lots, on grounds independent of legal liability.<sup>66</sup>

The rule laid down for such cases in the leading case just referred to<sup>67</sup> is that where there is a general scheme or plan adopted and made public by the owner of a tract, for the development and improvement of the property, by which it is divided into streets, avenues, and lots, and which contemplates a restriction as to the uses to which buildings or lots may be put, to be secured by a covenant embodying the restriction, to be inserted in each deed to a purchaser; and it appears by writings or by the circumstances that such covenants are intended for the benefit of all the lands, and that each purchaser is to be subject thereto, and to have the benefit thereof; and the covenants are actually inserted in all the deeds for lots sold in pursuance of the plan,—one purchaser and his assigns may enforce the covenant against any other purchaser and his assigns, if he has bought with knowledge of the scheme, and the covenant was part of the subject-matter of his purchase.<sup>68</sup> But in order that one purchaser may enforce a restrictive covenant against another, on the theory that the parcel granted was sold according to a scheme or plan, there must have been a definite scheme adopted by the vendors, that each lot should be subjected to the covenants sought to be enforced.<sup>69</sup>

In considering the effect of the existence of a building plan or general scheme of development upon the rights of the parties, it must be borne in mind that the problem presented is: What was the intention of the parties? This is ascertained by the evidence presented. The plan or scheme furnishes evidence of this intention. As was said by Collins, L. J., in an English case:<sup>70</sup> "Where a vendor sells land and retains other land, and imposes on the purchaser a covenant, it becomes a question of fact what visions in each deed making the covenants applicable to all of the property shown on the map, whether they were included in the particular conveyance or not, and because of the declaration with reference to the continuance of the covenant. It was also held that the covenant could be enforced by any of the owners of the land shown on the map, upon the theory that there was a mutuality of covenants and consideration which bound each and gave to each the appropriate remedy.

Where the grantor conveyed land bounded on a strip of land intended for street purposes, and covenanted among other things that the grantee should have the benefit of the grantor's interest on condemnation, it was held that the covenant ran with the land, and that the grantee's heirs were entitled to the entire condemnation money when the strip was appropriated by a city for street purposes. Cincinnati v. Springer, 23 Ohio L. J. 250.

When restrictions inserted in a deed of a particular lot are part of a general scheme for the benefit and improvement of all the lands included in the larger tract, a grantee of any part of the land may, under proper circumstances, enforce them against his neighbor. Jackson v. Stevenson, 156 Mass. 496, 32 Am. St. Rep. 476, 31 N. E. 691.

In Mackenzie v. Childers, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 265, the matter was stated like this: "The question in this case is simply whether the vendors of land laid out upon a building scheme have covenanted or agreed, expressly or by implication, with the plaintiffs, who are purchasers of part of the land under that scheme, not to authorize other purchasers to use the rest of the land in violation of the building scheme. If they have so contracted, either by negative words or by affirmative words which imply a negative, there is no doubt the court would restrain them from breaking such contract."

the effect of that covenant is. That being a question of fact, it must be decided in the light of evidence, as are all other questions of fact. But if you find that a building scheme exists, proof of that building scheme may be given. It is only a matter of evidence, and it is perfectly competent to prove by other evidence, if you can find it, whether or not the building scheme applies. So, it has been held that it is not necessary that there should have been a general plan in order to make such agreements enforceable between subsequent grantees.<sup>71</sup> The court said that it is not because a plan is deranged that the court interferes, but because rights are invaded, or about to be; and this fact may exist in the plan of two lots as well as in one of two hundred. The plan often furnishes the proof of the terms on which the sales were made; but the fact of the alleged terms is as effective when proved by a single deed, as when proved by a plan.

The plan furnishes a very strong inference that it was the intention to make the restrictions specified mutually binding on each purchaser of a lot in the plot included therein,<sup>72</sup> but it is not necessarily conclusive. If, from all the evidence,—the map, the advertisements, the covenants in the deeds themselves,—the uniform scheme of development or improvement is proved to have been the intention of the parties, equity will carry it out at the suit of any of the lot holders, provided, of course, he has not by his own conduct shut the doors of the court. So, where the owner of a tract of land sold a part of it to one person, the vendor binding the land retained by certain restrictions, and thereafter sold a part of the remaining land to another, imposing certain restrictions as to the sale of liquors and to the carrying on of manufacturing, and there were no corresponding covenants by the vendor as to the remainder of the estate, nor any reference to any building scheme, and the vendor afterwards conveyed two other parts of the estate to others, and then put up the remainder at auction by sale plan, the plan referring to the part of the estate previously sold, the stipulations of the sale providing among other things that no building which might be erected on any lot should be used for the sale of beer, wine, or spirits, it was held that the assignees of purchasers at the auction could enforce the restriction as to the sale of liquors in a deed to a second purchaser, on the theory that the latter bought under a building scheme affecting the whole estate, all the sales, both those before and at the auction, being part of one transaction.<sup>73</sup> And in a case in which a vendor desiring to build a row of houses in the

More frequently a purpose to make the restriction reciprocal and binding upon all persons who should buy lots in the vicinity, from the vendor, is inferred from the circumstance that a building plan had been devised and declared by him on a recorded plat of a tract, or publicly announced when lots in the tract were sold at auction, or made known to a private buyer. Doerr v. Cobbs, 146 Mo. App. 342, 123 S. W. 547.

<sup>72</sup> Where the grantors of a tract of land, by uniting in a scheme or joint enterprise for the division of the estate into lots or parcels on a street or court laid out by them, and by annexing to the conveyance of each lot a restriction on its use, by the observance of which each parcel would be occupied for a similar purpose with every other, the legal inference is, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the intention was to secure the specific mode in which the adjoining premises were to be improved and occupied, and the effect of such a restriction is to confer on each owner a right or interest, in the nature of a servitude, in all lots situated on the same street which were conveyed subject to the restriction. Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 341, 83 Am. Dec. 632.

Questions as to the right of persons not parties to covenants and agreements of this character, to enforce them, have arisen under various conditions. In some cases there has been the general plan or scheme, where 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

each party has bought with reference to the general plan, and the agreement entered into the purchase of each piece of property, and in such cases the agreement has been enforced between grantees. Where land is sold in lots or parcels, and agreements are made with each purchaser creating a building line, the inference is that the agreement was intended for the common benefit of all the purchasers. That intention is manifested by the character of the transaction, and each may enforce the restrictive agreement against the others. Hays v. St. Paul M. E. Church, 196 Ill. 633, 32 N. E. 1040.

A building and trade restriction in the original deed, put in all subsequent deeds to purchasers of lots in a tract of land, which deeds were made subject to such restriction, is sufficient evidence of the general scheme for the improvement and benefit of all of the lands included in the tract, and this gives the grantee of any part of the land the right to enforce the restriction against his neighbor. Tobey v. Moore, 130 Mass. 451.

Where a corporation owning a tract of land caused the same to be divided into lots, streets, avenues, and parks, and agreed to a plan to be placed on the market for sale, in the form of a deed prepared by the company and used by it in the conveyance of each of such lots, each lot being restricted to use for residential purposes, it was shape of a crescent, and wishing to secure uniformity in the buildings, expressly declared "that it should be a general and indispensable condition of the sale of all or any part of the land intended to form the row, that the several proprietors of such land, respectively, for the time being, should observe and abide by the several stipulations and restrictions thereafter contained or expressed in regard to the several houses to be erected thereon, and in all other particulars;" and then mutually covenanted with intending purchasers with reference to certain building restrictions for the purpose of effectuating, establishing, and rendering perpetual the plan designed; and the purpose aforesaid, the restriction as to the use of the property, was enforced in favor of the purchaser of one of the lots against another.<sup>74</sup> And where the owner of a tract of land opens a street and avenue, as well as lots on each side of the street, inserting

a building restriction in each of the deeds for the benefit of the property, it was said that such restrictive covenant will be enforced in equity, not only against the original grantee, but also against all subsequent purchasers with notice, in favor of the original grantor with whom it was made, and all subsequent purchasers of the lots to be benefited by it.<sup>75</sup>

But it was held that a general plan for the development of a tract of land was not shown where there was no map of the lots showing the restriction sought to be enforced, and no proof of any action of the common grantor indicating a decision on his part to develop the land on a uniform plan, of which the covenant in the deed by the common grantor to the defendant's predecessor in title formed a part,<sup>76</sup> and that a general scheme or understanding that all lands platted in a tract should be sold for residential purposes is not shown where held that the restrictions were inserted for the benefit of purchasers who took deeds subject to these conditions and restrictions, and for the benefit of all the grantees of such purchasers, and that therefore the restrictions could be enforced in equity by and against such grantees. Hopkins v. Smith, 162 Mass. 444, 38 N. E. 1122.

Where a city divided a tract of land which it owned into a number of building lots, according to a recorded plan, and sold two of the lots to grantors of the plaintiff and defendant, each of the deeds containing, among other restrictions, certain restrictions with reference to buildings, and the city at other times conveyed away all of the remaining lots shown on the plan for the general improvement of the neighborhood and for the benefit of all purchasers of the lots, it was held that the restriction was enforceable in equity by one of the purchasers against the other. Hamlen v. Werner, 144 Mass. 396, 11 N. E. 684.

Building line covenants made for the benefit of land laying on both sides of the street are enforceable by the owners of any of the lots for the benefit of which the covenants were made. Bradley v. Walker, 27 Jones & S. 334, 14 N. Y. Supp. 315.

Where the defendant's predecessor in title bound himself to the observance of a building restriction, as part of a building scheme, for the benefit of each estate affected by it, the agreement is enforceable by the grantee of a part of the land entitled to the benefit. Payson v. Burnham, 141 Mass. 556, 6 N. E. 708.

In St. Andrews's Lutheran Church's Appeal, 67 Pa. 512, a covenant between the grantor and grantee upon a sale of contiguous lots, that such lots should be subject to the restriction that none of them should be used for purposes other than a dwelling house, etc., was enforced in favor of the owner of one of the lots against the owner of another attempting to build a church thereon.

The fact that the same restrictions were imposed upon a number of lots is not sufficient in itself to show that there was any general plan of improvement. Haines v. Einwachter, — N. J. Eq. —, 55 Atl. 38.

In the absence of proof of a general plan or scheme for the improvement of property, a restrictive covenant made by the former owner cannot be enforced by the subsequent grantee of the covenantee. Ibid.

Where a proprietor laid out a tract of land into a number of building lots, it was held that a general scheme or plan to convey the lots subject to certain restrictions was not shown where several of the deeds contained no restrictions, and where no two of the deeds contained the same restrictions. Clark v. McGee, 159 Ill. 518, 42 N. E. 965.

Sheppard v. Gilmore, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 6, 57 L. T. N. S. 614. A restrictive covenant not to alter the front of a house was said not to be enforceable by the purchaser of another house in the same row, on the theory that the houses were erected in accordance with a certain plan. It was urged that the plaintiff and each purchaser of a house in the block signed the same plan, and the court said that if that had been proved, it would indeed have gone a long way, even if it would not have been entirely conclusive as to the question whether the restrictive covenants were intended to be for the benefit of the purchasers; or simply for the benefit of the vendor. But the plan was not offered in evidence, and there was no plan referred to in any of the deeds put in evidence, and the court could not infer that it was the same plan to which each purchaser referred in the covenant into which he entered.

The facts that a plan of a tract of land was prepared by the vendors chiefly for the

the plat itself attached to the dedication deed indicates nothing but a division of the land into lots, upon which land is a dedicated street and park, the dedication deed itself containing no allusion to such restriction, and the method of selling the land not showing uniformity in the matter of restriction.<sup>77</sup> Likewise, in a Missouri case, where the plaintiff was endeavoring to enforce a building restriction against the owner of another lot on the same tract, and the deed by which the plaintiff held contained such a restriction, but it did not appear that it made any reference to any similar building restriction in any other deed from the common grantor, or that the deed under which the defendant claimed, or any other deed of the common grantor containing similar restrictions, referred to the fact that similar restrictions had been imposed upon the grantees of other parcels, it was held that the deed failed to afford intrinsic evidence of the general scheme of improvement, and the fact that grants were made of intervening parcels, by deeds containing no such restrictions, was held to negative the conclusion that there was, at the time when the deed under which the defendant claimed was made by the common grantor, such an established or matured scheme.<sup>78</sup>

Uniformity in the restrictions imposed on the lots sold is one of the strongest proofs of the existence of a building scheme. Consequently, any deviation as to restrictions imposed on any of the grantees is at once purpose of being submitted to a sanitary authority, in order to obtain its consent to the laying out of an estate, and that the solicitor of the grantors had, for his own purposes, a smaller portion of the plan hanging up in his office, indicating generally that houses were to be erected on each plot except one, and that he had a printed form of conditions for his own convenience, are not sufficient to show a general building scheme, within the rule that such a scheme affords purchasers, as between themselves, the right to enforce restrictive covenants, where the sales were not at public auction, or where the plots were not put up together as a whole, or offered simultaneously to the public, and there were no printed conditions, and no conditions of any kind were circulated amongst the public or amongst the subsequent purchasers of different lots, which were held out or treated as applicable to the whole estate, and there were no representations of any kind on the part of the vendors to any purchaser, that the estate or the buildings marked out on the plan was, or were, to be bound by any conditions. Tucker v. Vowles [1893] 1 Ch. 195, 62 N. J. Ch. N. S. 172, 3 Reports, 107, 67 L. T. N. S. 763, 41 Week. Rep. 156.

Where an improvement company sold several parcels of land, the deed containing a restriction as to building and the use of the property, and the purchaser afterwards sold one parcel to another person with the same restriction, and the purchaser objected to the title on the ground that the premises would be subject to the restriction, it was held that the title was free from the encumbrance, the improvement company having conveyed other lots on the same tract to other purchasers without restriction, the lots not having sold pursuant to a general scheme for the improvement of the land, and there being nothing to show that the land retained was to be subject to any easement, so as to make the restriction enforceable by subsequent purchasers between themselves, and it appearing from other facts that none of the grantors through whom the title ran could enforce the restriction. Foreman v. Sadler, 114 Md. 574, 80 Atl. 298.

Where the commonwealth was the owner of a large tract of land, and divided it up into lots, and prepared a plan of the tract, and adopted a general form of deeds to be given to all purchasers, but there was no uniformity in the deeds actually given, and it assumed the right of changing the conditions and restriction in the deeds to different purchasers, and in many of its deeds it had inserted a form of restriction which permitted the purchaser to erect private stables, it was held that a restriction in one of the lot owner's deeds, that no building erected on the premises should be used as a stable, could not be enforced by another lot owner having such a restriction in his deed, it appearing that most of the lots on a certain street, including those of the parties to the suit, were sold by the commonwealth at public auction at different times, and that prior to such sale a catalogue describing the lots were published containing a note stating that it was understood that the commonwealth would not enforce the stipulation and agreement of the deed that buildings erected should not in any event be used as a stable. Beals v. Case, 138 Mass. 138.

Where the common grantor was at the time the owner of all the land on either side of a street between certain limits, and at the date of the plaintiff's deed had sold nearly all of it, it was held that no general building scheme was shown where four of the conveyances contained no restrictions whatever. McNichol v. Townsend, 73 N. J. Eq. 276, 67 Atl. 938.

A general plan or scheme for the benefit of all purchasers of lots on the same street, as shown by a recorded plat, does not appear from the fact that most of the lots are sold subject to the same restrictions as to the building line, where no restrictions are shown by the plat, and none are imposed on some of the lots first sold, while purchasers of some of the other lots have violated the restrictions upon them, and such vio-

seized upon as a defense to an action to enforce the covenants or agreements, on the theory that a general plan of improvement is not shown. There may, however, be departures from the usual restrictions in individual cases, without destroying the integrity of the scheme of development as a whole. So it has been held that the fact that a portion of the conveyance does not contain the restrictions contemplated in the general plan will not defeat the same. Although some of the lots may have written restrictions imposed upon them, and others not, if the general plan has been maintained from its inception, if it has been understood and relied on and acted upon by all in interest, it is binding and enforceable on all inter se.<sup>79</sup>

And it has been held that a general building scheme does not necessarily fail where it was the original plan to exclude everything from the lots sold except residences, because the owner has sold some of the lots without restrictions, the lots having passed into the hands of persons who have continued to observe the original provisions.<sup>80</sup> The fact, however, that a particular lot or portion of the tract sold may be unfit for the particular use to which it is restricted, has been held to be no reason why the restriction should not be enforced at the suit of another lot holder.<sup>81</sup>

It is no doubt possible that a general building scheme may be negated by particular words or clauses in the agreements or covenants, or by special reservations indicating a contrary intention; but it would seem that the intention to negative should be clear. Where the intention of the owners of a plot of land was otherwise clear, that, so far as the various lots of the tract were sold subject to common restrictions, such restrictions should inure to the benefit of all the lots so sold, it was held that this intention was not negated by the fact that the vendors reserved the power of sanctioning a hotel, tavern, public house, or manufactory on any lot, provided that, as to any portion of the estate not disposed of by the vendors, they reserve the power to deal with the same without reference to and independently of the restrictions.<sup>82</sup> lations have not been resisted by other purchasers. Summers v. Beeler, 90 Md. 474, 48 L.R.A. 54, 78 Am. St. Rep. 446, 45 Atl. 19.

Where a parcel of land is conveyed subject to a building restriction, and there is nothing to show that the restriction was part of a general plan for the benefit of land thereby granted, or other property on the same street, or was inserted for the benefit of the grantee or his assignees, or was repeated in any grant or covenant executed by subsequent grantees of subdivisions of the same lot, or either of them, the subsequent purchasers have no more right in equity than in law to enforce restrictions between themselves. Dana v. Wentworth, 111 Mass. 291.

In Morrow v. Hasselman, 69 N. J. Eq. 612, 61 Atl. 369, the complainant and defendant held title under conveyance from a land company, each to a lot forming part of a large tract laid out in streets and avenues for the purpose of sale and improvement, which imposed certain building restrictions. It was held that the complainant could enforce restrictions against the defendant, although the building line restriction on the street on which complainant's and defendant's property was located was varied in the case of one lot, made necessary by its situation with reference to property not owned by the company, and although different building lines were adopted on different avenues.

Where the building line established by the covenant was 20 feet from the street, the fact that the corner lot was conveyed with the restriction to only 10 feet does not militate against the view that the restrictions raised 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) in the deeds were in pursuance of a general scheme or improvement of the property. Coates v. Cullingford, 131 N. Y. Supp. 700.

That the restrictions as to the corner lots of a tract of land differ somewhat from the restrictions as to the other lots on the tract will not prevent their enforcement by lot owners as between themselves, on the theory that the restrictions are not uniform. Isham v. Matchett, 18 Ohio C. C. 338, 10 Ohio C. D. 267.

In Mackenzie v. Childers, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 265, a building scheme had been carefully elaborated and embodied in an estate plan, the deeds to the purchasers reciting that some purchasers had already bought lots according to this scheme, and that "it is intended" not only that the actual purchasers should execute it, but that it should "be a part of all future contracts for sale

An action to enforce the restrictions is not, of course, maintainable between purchasers not parties, if it appears that the original plan has been abandoned without dissent, or the character of the neighborhood has so changed as to defeat the purpose of the covenant, and thus render its enforcement unreasonable;<sup>83</sup> but the effect of such circumstances on the right to enforce the restrictions is not considered in this note.

When it is considered that for years the common method of developing a tract of land is by the adoption of a general plan or scheme of improvement, and the imposition of uniform restrictions on the lots purchased, to render it effective, the fact that so few cases comparatively have been before the courts shows how beneficial they have been considered, what little friction they have caused, and how well disposed most property holders are to observe their solemn undertakings.

of the said plots or parcels of land respectively, that the several purchasers should execute this deed, and should thereby be severally, and respectively bound by all the stipulations hereinafter contained." It was held that the use of the words "it is intended" did not indicate that this was the intention of the vendors at the time, and that they were at liberty to change when they chose, but that they were bound to observe the restrictions agreed upon.

Where the only land of the grantor, for the benefit of which a restrictive building clause was inserted in the deed, was property subsequently conveyed to the complainant, it was held that the provision that the restriction should not be violated without the consent of the grantor "or her heirs" did not show that the covenant was a personal one, but that it was one that passed with the land, and was enforceable by the subsequent grantee. Hemsley v. Marlborough House Co. 68 N. J. Eq. 596, 61 Atl. 455.

Where the general plan of the owner of a tract of land which he divided up into lots was to restrict it to use for residential purposes, it was held that the fact that before the plan was drawn up he had sold two of the lots without restrictions, and that as to two of the other lots the restrictions were modified, because they were not well adapted for residential purposes, would not destroy the inference that the restrictions were imposed on each lot for the benefit of all the others, and that they were part of the general scheme for the improvement of the whole property, and the agreement is therefore enforceable by the several grantees. Hano v. Bigelow, 155 Mass. 341, 29 N. E. 628.

V. Effect of priority of purchase.

Where one lot owner, not a party to a restrictive covenant or agreement, seeks to enforce it against another, the fact of the relative time at which each acquired his title becomes important under some circumstances. The rules applicable to that class of cases in which the vendor parts with a portion of his property subject to restrictions in favor of the land retained by him have been discussed, but the doctrine that a purchaser who buys a part of the dominant estate may enforce the restriction necessarily applies to subsequent purchasers. Where one buys land subject to restrictions, and afterwards another purchases land from the same grantor, subject to the same restrictions, the first vendee, if he seeks to enforce the restrictions against the second vendee, must proceed on a different theory, because it cannot be said that the restrictions in a later deed were an inducement to the prior purchase.<sup>84</sup> Nor could there have been granted to him any interest in fit by the restrictive covenant to enforce it against the prior purchaser who made it, and against the assignees with notice of it, does not work inversely to support the claim of a prior purchaser from the original owner, to enforce the restriction imposed by the latter upon the lot subsequently conveyed, and in which he had no interest. Roberts v. Scull, 58 N. J. Eq. 396, 43 Atl. 583.

While a subsequent purchaser or his assignees may enforce a restriction of the common covenant against a prior purchaser or his assigns, if made for the benefit of land embracing his lot, this rule gives no right of action to a prior against a subsequent purchaser. "Some other reason must exist," said the court in De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co. 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388, "for that class of cases which hold that purchasers and their assigns are entitled to enforce between themselves a restrictive covenant entered into by first purchasers with a common vendor, without reference to priorities of title."

The right of the owner of a lot to enforce a covenant to which he was not a party or assign, restrictive of the use of other lands, is dependent on the covenant having been made for the benefit of such lands. "Obviously," said the court in Mulligan v. Jordan, 50 N. J. Eq. 363, 24 Atl. 543, "while a subsequent purchaser might, by the operation of this rule, acquire a right of action against a prior purchaser, the prior purchaser would acquire no rights from a covenant entered into by a subsequent purchaser, unless there exists some condition which will entitle him to the benefit of such covenant. The right of grantees from the common grantor to enforce, inter se, covenants entered into by each with said grantor, is confined to cases where there has been proof of a general plan or scheme for the

the covenant in the later deed.<sup>85</sup> In order to entitle the prior purchaser to enforce the restriction, he must show some agreement on the part of the vendor to hold the rest of the land, including the defendant's, subject to the same restrictions.<sup>86</sup> So it was held that where the owner of a block of land and the vendees of various lots entered into mutual covenants against the carrying on of any business on the property sold, offensive to the neighboring inhabitants, the covenants were for the mutual benefit of all the purchasers of the lots in the block, and a prior purchaser of one of the lots could enforce a covenant in equity against a subsequent purchaser of another. The fact that the plaintiffs did not stand in the position of assignees of the covenant, and could not sue at law for its breach, was held immaterial.<sup>87</sup> That the same restrictive covenant is improvement of the property and its consequent benefit, and the covenant has been entered into as part of a general plan to be exacted from all purchasers, and to be for the benefit of each purchaser, and the party has bought with reference to such general plan or scheme, and the covenant has entered into the consideration of his purchase."

The same reasoning does not obtain as widely in favor of permitting a senior grantee of one lot to insist on a restrictive covenant inserted in a later conveyance of another lot, inasmuch as the covenant to be enforced was not in existence when the senior grantee bought, and the presumption that he bought in reliance on its protection does not arise naturally. In such an instance it must appear in some manner from the deed to the senior grantee, or dehors said deed, that the vendor intended the covenants to bind himself and those who thereafter should derive title from him to property in proximity to the complainant's. Doerr v. Cobbs, 146 Mo. App. 342, 123 S. W. 547.

"A difference in principle can be discerned between the case of a grantee holding premises under a subsequent conveyance from the common source of title, and seeking to enforce a covenant restricting the use of near-by premises, contained in a deed of prior date, from the case of a man who, holding title under a prior grant, seeks to enforce a covenant contained in a deed later than the one under which he claims. The junior grant is supposed to have been made for a consideration enhanced by the circumstance that the use in obnoxious ways of property adjacent to, or in the neighborhood of, that conveyed, had been restrained in previous conveyances. . . . And, as no injustice to the former purchaser will be occasioned by holding him to the observance of the restriction in his deed, it is reasonable to allow any property owner who bought later from the same vendor, and who will be damaged by a breach of the restriction, to restrain a breach." Ibid.

A building restriction in a deed will not inure to the benefit of a prior grantee of another lot in the same tract, which is conveyed subject to the same restriction, when the grantor did not impose any servitude on the land he retained, and the restrictions were not part of the general plan or scheme for the benefit of all purchasers. Summers v. Beeler, 90 Md. 474, 48 L.R.A. 54, 78 Am. St. Rep. 446, 45 Atl. 19.

a restrictive covenant in defendant's deed, acquires title from the common source of title prior to the defendant, the covenant will be treated as inuring for the benefit of the grantor only, unless it appear either from the covenant in the deed by which the grantor parted with title to the defendant's lot, or other extraneous facts, that the restriction was imposed on the defendant's property for the benefit of persons holding lots under prior conveyances. Doerr v. Cobbs, 146 Mo. App. 342, 123 S. W. 547. The principle, said the court, is this, that, as the common source of title conveyed plaintiff's property prior to that conveyed to the defendant, there could not have been assigned also with the lot of the plaintiff any interest in the restrictive covenant inserted in the subsequent conveyance of defendant's lot.

<sup>86</sup> Where the complainant's deed is prior to that of the defendant, and there is no covenant to the complainant from the grantor that the latter holds the remainder of the property subject to the same restriction, or that he will exact similar covenants from the purchasers of the remaining property, and the complainant is not the express assign of the defendant's covenant, and there is no covenant between the complainant and defendant, the complainant cannot enforce the covenant, in the absence of anything to show that the covenant was entered into for the benefit of the complainant's property. Mulligan v. Jordan, 50 N. J. Eq. 363, 24 Atl. 543.

Where similar restrictions are not inserted in all of the deeds of a tract of land divided up and sold in separate parcels, the owners of one of the lots may enforce the restrictions in his neighbor's deed, where the plaintiff is a subsequent purchaser. Isham v. Matchett, 18 Ohio C. C. 338, 10 Ohio C. D. 267.

The owner of a block divided into a number of lots, having inserted in each of the deeds a covenant against the carrying on of any offensive trade, the object being to protect the whole tract and every lot belonging to it, whether in the hands of the original owners or of subsequent grantees, it was held that the fact that the plaintiff's conveyance was prior to that of the defendant would not deprive him of the right to enforce the covenant. Brouwer v. Jones, 23 Barb. 153. The court said that every such covenant in every deed given by the grantors was intended not only for their benefit, but also for that of every other prior, as well as incorporated in each deed the common grantor made conveying any portion of the property is not, however, sufficient evidence of the covenant having been entered into for the benefit of the lands conveyed to a prior purchaser, so as to enable him to enforce the covenant against a subsequent purchaser.<sup>88</sup>

The most common form of covenants or agreements which may be taken advantage of by prior purchasers are those entered into in pursuance of a uniform building plan or scheme of development of a tract of land.<sup>89</sup> If the owner adopts such a plan, and promulgates it, all purchasers may take advantage of the restrictions, but although the former owners of a tract of land may have had in mind a scheme of improvement, if they did not make it public, and, in conveying a portion of the land, imposed no restrictions upon themselves, the question whether the grantees of different lots containing similar restrictions can enforce them as between themselves depends upon the relative dates of their titles. If the complainant's title is subsequent to that of the defendant, he may enforce the restriction, since it would evidently be intended for the benefit of remaining land.<sup>90</sup>

VI. Restrictive covenants as easements.

In some jurisdictions the rights created by covenants restrictive of the use of land every subsequent, grantee, and created an easement in behalf of the whole property.

One who holds a title derived from an earlier deed cannot maintain a suit to restrain the violation of a covenant in a later deed conveying land in the vicinity of that first conveyed, simply because there is a restrictive covenant in the later deed and its violation will affect the enjoyment of the former's property. Doerr v. Cobbs, 146 Mo. App. 342, 123 S. W. 547.

A building restriction covenant running to the common grantor only is not enforceable by a prior purchaser of lots, against a subsequent purchaser of lots in the same block, the deeds being wholly silent as to any uniform plan of improvement, there being no mutual covenant to bind the grantor, and the circumstances showing that no uniform plan of restriction was established. Equitable Life Assurance Soc. v. Brennan, 148 N. Y. 661, 43 N. E. 173, reversing 74 Hun, 576, 26 N. Y. Supp. 600.

are considered to be in the nature of easements. It has been held in Illinois that where a tract of land is subdivided into lots, and these lots are conveyed to separate purchasers subject to conditions that are of a nature to operate as inducements to the purchasers, and to give each purchaser the benefit of the general plan of building or occupation, so that each shall have attached to his own lot a right in the nature of an easement or incorporeal hereditament in the lots of the others, a right is thereby acquired by each grantee, which he may enforce against any other grantee.<sup>91</sup> And it has been held in Massachusetts that a reservation that no building be constructed on the parcel of land conveyed creates an easement, or servitude in the nature of an easement, upon the land conveyed, and if this easement was created for the benefit of the land reserved by the grantor, and not for the personal convenience of the grantor, and was intended to be annexed to such lot, it will be held appurtenant thereto, and will pass to a grantee of the original owner.<sup>92</sup> In Michigan it has been said that restrictions limiting the use of land to residential purposes, for the benefit of the entire tract, are in the nature of reciprocal negative easements, and may be created on the division and conveyance in severalty to different grantees of an entire tract.<sup>93</sup> The New York cases proceed on the theory of easement.<sup>94</sup> In a Pennsylvania case, a common grantor conveyed three adjoining lots, a personal right, or is to be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate, must be determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reservation creating the easement, aided, if necessary, by the situation of the property and the surrounding circumstances. Ibid.

<sup>94</sup> In Gibert v. Peteler, 38 N. Y. 165, 97 Am. Dec. 785, affirming 38 Barb. 488, it is said that no principle is better established now, than that, even under a mere covenant in a deed providing against certain constructions which may be obnoxious or offensive to neighboring inhabitants, on the breach of the covenant; those who have suffered from it, though not parties to the deed, would be afforded relief in equity. Of course, they could not sue at common law on the covenant; yet, as the covenant was intended for their benefit, it will be deemed to have given them an easement in the land, and a court of equity will interpose to give them relief, by injunction, against its infraction.

In Columbia College v. Lynch, 70 N. Y. 440, 26 Am. Rep. 615, where mutual covenants by owners of lands forbidding their use for business purposes, etc., were entered into, it was said: "The right sought to be enforced here is an easement, or, as it is sometimes called, an amenity, and consists the deed to the center one containing a building restriction, the covenant being that the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall not, nor will at any time thereafter, erect, etc. The deeds to the other land made no reference in express terms to this restriction, but the lots conveyed were described in part as bounded by the center lot conveyed to the said grantee. The three deeds were made on the same day. It was held that the restriction was in the nature of a covenant running with the land, and created an easement of light and air in favor of the adjoining land.<sup>95</sup> And in Rhode Island tenants in common having conveyed to the city a strip of the land for a street and covenanted for themselves, their heirs and assigns, that the building line should be a certain number of feet from the street, it was held that this was a mutual covenant, and a grant to each of a negative easement in the lots of the others, so as to constitute as to a subsequent purchaser of one of the lots a breach of the covenant against encumbrances.<sup>96</sup> But in New Jersey it has been said that while cases involving light, air, or view might in some respects be based on the doctrine of easements, it is not satisfactory when it comes to be applied to covenants as to the use to which buildings are to be put; nor could the covenant, if it created an easement, be suspended because a subsequent purchaser did not buy with the restrictions of the covenant in view.<sup>97</sup> in restraining the owner from doing that with and upon his property which, but for the grant or covenant, he might lawfully have done, and hence is called a negative easement, as distinguished from that class of easements which compels the owner to suffer something to be done upon his property by another."

Where the original grantor conveyed complainant's and defendant's lots, and many others in the neighborhood, all with covenants against nuisances and the erection of steam engines on the premises, it was held that such covenants created easements on the lands for the benefit of the other owners, and that the plaintiff was entitled to enforce the restrictions against the defendant and subsequent grantee, although the defendant's deed did not contain the covenant. Birdsall v. Tiemann, 12 How. Pr. 551.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

v.

DES MOINES NATIONAL BANK, Appt.

Judgment — for principal — right of agent.

That a bank which undertook to deliver to a carrier a package of money to be carried and delivered to another bank was the agent of the latter for that purpose does not entitle it to the benefit of a judgment in favor of the principal against the carrier for failure to perform the service, which includes a finding that the carrier received the money, in an action by the carrier to hold the agent liable for fraud in placing waste paper instead of money in the package, and obtaining a receipt from the carrier for money.

Note. — Judgment between principal and a third person as res judicata in an action between the latter and an agent.

The converse of the question stated in the title to this note forms the subject of a note to Doremus v. Root, 54 L.R.A. 649, entitled "Judgment in favor of employee as bar to recovery against employer for employee's act or default."

Although it is well settled that a judgment in favor of an agent, rendered upon a ground equally applicable to both, is available as an estoppel to the principal, it does not invariably follow that a judgment against the agent is res judicata as to the principal. So, also, the cases on the specific question under discussion disclose the fact that a judgment in favor of the principal may or may not be res judicata in an action brought against the agent.

This situation is obviously inconsistent with the principle that estoppels to be binding must be mutual; and calls for an explanation. One such, which is put forth in Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Stratton's Independence, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 677, 85 C. C. A. 393, 158 Fed. 63, is that the general rule that one may not have the benefit of a judgment as an estoppel, unless he would have been bound by it if it had been the other way, is subject to recognized and rational exceptions. Another is that the relation of principal and agent is not such as, of itself, to make a judgment concerning one res judicata as to the other; in other words, that a principal or agent is not necessarily a "party" to an action against the other, within the rule that a judgment is conclusive upon parties or privies. But since a judgment in an action against one may in some cases be conclusive upon the

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hager & Powell, for appellant:

A judgment in a suit in which an agent or a servant is a party is conclusive for or against the principal or master.

Liability to the plaintiff cannot be grounded upon the charge that that judgment is erroneous.

other, wherein lies the basis for the estoppel? An answer to this query may be found in the suggestion made in Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329, that the implied obligation growing out of the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, to save the agent harmless in the commission of an act in his representative capacity, is the ground of the estoppel. Assuming this to be true, it follows that there is an estoppel by judgment, irrespective of the outcome of the action, where such implied obligation exists. The difficulty with this answer, however, is that it does not quite cover the situation, e. g., it does not furnish a reason why a judgment in favor of an agent is available to the principal in a subsequent action for the same tort.

While the logical basis for the difference in the decisions is thus involved in obscurity, a practical test as to when a judgment is, and when it is not, available as an estoppel to a principal or agent, is whether the party against whom the judgment is sought to be used has had his day in court,—his opportunity to establish the existence of the facts upon which he relies.

In Rookard v. Atlantic & C. Air Line R. Co. 84 S. C. 190, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 435, 137 Am. St. Rep. 839, 65 S. E. 1047, it is stated as a general principle that while a judgment on the merits in favor of an agent is a bar to an action against the principal for the same cause, because the principal's liability is predicated upon that of the agent, a judgment against the agent is not conclusive in an action against the principal; and a judgment against the principal will not conclude the agent, unless the agent has been vouched, or given notice and an opportunity to defend.

In Stanton v. Hennessey, 78 Hun, 287, 28 N. Y. Supp. 855, affirmed without opinion in 150 N. Y. 564, 44 N. E. 1128, it was held that a judgment roll in an unsuccessful action against the father of the defendant for commissions upon the sale of a farm was improperly admitted in evidence in an action based upon the fraud of the defendant in procuring the services of the plaintiff by representing himself as clothed with authority from his father to employ the plaintiff for that purpose, the defendant not having been a party to the former suit.

In Fogg v. Plumer, 17 N. H. 112, it was held that a verdict and judgment in an action of trespass relative to land brought by a person between whom and the plaintiff there was no privity of title is not rendered admissible in favor of the plaintiff by the fact that he acted as agent for such person, where whatever he did in that respect was in no way connected with the title.

In Swett v. Black, 1 Sprague, 574, Fed. Cas. No. 13,690, it was held that a decree in a suit by the owners of a vessel against the shipper for freight, in which the defense was that the cargo was never delivered, would be no evidence for or against the master of the vessel in a future suit against him for not delivering the cargo.

But in Bailey v. Sundberg, 1 C. C. A. 387, 1 U. S. App. 101, 49 Fed. 583, it was held that while the master of a vessel is not in privity with the owner, within the rule that binds privies as well as parties to the estoppel of a judgment, yet that where he participated in the defense of a libel in rem for a collision, the decree dismissing the libel on the merits was res judicata in a libel in personam against him for the same loss.

In Anderson v. West Chicago Street R. Co. 200 Ill. 329, 65 N. E. 717, affirming 102 Ill. App. 310, a judgment in favor of the lessor of a street railway in an action for an injury caused by the negligence of the lessee was held to be a bar to a subsequent suit for the injury against the lessee, the court saying: "In the case of a leasing of a railroad by one company to another company, the negligence or tort of the lessee company in operating its road is, by the law of this state, imputed to the lessor company, because it cannot absolve itself from the responsibility imposed by law upon it to operate its road so as to do no unnecessary damage to the person or property of others. and agent, or master and servant. Both being liable to the party injured, such party could sue them both in the same action or sue each one separately, but if one was not guilty of the tort, the other one could not be. It is not a case where the allegation is that two different parties have committed a tort to the person or property of the plaintiff, and thus each one of them would be individually liable, and where it might turn out on the trial that one of the parties was innocent of any actionable wrong. Such could never be the case where the negligence complained of is the negligence of the company operating the road. Its negligence is conclusively presumed to be the negligence of the owner. There is no question of fact to be tried whether the owner company is liable for the negligence of the lessee,—it is so liable under the law. It must follow then, that if, in a suit brought against the lessor in which the tort complained of is in fact the tort of the lessee, a verdict of not guilty is rendered,—that is, that there was no actionable wrong committed against the plaintiff by the lessor,—no actionable wrong could have been committed against him by the lessee in the premises, for it is the lessee's wrong that in these cases constitutes the basis of the action against the lessor."

In McCubbin v. Graham, 4 Kan. 397, a recovery against the principal in an action for damages for breach of contract to convey land, which included the value of a bond delivered to the agent making the sale as a part payment, was held to be a bar to a suit against the agent to recover the value of the bond.

In Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326, 63 Am. Dec. 627, it was held that a judgment in an action of trespass against a principal for the act of his servant, rendered upon the merits, was a bar to a suit against the servant for the same act, the court saying: "This case requires that a single point only should be considered; whether one who acts as the servant of another, in doing an act alleged to have been a trespass, is to be considered as so connected with his principal, who commanded the act to be done, that what will operate as a bar 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the further prosecution of the principal will operate as such for his servant. If the action were brought against the servant, he could be permitted to prove that he acted as the servant of another who commanded the act, and was justified in the commission of it, or who, if the act were unlawful, had made compensation for it, either before or after judgment; and his defense would be complete. It is not perceived why he may not, upon the same principles, be permitted to prove that the plaintiff had commenced a suit against his principal for the same cause of action, and proved the acts of his servant as material to the issue tried between them, and that a judgment upon the merits had been rendered against him. In such case the principal and servant would be one in interest, and would be known to the plaintiff to be so. To permit a person to commence an action against the principal, and to prove the acts alleged to be trespasses to have been committed by his servant acting by his order, and to fail upon the merits to recover, and subsequently to commence an action against that servant, and to prove and rely upon the same acts as a trespass, is to allow him to have two trials for the same cause of action, to be proved by the same testimony. In such cases the technical rule that a judgment can only be admitted between the parties to the record or their privies expands so far as to admit it, when the same question has been decided, and judgment rendered between parties responsible for the acts of others."

In Krolik v. Curry, 148 Mich. 214, 111 N. W. 761, a judgment on the merits in favor of a corporation, in an action instituted against it for fraud by means of misrepresentation in the sale of land, was held to be a bar against a subsequent suit against the officers of the corporation for the same fraud.

In Faust v. Baumgartner, 113 Ind. 139, 15 N. E. 337, it was held that a judgment in a suit against a city establishing its right to extend street improvements onto the plaintiff's property was conclusive of such right in an action brought by the same

The former judgment imports a verity, and plaintiff cannot be heard to urge that it was improperly obtained.

And in Bank of Kentucky v. Stone, 88 Fed. 383, affirmed in 174 U. S. 409, 43 L. ed. 1027, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 880, it was held that a judgment enjoining a county from enforcing an illegal tax was conclusive in a subsequent suit to restrain the board of assessors from certifying such a tax for collection, the real party in interest in both cases being the same.

In Warren Featherbone Co. v. De Camp, 154 Fed. 198, it was held that a decree in the principal's favor in an action for the alleged infringement of a patent, declaring the patent void, was res judicata as to the validity of such patent, in a similar action brought against one who became an agent during the pendency of the former suit.

For a substantially identical decision rendered in an action to restrain the infringement of an alleged trademark, see Lea v. Deakin, 11 Biss. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 8,154, which is sufficiently set forth in the opinion in AMERICAN EXP. CO. v. DES MOINES NAT. BANK.

And in W. A. Gaines & Co. v. Rock Spring Distilling Co. 179 Fed. 544, it was held that the judgment in an action against a principal for the infringement of an alleged trademark was res judicata as to persons using such trademark only as agents or employees.

A case which, although not falling within the scope of this note, may be of collateral interest, is Phillips v. Jamieson, 51 Mich. 153, 16 N. W. 318, in which it was held that a judgment in an action brought by a third party against defendant's principal was inadmissible, as bearing upon the question of exemplary damages, in an action for assault and battery committed upon one who was resisting an attempt on the part of the agent to move a boundary fence, for the purpose of showing that the defendant knew the real dividing line was where the fence stood, the court saying: "Judgments are admissible in evidence when the same subject-matter again comes in controversy between the same parties; but here was neither identity of parties nor identity of subject-matter. All that could be claimed was that the same question of fact had arisen in another case in which defendant's principal was a party, and had been passed upon by jury. If it were a sound principle that such a decision ought to be accepted as conclusive in other controversies, it would have been ruled so long before this, for the occasions for the ruling have been abundant. But it has never been so decided, and we know of no good reason why it should be."

Evans, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was before us on a former appeal from an interlocutory order. American Exp. Co. v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, 136 Iowa, 597, 111 N. W. 31. In the case of Bank of Irwin v. American Exp. Co. 127 Iowa, 1, 102 N. W. 107, the defendant therein (plaintiff herein) was held liable to the Irwin bank for the sum of $2,000, being the supposed contents of a package delivered to the express company by Des Moines National Bank as consignor for the Irwin bank as consignee. Afterwards this action was brought by the express company against the consignor for damages, on the general ground that fraud and deceit was practised upon it by one of the employees of said National Bank in fraudulently reporting the contents of such package, and obtaining a receipt therefor, as containing $2,000, whereas, in fact, it contained no money. As a third division of its answer, the defendant pleaded that it had been adjudicated in the former case that the Des Moines National Bank was the agent of the Bank of Irwin, and that the package delivered by it did contain the sum of $2,000, and that the Des Moines National Bank, as such agent, is now entitled to plead the judgment in the former action as an adjudication, and such adjudication was therein pleaded as a complete defense. The plaintiff demurred to this defense. The demurrer was sustained by the lower court. The defendant refused to amend, and stood upon its pleading and appealed to this court, where the ruling of the trial court was affirmed. 136 Iowa, 597. The case being remanded, the defendant amended such third division of its answer, and withdrew the allegation that its agency was adjudicated, and, in lieu thereof, alleged that it was in fact such agent, and with such amendment it still pleaded the former adjudication. Upon motion of plaintiff the amendment was stricken. The grounds of the motion were based upon the history of the pleading as above stated. From this order, the defendant has again appealed.

defendant is that the former opinion of this court only held that there was no adjudication of its agency. Having now alleged such agency, it contends that it now presents a good defense. We think, however, that the opinion on the former case is broader than is assumed by counsel, and that it holds, in effect, that the adjudication pleaded is not available to the defendant in this case. The questions now presented by the appellant were in fact presented by it on the former appeal, and were duly considered by this court. We have given the question further consideration, and are satisfied with the former conclusion. The argument of the defendant is that it was agent for the Irwin bank for the remittance of the money by express; that it was adjudicated in the Bank of Irwin Case that the express company had received the money; and that the defendant as agent of the Irwin bank is entitled to the benefit of such adjudication. The rule invoked by appellant is not so broad and general in its application as is assumed. There are abundant cases wherein agents have been permitted to plead adjudications in favor of their principal as bar to actions against themselves. But the ground upon which such plea is permitted is essentially different from that which exists in this case. The cases cited by appellant's counsel in their brief are illustrative.

Lea v. Deakin, 11 Biss. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 8,154, was a case wherein the plaintiff brought suit to restrain the defendant from infringing an alleged trademark. It was shown in defense that the defendant was agent for a principal in the use of the alleged trademark, and that the plaintiff had previously sued such principal, and that it had been adjudicated in such suit in a trial on the merits that such principal had a right to the use of the name which he applied to his goods. It was held that this adjudication protected the agent as well as the principal, on the theory that what the principal had a right to do by himself he had the same right to do by his agent. Faust v. Baumgartner, 113 Ind. 139, 15 N. E. 337, was an injunction suit against a city and its officers to restrain them from committing certain acts. It was held that a former adjudication in an action brought by the plaintiff against the city alone, to enjoin the same acts, wherein decree was rendered in favor of the city, was a bar to a second action against the officers of the city; the city being the real party in interest in each case.

Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329, was a case where the plaintiff sued a master for a trespass committed by a servant. The plaintiff had previously sued the servant, who was defended by the master. After trial on the merits, judgment was rendered in that case for the servant. It was held that this judgment was a bar to a second action for the same trespass against the master.

Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326, 63 Am. Dec. 627, was also a trespass case. The plaintiff first sued the master for the trespass of his servant, and was defeated after a trial on the merits. He then sued the servant for the same trespass. It was held that the second suit was barred by the adverse judgment in the first. Atkinson v. White, 60 Me. 396, was a controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant over the title to certain logs. The plaintiff held the same by bill of sale, and the defendant by a prior mortgage from a common grantor. Defendant sold some of the logs and warranted the title. Plaintiff sued the defendant's purchaser, and the question of the priority of defendant's right was litigated on the merits of such suit, and the plaintiff was defeated therein. He thereupon brought a second action against the defendant, and it was held that the prior adjudication was a bar.

Bates v. Stanton, 1 Duer, 79-88, was a case where a bailee was permitted to deny the title of the bailor by reason of a prior adjudication in a suit between the bailor and another, wherein it was adjudicated that such other person was the true owner of the goods. It was held that the bailee was bound to respect this adjudication, and that he was protected thereby. Beth v. Bay, 127 Iowa, 246, 109 Am. St. Rep. 385, 103 N. W. 119, is a case wherein it was held that an adjudication of the liability of the principal was binding upon the surety.

This brief review of some of the cited cases indicates the general scope of the rule which is invoked by appellant in its own behalf. The rule is not applicable to a state of facts such as are alleged in this case. The defendant was agent of the Irwin bank, only in the sense that it was consignor of the package, and delivered it to the common carrier, which became also the agent of the consignee. Under no circumstances could there be a joint liability of the defendant and the Irwin bank to the express company. Under the allegations of the answer, defendant was not a general agent of the Irwin bank, but a special agent directed to do a specific thing, namely, to ship $2,000 in currency by express. Notwithstanding such agency, it sustained also the relation of consignor to the express company as a public carrier. If its employee practised fraud or deceit upon the plaintiff as charged in the petition, this was quite beyond the scope of its authority as agent for the Irwin bank. If it failed to deliver the currency to the express company, it did not perform its agency. If, in lieu of delivering the currency, its employee practised fraud and deception upon the express company, and thereby obtained a receipt for alleged currency, this was not the act of the Irwin bank as principal, nor could it be made affirmatively liable therefor. True, such fact was important and decisive in the Bank of Irwin Case, but there was no such privity between the two banks as to make the same adjudication cover both. If the fraud charged in the petition was perpetrated upon the plaintiff, it did not of itself give rise to a cause of action.

The plaintiff's cause of action accrued when it was made liable to the Irwin bank by reason of the receipt which it gave for the supposed currency, and which receipt was obtained from it by the alleged fraud. In that sense the cause of action in favor of the plaintiff arose after the adjudication which is now attempted to be pleaded as a bar. It is true that it was necessarily found in the Bank of Irwin Case that the express company had received the money from the Des Moines bank. If it should now be found upon a trial of this case that it had not received the money, the findings in the two trials would be inconsistent. But this consideration is not controlling. It is often true that a litigant may be able to prove a fact as against one party, and fail to prove it as against another. Such inconsistencies arise out of the exigencies of proof and trial. Evidence is sometimes available as against one party to a litigation which is not available as against another. An illustration of that fact is furnished here. It appears from our former opinion in the Bank of Irwin Case that on the trial below the express company offered in evidence certain admissions of the president of the Des Moines bank, and of certain acts of its employees, and this evidence was rejected on the ground that such admissions and such acts were not binding upon the Irwin bank. Such objection would not be available against the express company in a suit between it and the present defendant. It is manifest that that case was tried on the theory that the Des Moines bank, defendant herein, was not in privity with the plaintiff therein. Our conclusion, therefore, is that, the alleged agency pleaded did not create such privity between the two banks as to entitle the defendant herein to plead the adjudication in the former case as a bar against this action.

In considering the legal sufficiency of this affirmative defense, we have necessarily taken into consideration the allegations of the petition against which it is interposed as a defense.

The order of the trial court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

This note is limited to emergencies involving physical human peril. In view of the great number of cases upon the subject, no attempt at an exhaustive collection of them has been here made. Questions of proximate cause and burden of proof are excluded; also cases which are complicated by some invitation or command of the defendant, and cases where the injury was suffered in rescuing others.

For cases on voluntarily incurring danger to save another's life as contributory negligence, see the note to Norris v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1069.

For cases on attempting to pass automobiles with frightened horse as constituting negligence, see the note to Cumberland Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Yeiser, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1137.

It is not intended generally to cite master and servant cases, but a few of them have been included.

The general subject of emergency in admiralty is, of course, without the scope of this note.

The question of conduct in an emergency has usually been considered with respect to the conduct of the person injured, that is to say, with respect to the question of contributory negligence, although it will be seen there are cases in which the conduct of the defendant is tested with reference to the haste and excitement under which he acted; and in LEMAY v. SPRINGFIELD STREET R. Co. it is conceded that the fact of emergency may have a bearing upon the defendant's conduct.

II. Conduct of person injured.

a. Emergency caused by negligence of defendant.

1. General rule.

The test of the conduct of one put in a sudden emergency by the negligence of the defendant is that of a person of ordinary prudence confronted with the same circumstances; therefore if his conduct bears this test, he is not guilty of contributory negligence for mistaking the way of escape from the emergency.

Defendant's eighteenth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth requests, which are mentioned in the opinion, are as follows:

"(18) If you should find that the air brake on this car of the defendant failed to work, without premonition or warning to the motorman, and at a time when he was closely approaching a sharp curve in the defendant's tracks, so that he was confronted with unexpected peril, then it is

"(25) The plaintiff cannot recover for any defect in the car causing the accident.

"(26) The plaintiff cannot recover for failure to inspect the car."

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant's eighteenth request could not have been given as framed. It would have excluded from consideration by the jury the question of the motorman's negligence in approaching a sharp curve at an excessive and dangerous rate of speed, before he had discovered the failure of his air brake, and the question whether, if he was confronted with unexpected peril, he acted with proper diligence under the circumstances then existing and with the light that he then had. It is true that allowance must be made for one compelled to act immediately, without opportunity for deliberation, upon a sudden emergency. But this does not mean that he is necessarily excused for any error of judgment, but simply that his conduct is to be judged in view of the exigency and the need of immediate action. He is still bound to use the same degree of care to which he is ordinarily held; but due allowance must be made for the situation in which he is placed, and he is not to be held to a coolness of judgment for which there is not time. Linnehan v. Sampson, 126 Mass. 500, 511, 512, 30 Am. Rep. 692; Cody v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 151 Mass. 462, 468, 7 L.R.A. 843, 24 N. E. 402; *Tozier v. Haverhill & A. Street R. #### Error of rescuer.

A similar rule applies where a third person makes an error of judgment in endeavoring to rescue the plaintiff. Schoenfeld v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 40 Misc. 201, 81 N. Y. Supp. 644.

requests should have been given; for, although the defendant would have been liable upon a proper declaration, if the accident was caused by any defect in its car which might have been discovered and remedied by proper inspection, yet the declarations in these cases averred merely that the accident was caused by the fact that the defendant had "so carelessly, negligently, and recklessly operated" its car as to cause it to approach and go around the curve at a very high and dangerous rate of speed, causing the injuries complained of. This plainly charged only the negligent operation of the car, and not negligence in using a defective or poorly equipped car. The plaintiffs were allowed to recover, and the verdicts in their favor may have been found upon an issue which was not open under the pleadings, and which the defendant seasonably requested to have withdrawn from the jury. Lund v. Tyngsboro, 11 Cush. 563, 567, 59 Am. Dec. 159 et seq.; Hanlon v. South Boston Horse R. Co. 129 Mass. 310; James v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 201 Mass. 263, 87 N. E. 474.

But the bill of exceptions seems to indicate that the defendant was fully heard upon this question, and it was fairly submitted to the jury. It follows that, if the plaintiff's declarations shall be amended so as to present this issue, justice does not demand a new trial. Denham v. Bryant, 139 Mass. 110, 112, 28 N. E. 691, and cases cited; Peck v. Waters, 104 Mass. 345, 351; Fay v. Walsh, 190 Mass. 374, 377, 77 N.

2. Explanations and limits of rule.

In Bischoff v. People's R. Co. 121 Mo. 216, 25 S. W. 908, the court quoted from Kleiber v. People's R. Co. 107 Mo. 240, 14 L.R.A. 613, 17 S. W. 946, saying: "In that case the following rules were deduced from the authorities: 'First, the peril or alarm must have been caused by the negligence of the one against whom indemnity is sought; second, the apprehension of peril, from the standpoint of the injured person, must have been reasonable; and, third, the appearance of the danger must have been imminent, leaving no time for deliberation. On the other hand, the danger must be judged by the circumstances as they appear, and not by the result.'"

In Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Ashcraft, 48 Ala. 16, which was reversed, however, on another ground, the court said: "The plaintiff jumped from the car and received his injuries in doing so. Other passengers who remained in the car were not hurt. If he contributed to his own injury by want of proper care, he would not be entitled to recover. The degree of care required of him is in proportion to the degree and imminence of the danger."

Doctrine founded on common experience.

"Persons in great peril are not required to exercise the presence of mind required of prudent men under ordinary circumstances." Richmond R. & Electric Co. v. Hudgins, 100 Va. 419, 41, S. E. 736.

"Persons under imminence of peril may not be required to exercise all the presence of mind and care 'of a prudent, careful man,' with impending danger. The law makes allowance, and leaves the circumstances to the jury to find, if the party acted rashly and under an undue apprehension of the danger." Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Yarwood, 17 Ill. 509, 65 Am. Dec. 682.

"When anyone is in danger through the negligence of another, his action in the emergency suddenly thrown upon him cannot be weighed in scales to determine whether he acted wisely or foolishly in the imminence of great danger." Jacks v. Reeves, 78 Ark. 426, 95 S. W. 781.

Where the plaintiff was a servant of the defendant, the court said: "The misconduct of the company in threatening the plaintiff with a collision may be taken as established. The open question is whether the plaintiff, after discovering the danger, acted recklessly or rashly, and thus brought upon himself a clamity which he might have avoided by more discreet conduct. All the authorities concur in holding that the duty of a person for his own safety, in such an emergency, is not to be measured by the ordinary standard, but that allowance is to be made for the state of his emotions." Smith v. Wrightsville & T. R. Co. 83 Ga. 671, 10 S. E. 361.

"A person who, from an impulse of fear produced by the wrongful act of another, acts erroneously, and, in consequence of such erroneous act, receives an injury which he would not have received had he not so acted, will not be precluded from recovering damages on the ground of contributory negligence; for it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to say to the plaintiff, 'You shall not have damages because you did not act with reasonable care,' if the misconduct of the defendant paralyzed the nerves or destroyed the volition of the plaintiff, so that he became incapable of acting with that care which persons under other circumstances employ." Siegrist v. Arnot, 10 Mo. App. 197.

In Ransom v. Union Depot Co. 142 Mo. App. 361, 126 S. W. 785, where the servant of one of the defendants was not considered by the court to have been negligent in getting a truck out of the way of a swiftly approaching train, the court said that he might have abandoned the truck and sought safety in flight, but he stuck to his post and labored to get the truck out of the way. "The expressman was suddenly confronted by a great peril which gave him no time to think. The law imposes no rules of conduct upon one who is suddenly confronted by impending danger, and is compelled to act, not by the dic-

E. 44; Beers v. McGinnis, 191 Mass. 279, 282, 77 N. E. 768.

The other exceptions have not been argued, and we treat them as waived.

If the plaintiffs shall be allowed by the superior court within sixty days from the filing of the rescript, to amend their declarations as has been stated, the exceptions will be overruled; otherwise they must be sustained.

tates of care and reason, but by the instinct of self-preservation."

Peril need not be actual.

It is error for the court to instruct the jury in such a manner as to lead them to understand that before a person can have the benefit of not being guilty of negligence in acting hastily under sudden peril, the peril must be actual, and not simply apparent, imminent danger. Hainlin v. Budge, 56 Fla. 342, 47 So. 825.

Where a servant was killed the court approved the following instructions: "If the jury believe that, at the time the deceased jumped from the car, the appearances of danger to him were sufficient to justify a person of reasonable firmness and prudence in believing that his safety required him to jump from the car in order to escape the impending danger, then the fact that his death resulted from injuries received in making such jump will not defeat the plaintiff's right to recover in this action; and this is so notwithstanding that the jury may further believe that deceased might have escaped unhurt, had he made no effort to leave said car." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Touhey, 67 Ark. 209, 77 Am. St. Rep. 109, 54 S. W. 577.

In the case of a servant suing his master for injury, the court said: "It is also contended that the court erred in instructing the jury that it is not negligence to commit an error under the influence of fear produced by the appearance of sudden danger, and also that there was error in instructing to the effect that if the defendant, through its negligence, put the plaintiff in a position of immediate danger, real or apparent, and that plaintiff, through a sudden impulse of fear, attempted to escape the danger, and in so doing actually received the injury he was attempting to escape, then he may recover. We cannot agree that these objections are well taken. On the contrary, we think the instructions substantially correct, under the evidence and circumstances of the case." Silver Cord Combination Min. Co. v. McDonald, 14 Colo. 191, 23 Pac. 346, 16 Mor. Min. Rep. 171.

In Gannon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 173 Mass. 40, 43 L.R.A. 833, 52 N. E. 1075, where a passenger was injured, the court said: "If the peril seemed imminent, more hasty and violent action was to be expected than would be natural at quieter moments, and such conduct is to be judged with reference to the stress of appearances at the time, and not by the cool estimate of the actual danger formed by outsiders after the event." 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

But in Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. Gilleland, 133 Ga. 621, 66 S. E. 944, where the trial court charged the jury: "If you believe that the plaintiff, at the time that he jumped from the car, was acting under a reasonable apprehension, that is to say, the apprehension of a prudent man, that he was under circumstances, that he might receive an injury, he would not be guilty of contributory negligence in jumping from the car,"—the appellate court said: "This is not an accurate statement of the doctrine of emergency raised by the carrier, and acted on by the passenger. The judge informed the jury that if the passenger was acting under a reasonable apprehension 'that he might receive an injury,' he would not be guilty of contributory negligence in jumping from the car. It is not every reasonable apprehension of a bare possibility of injury which will suffice. Making even the reasonable apprehension of a prudent man that he might receive an injury, as a matter of law, a test of whether it was negligent to jump from a car, was erroneous. Nor should the judge have stated to the jury that certain facts would or would not make the passenger guilty of contributory negligence. . . . Whether a passenger who was put in imminent peril acted rashly or recklessly in leaping from a car, or whether he should have remained upon it, or have sought to leave it in some other manner, are questions for the jury. In determining whether he acted rashly or recklessly, and thus brought upon himself an injury which he might have avoided by more discreet conduct, the jury may consider the excitement and state of the emotions of the passenger produced by the peril in which he has been placed by the carrier."

The choice of hazards.

In Haff v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 4 McCrary, 622, 14 Fed. 558, the court said in charging the jury: "I think the rule applicable, where contributory negligence is set up as a defense, is the one which is to be applied in this case, and this is it: If the plaintiff was placed, by want of care of the defendant, in such a position that at the moment, and in the face of a great and threatening peril, he was obliged to choose between two hazards, and he makes such choice as a person of ordinary prudence and care, placed in the same situation, might make, and is thereby injured, the fact that if he had chosen the other hazard, he would have escaped injury, does not relieve the defendant from liability for its own negligence."

In Mitchell v. Southern P. R. Co. 87 Cal.

62, 11 L.R.A. 130, 25 Pac. 245, where a passenger on a railroad was injured, the court said: "Where there has been an unsuccessful attempt to escape danger in an accident, was the attempt which was made an unreasonable or rash act? or was it one which a person of ordinary care and prudence might do under the circumstances? The answer to this inquiry cannot be made to depend upon the result of the attempt to escape, nor upon the result which would have occurred if the attempt had not been made. It would be unreasonable to require a passenger in case of accident to judge with absolute certainty the degree of danger attending him if he made no effort to escape, and the absolute consequences of an effort to escape. He must act upon the probabilities of an effort to escape as they appear to him, and choose that hazard which seems to him, as a person of prudence, to be the least. Of course, the facts that he was injured in the attempt to escape, and that those who remained in the car escaped without injury, are circumstances which the jury should consider in determining whether he acted as a man of ordinary prudence would under the circumstances; but where he has acted in the manner described, it cannot be said that his attempt to escape constituted contributory negligence."

Where the plaintiff's intestate, a passenger on a horse railroad, placed in great peril by the negligence of the driver of the car, made a mistake in judgment in jumping from the car and was killed, the court said: "He was not, however, bound to the exercise of any better judgment or greater degree of caution than would be required of a prudent man when placed in a similar condition of peril, and it was held to be a sound rule of law, applicable to such cases, that an instinctive effort to escape a sudden impending danger resulting from the negligence of another will not relieve the latter from liability, and that delay in an effort to escape, until the exact nature and measure of danger was ascertained, would not be required. Coulter v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 56 N. Y. 585. This sound principle has been recognized and reiterated in many cases. . . . That the party makes a mistake, and would have escaped injury had he remained quiet, will not bar his action." Cuyler v. Decker, 20 Hun, 173.

In Woodson v. Prescott & N. W. R. Co. 91 Ark. 388, 121 S. W. 273, where the action was brought by the fireman of one of the defendant's locomotives, for injury received by him, the court held that it was error to instruct the jury as follows: "You are further told that if, after the plaintiff knew the engine was derailed, he knew he could have escaped in safety, but thought the engine would stop, and with full knowledge of the facts decided to remain on the engine and take the risk, instead of trying to escape, he cannot recover," as this, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 4 in effect, was stating that as matter of law the plaintiff was guilty of negligence.

Test of conduct.

The measure of duty of a plaintiff put in peril by the defendant is that of an ordinarily prudent man under all the circumstances. Gibbons v. Wilkes-Barre & Suburban Street R. Co. 155 Pa. 279, 26 Atl. 417; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Fulton, 144 Ala. 332, 39 So. 282. Compare Texas cases, infra II. d.

A plaintiff may recover if he finds himself in a perilous situation by reason of the failure of the defendant, and while endeavoring to extricate himself from the perilous situation in which he finds himself, he acts as a reasonably prudent man would act under such circumstances. Illinois Southern R. Co. v. Hamill, 226 Ill. 88, 80 N. E. 745.

Where there was nothing in the record from which it appeared that the plaintiff had unnecessarily or improperly exposed himself to peril in the first instance, the court approved the following instruction: "A man under sudden excitement or peril is only required to exercise such care for his own safety as an ordinary prudent man would have exercised under like circumstances, and if he exercised such degree of care, then, in that, he is not guilty of contributory negligence." Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Farmer, 97 Ala. 141, 12 So. 86.

In Stack v. East St. Louis & Suburban R. Co. 245 Ill. 308, 137 Am. St. Rep. 318, 92 N. E. 241, the court said in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff: "There is no rule of law which prescribes any particular act to be done or omitted by a person who finds himself in a place of danger. In the variety of circumstances which constantly arise, it is impossible to announce such a rule. The only requirement of the law is that the conduct of the person involved shall be consistent with what a man of ordinary prudence would do under like circumstances."

It is, of course, a question for the jury whether the act that was done was such an act as a man of ordinary prudence might have done under the circumstances of the case. Woodward Iron Co. v. Andrews, 114 Ala. 243, 21 So. 440; Noyes v. Southern P. R. Co. 92 Cal. 285, 28 Pac. 288.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Murray, 55 Ark. 248, 16 L.R.A. 787, 29 Am. St. Rep. 32, 18 S. W. 50, the duty of a passenger is laid down as follows: "On occasions where a passenger is suddenly confronted by imminent danger and peril, he cannot reasonably be expected to calculate chances, or to deliberate upon the means of escape, but must of necessity judge hastily of the danger of remaining where he is, as also of the danger of attempting to escape, by the circumstances as they, at the instant, appear to him, and not by the result." He acts upon the probabilities as they appear to him, and if he acts as a man of ordinary prudence 'placed in the same circumstances, and under a like necessity of immediate action and decision,' would have acted, and in so doing makes an effort to escape and is injured, the railroad company is responsible to him for his damages."

In an action by an employee for injuries received, as he claimed, while jumping from a car to avoid imminent peril, the court said: "One exposed to sudden and unexpected danger is not responsible for acting without judgment or wildly, and whether he so acted depends materially upon the facts and circumstances of the case. The proper inquiry is, considering his surroundings at the time, Did he exercise such reasonable care and diligence as would be expected of a prudent and reasonable man under similar circumstances?" Pierson Lumber Co. v. Hart, 144 Ala. 239, 39 So. 566.

But see contra, Cook v. Parham, 24 Ala. 21, where the court said: "There was evidence conducing to show that the slave June leaped from the boat into the river, when there was no necessity for him to have done so; and upon the trial it was insisted that if his death was caused by his own rashness, and not by the act of the plaintiffs in error, they could not be held responsible. The charge given upon this point was 'that, if the death of the slave was the legitimate and natural consequence of the collision, though not the inevitable consequence, the defendants would be liable;' and the judge also added: 'That if a man of ordinary care and presence of mind could have saved himself, yet, if the slave was frightened out of his ordinary presence of mind, by the confusion and alarm occasioned by the collision of the boats, and that collision was the result of the negligent acts of the defendants, then they would be liable;' or, in other words, that the death in such a case would be the legitimate consequence of such negligence. In this charge there was no error."

Limits of the rule.

In Galena & C. Union R. Co. v. Fay, 16 Ill. 558, 63 Am. Dec. 323, the court approved the following instruction, and held it was error to have refused to give it: "If the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff leaped from the car of the defendants while it was moving slowly in a place where there was no danger of the car being upset or injured, under a rash and undue apprehension of danger, when in reality he was in no danger, and that the injury was caused by such leaping, they must find for the defendants, even though the plaintiff, at the time, really thought himself in danger, and leaped to the ground to save himself from harm."

In Chicago & A. R. Co. Randolph, 53 Ill. 510, 5 Am. Rep. 60, the court said it was error to refuse to instruct the jury, "if the jury believe, from the evidence, that, under all the circumstances existing at the time, a man of ordinary prudence, situate as the plaintiff was, would not have jumped off, the jury should find for the defendant."

Where the jury found that the plaintiff could not recover as his intestate was guilty of contributory negligence in jumping from the caboose on which he was a passenger, when alarmed at lumber falling from the train, the court said in affirming the judgment: "If the intestate voluntarily leaped from a train while it was moving at a rate of speed which made death or great bodily harm inevitable, he was guilty of negligence arising to the degree of rashness, unless the falling lumber produced such a condition of things as reasonably to have induced in his mind the belief that to remain would result in great bodily harm." Woolery v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 107 Ind. 381, 57 Am. Rep. 114, 8 N. E. 226.

Where there is a deliberate act with no necessity for it, and no claim of fright, the plaintiff cannot recover. Sutherland v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 148 Ind. 308, 47 N. E. 624.

In Muldowney v. Illinois C. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 462, where an employee of a railroad was injured in trying to couple cars, it was held that his belief that he could do so without injury could not be considered upon the question of his contributory negligence. His belief was not the question.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Molloy, 122 Ky. 219, 91 S. W. 685, the court, in giving directions for a new trial, stated that the jury should be instructed that if a person injured, "while using such means, and acting as a person of ordinary prudence placed in such a position might reasonably act, was injured and killed, it was immaterial that if he had followed some other course he might have escaped injury." This part of the instruction was directed in place of the following: "If the decedent, while using such means as then appeared to him to be reasonably necessary to avoid such danger, was injured and killed, still he was not guilty of contributory negligence, and the jury will so find."

In Chretien v. New Orleans R. Co. 113 La. 707, 104 Am. St. Rep. 519, 37 So. 716, the court, in sustaining a judgment for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff, who was a passenger, had not good cause for jumping from a car, quoted with approval the language of the court in South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Ware, 84 Ky. 267, 1 S. W. 493, as follows: "The character of the impending danger, or at least its apparent character, is to be considered. If one acts unreasonably, rashly, or becomes frightened at a trivial occurrence not calculated to alarm a reasonably prudent man, and thereby brings injury upon himself, there is no liability. It is urged that when one is frightened by something resulting from the neglect of the carrier, he cannot be charged with contributory negligence to any accident. He, however, must act upon reasonable apprehension of peril. His conduct must conform to that of an ordinarily careful man under like circumstances. He has no right, upon the happening of some trivial occurrence, or such as would not create fear or apprehension of injury in the mind of an ordinarily prudent and careful person, to bring injury upon himself, and then recover damages by reason of it."

In Brooks v. Petersham, 16 Gray, 181, which was an action against the town for injuries due to a defect in the road, the court held that it was error to instruct the jury that "the mere want of prudent management on the part of Mrs. Brooks or her companion after the horse began to run, or the mere fact that she imprudently seized the reins and turned the horse from the road, would not exonerate the defendants." The court said further: "The plaintiff was bound to use ordinary care as well after as before the horse began to run in consequence of the defect in the road. She could not abandon herself to needless alarm, or give up all proper control of the horse, in consequence of the peril to which she was exposed by the negligence of the defendants in omitting to keep their road in suitable repair. She was still bound to use such care as a person of ordinary prudence and discretion would exercise if placed in similar circumstances and exposed to a like danger, making due allowance for the alarm to which she and her companion were thrown by the occurrence of the accident."

In Adamson v. Norfolk & P. Traction Co. 111 Va. 556, 69 S. E. 1055, the court approved the following instruction, stating to effect that the word "danger" was shown to be intended for apparent danger by another part of the charge: "The court instructs the jury that the law requires of every man that he exercise a reasonable amount of care for his own safety. If you believe the plaintiff has failed to prove by such evidence that Adamson ever saw the car approaching the car on which he was seated from the rear, and if you believe from the evidence that Adamson was not in danger of being injured if he had remained seated, but that he jumped directly in front of an approaching car simply because he heard some women holler 'Jump,' without stopping to think or to take any care at all for his safety, and that his death was caused by an absolutely unguarded and reckless act of his own, your verdict should be for the defendant."

3. Illustrations of rule.

In Jones v. Boyce, 1 Starkie, 493, 18 Rees Rep. 812, where a passenger jumped from a coach probably thinking it would be returned, but it was not, Lord Ellenborough in charging the jury said: "If I were a man in such a situation that he must adopt a perilous alternative, I am responsible for the consequences."

This case was followed in Stokes v. Saltwell, 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. ed. 115, where the court approved the following instruction: "If the jury find there was no want of proper skill or care or caution on the part of the driver, and that the stage was upset by the act of the plaintiff or his wife in rashly and improperly springing from it, then the defendant is not liable to this action; but if the want of proper skill or care of the driver placed the passengers in a state of peril, and they had at that time a reasonable ground for supposing that the stage would upset, or that the driver was incapable of managing his horses, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, although the jury may believe from the position in which the stage was placed by the negligence of the driver, the attempt of the plaintiff or his wife to escape may have increased the peril, or even caused the stage to upset, and although they may also find that the plaintiff and his wife would probably have sustained little or no injury if they had remained in the stage."

In Omaha Water Co. v. Schamel, 78 C. C. A. 68, 147 Fed. 502, the general rule was applied to a case of jumping or dropping from a window when the building was burning by reason of the negligence of the defendant.

The rule was also applied where the defendant's driver, recklessly driving down the street, put a woman who was crossing in such sudden and unexpected peril that, in her fright and in her efforts to escape, she fell and was injured. Sandy v. Swift & Co. 159 Fed. 271, affirmed in 92 C. C. A. 56, 165 Fed. 622.

In Holland v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. 91 Ala. 444, 12 L.R.A. 232, 8 So. 524, where the plaintiff's intestate was killed by molten iron while in the employ of the defendant, the court approved instructions to the effect "that it was the duty of plaintiff's intestate to have used due diligence in trying to get out of the way of the molten iron, when he saw it flowing towards him in the ditch (if you believe he saw it, or could have seen it by the exercise of due care), and if he failed to do so, and because of such failure he was burned and injured, you must find for the defendant," saying that these charges "are manifestly sound statements of the doctrine of contributory negligence. The fact, if it be one, that the intestate was panic-stricken, and his energies paralyzed by the awful nature of the impending catastrophe, might be proper to be considered by the jury in determining what effort would amount to due diligence, or what omission of effort would be negligence, under all the circumstances; but no such consideration can relieve from the duty of diligence on the one hand, or condone negligence on the other."

In Karr v. Parks, 40 Cal. 188, the plaintiff, a child eleven years old, was walking with her sister five years old in the street, and saw the defendant's cow coming toward her in a rapid, threatening manner, and, catching her little sister by the hand, attempted to get into a corral which was near by, but was hooked and severely injured by the cow. At the time she was about 60 feet from her father's house. The negligence of the defendant having been shown, the court said upon the question of contributory negligence: "The evidence does not satisfy us that there was even bad judgment in the plaintiff's attempting to escape to the corral for protection, rather than to the house, but it would be absurd to hold that even an adult person, in time of imminent danger, is negligent unless he takes every precaution that a careful calculation afterward will show he might have taken. She had no time to measure and compare distances, or to calculate whether she would gain time by retreating in one direction rather than another, even though, as a mathematical problem, it was very easy of solution."

In Bilton v. Southern P. Co. 148 Cal. 443, 83 Pac. 440, where a man driving was shown to have employed due diligence until he was within about 8 feet of a railroad track, when he first was able to learn that a train was coming, it was held that it was not negligence for him as a matter of law to attempt to escape by driving across the track after having become aware of the approach of the train.

In Ward v. District of Columbia, 24 App. D. C. 524, where the plaintiff was riding his bicycle down the street when a man rushed out from near a tree on the sidewalk and warned him, and the plaintiff, being confused, turned his bicycle towards the tree, which was being cut down by the defendant, and it fell upon him, it was held that it was error to take the questions of negligence and contributory negligence from the jury.

Where the plaintiff, a baggage master in the employ of the defendant railroad, jumped from a train to avoid a collision, it was held that there was no error in refusing the following request to charge: "That if it appear that at the time of the injury the plaintiff was acting in disobedience of a proper order of the conductor or person in charge of the train, to secure his, plaintiff's, safety, and it also appear that the injury was caused by such disobedience, he cannot recover." The plaintiff, however, stated that he did not hear the order, but the court said that, as baggage master, he was not legally bound to obey the conductor in such a matter. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Rhodes, 56 Ga. 645.

In Root v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 195 Mo. 348, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 212, 92 S. W. 621, where a brakeman, seeing a trestle ahead of him on fire, jumped from the train and was injured, when he would have escaped injury if he had remained on the train, it was held that this was not contributory negligence, and that the matter could not be viewed from the standpoint of after the accident.

Where the defendant, probably in jest, pushed a board part way through the transom of the room occupied by the plaintiff, and she, fearing that the board would fall upon her, strained her leg in endeavoring 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to get out of the way, it was held that the question whether she had acted with reasonable prudence under the circumstances was for the jury, and they having found for the plaintiff, the decision was not disturbed. Ellick v. Wilson, 58 Neb. 584, 79 N. W. 152.

Where a woman on the sidewalk, seeing a derailed car coming in her direction, was injured in trying to escape, and would have been safe had she stood her ground, it was held that there was no error in refusing a nonsuit, the peril being caused by the negligence of the defendant. Tuttle v. Atlantic City R. Co. 66 N. J. L. 327, 54 L.R.A. 582, 88 Am. St. Rep. 491, 49 Atl. 450.

Where the plaintiff on the sidewalk, hearing the horse and wagon of the defendant being rapidly driven behind her on the sidewalk, instinctively jumped to get out of the way, and injured her head against a building, the appellate court said that the trial court properly refused "to charge the jury that the plaintiff was under a duty to look back and ascertain the distance of the horse and wagon before jumping to get out of the way. In place of this, the judge charged that if it appeared the horse and wagon were so distant that she had time to look around, then she was bound to do so before jumping; but if the horse and wagon were right upon her, or so close to her that she had not time to look around, and instinctively jumped on one side to avoid immediate danger, then she was justified in jumping before she looked." The court said further: "There can be no rule of law which imposes it as a duty upon one, over whom danger impends by the negligence of another, to incur greater danger by delaying his efforts to avoid it, until its exact nature and measure are ascertained. The instinctive effort on the part of the plaintiff to avoid the danger did not relieve the defendant from responsibility." Coulter v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 56 N. Y. 585, reversing 5 Lans. 67. The reversal was on another ground.

In Schafer v. New York, 154 N. Y. 466, 48 N. E. 749, where a city had left the curb of an intersecting street in the highway so that the traveled way was across this curb, and the plaintiff's intestate, driving a heavy load, was jounced from his seat upon the pole by this curb and was seen struggling to keep on the wagon, and 20 feet beyond the curb the wheels struck a manhole projecting a few inches above the level of the street, and he was thrown under them and killed, the court said: "After he had passed over he was unexpectedly thrown into a situation of danger that would naturally cause some mental confusion. The horses were still going rapidly up the incline and had but 20 feet farther to go before the forward wheel struck the manhole. During the mere instant of time required to go that short distance he was balancing on the pole and struggling to keep on the wagon. If he had retained his seat so that he could have seen the man-hole, it would have been his duty to make due effort to avoid it, but situated as he was the jury could have found that the peculiar circumstances surrounding him relieved him from the exercise of greater care."

Where the plaintiff's intestate was laying a gas main under a horse car track, and knew of the approach of a car from the south, and it was the custom of the driver to detach his horses and drive them around the trench, the car going over it by its own motion, and one of the horses fell into the trench, and thereupon the plaintiff's intestate, to get out of the way, jumped away from the horse and was hit by the car passing overhead and killed, it was held that the questions of negligence and contributory negligence were for the jury. Burns v. Second Ave. R. Co. 21 App. Div. 521, 48 N. Y. Supp. 523.

Where the defendant's driver, who was driving along the road at night, drunk, was met by the plaintiff's driver, who, in apprehension of a collision, turned out, and the plaintiff was thrown out and injured, it was held that if the plaintiff's driver acted as a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances, he was not negligent. Crampton v. Ivie Bros. 124 N. C. 591, 32 S. E. 968.

Where the plaintiff, in endeavoring to escape a trunk which fell on the sidewalk from the wagon of an express company in front of its premises, fell over another trunk upon the sidewalk, it was held that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that the express company was liable for his injuries. Vallo v. United States Exp. Co. 147 Pa. 404, 14 L.R.A. 743, 30 Am. St. Rep. 741, 23 Atl. 594.

Where the plaintiffs, who were husband and wife, were driving down the street when their horses were frightened by the escape through a stopcock of water from a water pipe, and it was claimed that when the horses took fright the woman grasped the lines, pulled the wrong line, and prevented her husband from properly managing the horses, it was held that the court properly charged the jury that "if she was suddenly placed in a position of peril, and under the influence of fright deprived of the calm judgment she would otherwise have had, and grasped the lines with the intention of stopping the horses, even though she made a mistake in her judgment as to what would be the effect of her act, the law does not hold her to the accountability that it would if she were in other circumstances. These are questions for you. If you find that she was guilty of negligence which contributed in any degree to the happening of the accident, then she could not recover." Baker v. North East, 151 Pa. 234, 24 Atl. 1079.

Where the injury to a servant was due to the negligent starting of the master's mill while the servant was in a dangerous position, and the danger was caused by the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

machinery moving backward, and the servant, in his sudden peril, called out "back up," when it was a forward movement that he desired, it was held that this was not contributory negligence. Mathews v. Daly-West Min. Co. 27 Utah, 193, 75 Pac. 722.

In Woolley v. Scovell, 3 Mann. & R. 105, 7 L. J. K. B. 41, where the defendant, finding it convenient to throw a bag of wool from an upper story of his warehouse, instructed his servants, before doing so, to call out to passers-by in the yard, and the plaintiff, on hearing the warning, lost his presence of mind and ran across the yard thinking that he could escape in time, but was struck by the wool, it was held that he was entitled to recover.

Where the plaintiff's child was killed by the escape of gas caused by the servants of the defendants in working in the cellar of the house of the child's parents, and it was claimed that the mother of the child was guilty of contributory negligence, in that, in endeavoring to save herself, she neglected to close the doors, it was held that there was no error in leaving the question to the jury. Flaherty v. Scranton Gas & Water Co. 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 446.

And in Chicago v. Hesing, 83 Ill. 204, 25 Am. Rep. 378, it was held that a mother was not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to rescue in time her child, who had fallen into the water, in view of the excitement she was under.

Cases are not infrequent where it is claimed that it was contributory negligence "not to jump."

In Bush v. St. Joseph & B. H. Street R. Co. 113 Mich. 513, 71 N. W. 851, where the plaintiff was the driver of a wagon, and was injured by a collision with a street car, and his companions had escaped by jumping, it was held that it was not contributory negligence on his part not to jump, as he had the responsibility of his team and had the duty to endeavor to avoid the collision if he reasonably could.

In Sherwood v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 App. Div. 639, 105 N. Y. Supp. 547, the court decided, though it seems not without some difficulty, that it was not necessarily contributory negligence for a boy of sixteen years of age, with confidence in his companion, who was driving the automobile in which they were riding, to omit to jump from the machine to escape a collision with a railway train.

In Dickson v. Omaha & St. L. R. Co. 124 Mo. 140, 25 L.R.A. 320, 46 Am. St. Rep. 429, 27 S. W. 476, it was held that it was not necessarily negligence for an engineer whose forward trucks were off the rails, to refrain from jumping from the locomotive.

So, in Cottrill v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Wis. 634, 32 Am. Rep. 796, 3 N. W. 376, it was held that it was not negligence for the plaintiff's intestate, who was an engineer on the defendant's road, to refrain from jumping from his engine to avoid the results of a collision.

4. More than one tortfeasor.

Where the emergency is caused by the negligence of one of two tortfeasors, and the injury is inflicted by the negligence of the other, the question would seem to be simply one of proximate cause.

And where the negligence of two defendants bring about the emergency, they are both responsible. Thus, in Walton v. Miller, 109 Va. 210, 132 Am. St. Rep. 908, 63 S. E. 458, the court approved an instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence that Miller was placed in a position of sudden peril by the negligence of the defendants, without contributory negligence on his part, he could not be held responsible for error of judgment with respect to effecting his escape, occasioned by such sudden peril; which instruction also contained the converse of that proposition.

And "where the negligence of a third party and of the defendant are contributory causes leading to a position of sudden danger to the plaintiff, the latter's ill-advised action under the spur of necessity does not amount to negligence upon his part sufficient to defeat a recovery." Akers v. New York, 14 Misc. 524, 35 N. Y. Supp. 1099, where however, it does not seem clear that there was any negligence of a third party.

b. Emergency caused by negligence of person injured.

For cases upon the conduct of the defendant in an emergency caused by the negligence of the person injured, see infra, III.

When a man's own negligence has led him into the peril and emergency, then the rule does not apply. McClary v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 46 Fed. 343; Peck v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 50 Conn. 379; Briscoe v. Southern R. Co. 103 Ga. 224, 28 S. E. 638; Rundgren v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. 201 Mass. 156, 87 N. E. 189; Richfield v. Michigan C. R. Co. 110 Mich. 406, 68 N. E. 218; Aiken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 130 Pa. 380, 17 Am. St. Rep. 775, 18 Atl. 619; Chattanooga Electric R. Co. v. Cooper, 109 Tenn. 308, 70 S. E. 72; Smith v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 107 Va. 725, 60 S. E. 56; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Hall, 109 Va. 296, 63 S. E. 1007; Liermann v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 82 Wis. 286, 33 Am. St. Rep. 37, 52 N. W. 91; Haetsch v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 87 Wis. 304, 58 N. W. 393; Dummer v. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. 108 Wis. 589, 84 N. W. 853.

"Conduct which the law requires of those who wrongfully bring themselves into an emergency is not to be measured by that which the law excuses in those who are wrongfully brought into an emergency by others." Lucas v. New Bedford & T. R. Co. 6 Gray, 64, 66 Am. Dec. 406.

In South Chicago City R. Co. v. Kinnare, 216 Ill. 451, 75 N. E. 179, where a bicyclist was injured by a street car, the court, in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, approved the following instruction: "If 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff became frightened or alarmed or confused just before coming into collision with defendant's car, on account of getting suddenly into a position of peril, then such sudden peril will not excuse him for a failure, if there was any, to exercise ordinary care, if you believe from the evidence that he brought himself into such position of peril by reason of his own negligence, if he was negligent, or by reason of running the risk of an obvious and serious danger merely to avoid inconvenience."

Where the plaintiff, knowing that a train was expected, negligently went upon a trestle, and seeing the train coming, jumped from the trestle and was injured, it was held that if the train stopped, as was claimed by some of the witnesses, before it reached the trestle, then the plaintiff could not recover; but if, on the other hand, it did pass the place from which the plaintiff jumped, inasmuch as the engineer had seen the plaintiff, then, on the theory of last clear chance, the defendant was liable. Weeks v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 131 N. C. 78, 42 S. E. 541.

But there have been some cases where the person injured was given the benefit of the emergency rule, although his own negligence brought him into the place of peril.

Thus, in Adams v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 74 Mo. 553, 41 Am. Rep. 333, where it was admitted that the plaintiff's deceased husband was negligent in walking upon a railway trestle, but that the defendant's servants saw him in time to have stopped the train before it reached him, it appeared that the deceased sat down on the end of the ties, and after three or four cars had passed him in safety raised up and was struck and killed. The court said: "One in so perilous a position is not to be held to the exercise of the same care and prudence as if he were in a place of security. The terror, temporarily depriving the deceased of the proper use of his faculties, was produced by the recklessness of defendant's servants managing the train, if they saw him, and could have stopped the train after they discovered him on the trestle, before it reached him."

Where it was the custom of persons to walk along the railroad track where it passed through marshy grounds, and there was no way to get off the track except into a ditch of water or on platforms at intervals, and the plaintiff's intestate was killed by a train which he first saw some 900 feet behind him, having endeavored to gain one of the platforms instead of jumping into the ditch, the court said: "The deceased was placed in a sudden and perilous exigency, and the question is not whether he did the wisest thing possible under the circumstances, but whether he exercised ordinary care and prudence." It may be noted that the court said also as to the question of trespass: "Notwithstanding the trespass of the deceased upon the track, it was undoubtedly the duty of the engineer to exercise ordinary diligence and care to avoid the loss of life." Remer v. Long Island R. Co. 48 Hun, 352, 1 N. Y. Supp. 124, affirmed in 113 N. Y. 669, 21 N. E. 1116.

And in Harrington v. Los Angeles R. Co. 140 Cal. 514, 63 L.R.A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, 74 Pac. 15, the court approved the theory that where the defendant knows of the danger to the injured party which the latter has entered into or incurred by reason of his negligence in failing to discover it, and such defendant recklessly proceeds regardless thereof, he can find no refuge in the fact that the injured party, who does not know of it, would have known if he had used reasonable care to ascertain it, and held that in such a case he who knows of the danger and can avoid it, as against one who does not in fact know thereof, has the last clear opportunity to avoid the accident, and is liable, if the injured party, after discovering his own danger, exercises ordinary care to escape the injury, and that the conduct of the person killed after discovering the danger, who was then in great peril, was a question for the jury as to whether he acted with reasonable prudence under the circumstances, to avoid the danger.

c. Emergency caused by other agencies.

There are but comparatively few cases which discuss the question where the emergency has arisen from a cause other than that of the negligence of the parties.

For the rule where the emergency is caused by the negligence of the defendant and another tortfeasor, see supra, II. a, 2.

In Chattanooga Electric R. Co. v. Cooper, 109 Tenn. 308, 70 S. W. 72, where the plaintiff's intestate, in order to escape an automobile, ran upon the track of the defendant's car and was killed by the car, the court held that while the position of peril must have been reached without the fault of the plaintiff, it was "a mistake to assume, as is done by the plaintiff in error, that the application of this rule is restricted to cases where the peril producing the confusion of judgment, and the consequent false effort to escape, is the negligent act of the party creating the peril." The court said further: "To require that one in the midst of peril, or in the presence of impending danger, should act with the prudence of an ordinarily careful man under ordinary circumstances, would be to put a strain on human nature which all experience shows it would not be able to bear," but the case was reversed, as it was not made plain to the jury that the plaintiff must be without fault in putting himself in the place of peril.

In Wheeler v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 16 Idaho, 375, 102 Pac. 347, it was held that the test was the conduct of a reasonable and prudent person under the circumstances, whether the apparent peril was produced by the defendant or an agent independent of it. In that case the plaintiff's 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) child, with its grandmother, stepped upon the defendant's track to escape from a team of horses which were frightened by an exhaust from the defendant's engine, and the child was killed by cars backing without statutory warning. The court did not seem to consider that there was any negligence in the exhaust.

In Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Lowe, 73 Miss. 203, 19 So. 96, where a nurse carrying one child and leading the other started across a railway track, with plenty of time to cross in safety, but stopped on the track terrified at a cry that some performing bears were loose, and the child she was leading was killed by the train, the court approved the finding that the nurse was not guilty of contributory negligence. The negligence charged against the defendant was running through a city at a high rate of speed, approaching a populous crossing around a curve without ringing the bell or blowing the whistle, and without keeping a proper lookout. The question of imminent peril is not discussed, but the court in its opinion refers to it as follows: "When the nurse started to cross the track, she saw the smoke from the engine and knew that a train was approaching, but the train was several hundred feet away, and she had ample time in which to have prudently gone forward and to have safely crossed the track, even at the high rate of speed at which the train was being run. She failed to so cross, because, when she arrived just on the track, her course was arrested by the general alarm made that the 'bears was loose,' the flight of the crowd in every direction, and the outcries directed to her. Terrified, stunned, incapable of action, the unhappy old nurse stood motionless."

In Cassida v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 14 Or. 551, 13 Pac. 438, the court, in reversing a judgment for the defendant, said: "Here were three little girls who, being frightened by cattle, sought refuge upon the railroad track. They may have been so alarmed and terrified by their fears that they did not look for any train of cars, but, seized with a panic, ran down the trestle work in order to make their escape. It was not necessarily any act 'of commission or omission wrongful in itself.' Their apprehensions of danger from the cattle may not have been well founded, but could have been as potent as though they had been real. It seems to me that the offer to show the circumstances which led to the course they pursued in the case should have been admitted in proof, and submitted to the consideration of the jury."

In Palmer v. Larchmont Horse R. Co. 112 App. Div. 341, 98 N. Y. Supp. 567, where the plaintiff was driving at night along a road and, seeing red lights extending along some distance as a warning of danger because of repairs to the road, he turned to the left upon the defendant's electric car track without looking behind him, and was shortly after struck from the rear by one of the defendant's cars and injured, it was held that he was not, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in the sudden emergency which confronted him.

In Cannon v. Pittsburg & B. Traction Co. 194 Pa. 159, 44 Atl. 1089, where the plaintiff, driving on a street which was only 20 feet wide and had two trolley tracks, hearing a car behind him, drove on the left-hand track to let it pass, and continued on the left-hand track, and while the car was beside him, another car came suddenly into view over a hill approaching in the opposite direction, and ran into his team, the court said: "The only ground on which the plaintiff could be adjudged guilty of contributory negligence is that, when he turned out to let the first car pass, he did not stop and wait until it had passed, and then return to the track which he had left, instead of approaching the crest of the hill on the track on which there was danger of meeting a car. Because of the narrowness and grade of the street, the situation was one calling for extreme caution, but the court could not have said that in going on the plaintiff was negligent. Being familiar with the locality, he had reason to suppose that he might meet a car on the track on which he was driving before he had an opportunity to turn out, but not that he would meet a car running at such speed over the narrow crest of the hill that it could not be stopped in time to avoid a collision after the motorman saw him. . . . He was, moreover, by the necessity of turning out of the track, suddenly placed, without fault on his part, in a position of danger; and, in his effort to extricate himself, he could not be held to the use of the best judgment."

In Moore v. Central R. Co. 47 Iowa, 688, where the plaintiff, to escape from a frightened team of horses which he and his fellow servants had been using, stepped on the track of his master's railway, and was run over by a hand car, a judgment against the master was affirmed. It should be noted that there was some evidence that those on the hand car saw the plaintiff's danger in time to have stopped the car, and there is an intimation in the report that the hand car may have frightened the horses.

In Simeone v. Lindsay, 6 Penn. (Del.) 224, 65 Atl. 778, the court seems to consider that the sudden peril might be caused otherwise than by the negligence of the defendant, as it charged the jury that "while a person will not be held guilty of contributory negligence, who, in the effort to avoid immediate danger, in the exigency of the moment, suddenly and without time or opportunity for reflection, puts himself in the way of other perils without fault on his part, and particularly so if the defendant has placed the person in such position, yet, if a person walks into a danger that the observance of due care would have enabled him to avoid, and is thereby injured, he would be guilty of contributory negligence."

H. 454, 38 Atl. 209, where the plaintiff's intestate, on hearing a train, endeavored to force his horses over the crossing and was killed, it was held that the court properly instructed the jury that "if you find McMurphy was put in sudden peril in consequence of the negligence of the defendants, or for any reason for which he was not responsible, and adopted a course which in ordinary circumstances a prudent person would not have adopted, he is not necessarily chargeable with negligence; but the test is, Would an ordinarily prudent person under the same circumstances have done as he did." But it would seem that there probably was enough in the case to show that the peril was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

In McRae v. Erickson, 1 Cal. App. 326, 82 Pac. 209, the court, having stated that it must be assumed from the evidence and the verdict that the situation was the result of the negligence of the defendants, said also that they were not prepared to hold, "in the absence of negligence on the part of the plaintiff, that it is a material question whether the dangerous situation of plaintiff was the result of defendants' negligence or otherwise."

In Hoff v. Los Angeles P. Co. 158 Cal. 596, 112 Pac. 53, the court, in reversing a nonsuit, lays down the rule as to sudden peril without reference to the negligence of the other party, that is to say without making it a condition that the peril was caused by the negligence of the defendant; but it seems that that was probably the theory of the case.

In Feeney v. Wabash R. Co. 123 Mo. App. 420, 99 S. W. 477, where it does not appear entirely clear that the emergency was due to the negligence of the defendant, the court said of the plaintiff and her driver: "They were in a trap, were suddenly confronted with great danger and, even if it appeared, as it does not, that poor judgment was displayed, we would not hold them accountable in law for losing their heads in a moment of great and imminent peril."

In Martin v. Third Ave. R. Co. 27 App. Div. 52, 50 N. Y. Supp. 284, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, nevertheless said: "If, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, he had placed himself in a position of danger, and, when there, was called upon to act in an emergency, the fact that he did not select the safest course, and was injured, would not as matter of law render him guilty of contributory negligence."

In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Snyder, 55 Ohio St. 342, 60 Am. St. Rep. 700, 45 N. E. 559, the court, in stating the rule as to the person injured, says in the official headnote, "when a person, without his fault, is placed in a situation of danger," etc. In that case the peril or the emergency was created by the negligence of the defendant.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. John- ston, 25 Ohio C. C. 41, the court quotes from the Snyder Case this official headnote, without stating that the emergency was created by the negligence of the defendant; but it seems probable that this was the theory on which the point was decided.

In Mosten v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 218 Pa. 392, 67 Atl. 740, the court invoked the rule without pointing out clearly any negligence on the part of the defendant in creating the emergency, though it seems probable that the court considered that there was such negligence.

The theory that the negligence creating the emergency must be that of the defendant was enforced in Wilson v. Susquehanna Turnp. Road Co. 21 Barb. 68, where a trace became unhitched in going down a hill, and the driver turned the horses to the left at the side of the road, whereupon the plaintiff, riding in the wagon, being afraid that the horse would go over the bank, jumped out upon a pile of stones and was injured. The road was not as wide as was required by the act incorporating the defendant, but it was held that the injury was not caused by any negligence of the defendant, and a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed. The court distinguishes Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. ed. 115, on the ground that there the negligence causing the peril was that of the defendant.

In Trowbridge v. Danville Street-Car Co. 1 Va. Dec. 823, 19 S. E. 780, where it was claimed that the plaintiff's intestate, in order to escape a sudden threatened peril from drays and wagons, came suddenly in front of the defendant's car, the court, in sustaining a verdict for the defendant, said that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, and that the sudden peril referred to in the (unspecified) "authorities cited" was such as the defendant has caused.

So, in the master and servant case of Murphy v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 140 Iowa, 332, 118 N. W. 390, the court lays down the rule that the emergency or ground of apprehension must be due to the negligence of the defendant.

In this connection reference should be made to Wesley City Coal Co. v. Healer, 34 Ill. 126, 1 Mor. Min. Rep. 68, where the owner of a coal mine was negligent in omitting to maintain an extra exit required by the statute and, a fire breaking out in the mine, the men rushed to the shaft, and the plaintiff's husband fell down the shaft and was killed, and it was held that, admitting the fire was accidental, the panic would probably have been averted had there been the extra exit, as the knowledge of this fact would have reassured the workmen; and the jury may well have found that the alarm or fright resulted directly from the want of a second mode of escape. Ibid.

The rule that the conduct of one placed in a sudden emergency is to be tested by the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person son placed in the same emergency is not in reality an exception to the general doctrine of contributory negligence, but a mere application thereof. The conduct of an ordinarily prudent person is the general test applied in determining whether or not one has been guilty of contributory negligence. That test, of course, is to be applied in the light of the surrounding circumstances, which in the cases now under consideration include, among others, the existence of a sudden emergency. Many, perhaps most, of the cases, in stating the rule as to a sudden emergency, use language literally implying that the emergency must have been created by the negligence of the defendant. In most of these cases, however, there was no question of negligence except on the part of the defendant or of the plaintiff, and the courts probably meant merely to negative the applicability of the rule where the emergency was created by the plaintiff's own negligence. Viewing the rule simply as an application of the general doctrine of contributory negligence, it is not apparent how the question whether the emergency was created by the negligence of the defendant or of a third person can be material, assuming that the defendant has been guilty of some act of negligence which may be deemed the proximate cause of the injury, and which, apart from the question of contributory negligence, would sustain a recovery. When negligence on the part of the defendant has been established as a proximate cause of the injury, the liability is established, unless plaintiff did not exercise the care of an ordinarily prudent person. In determining whether or not he did exercise such care, it is necessary to take into consideration the situation existing at the time with reference to which his conduct must be determined, and if at that time he was confronted with a sudden emergency, it would seem to be entirely immaterial, so far as the question of contributory negligence is concerned, whether that emergency was the creation of the defendant's negligence or of that of a third person. To apply the rule that the plaintiff was bound only to exercise the care of an ordinarily prudent person confronted by the same emergency, in a case where the emergency was created by the negligence of a third person, and not by the negligence of the defendant, is not, of course, to permit the plaintiff to recover against the defendant because of the negligence of a third person, since, as before stated, the negligence of the defendant as a proximate cause of the injury must in any event be established. It is merely to refuse to eliminate the sudden emergency created by the negligence of a third person, as a factor in determining whether or not plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence, which may be invoked to relieve the defendant of the consequences of its conceded or established negligence. If the emergency was created by the plain-tiff's own negligence, though the defendant was thereafter guilty of negligence constituting a proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff cannot ordinarily recover, even though his conduct after the emergency arose was that which might be expected from an ordinarily prudent person in the same emergency, for the reason that his conduct is not (as in the case of an emergency created solely by the negligence of the defendant or of a third person) to be considered solely with reference to the situation after the emergency arose, but his original negligence continues as a factor in the situation, and the question of his contributory negligence must be considered with reference to his whole course of conduct, including that which preceded as well as that which followed the emergency.

It is probably, however, logically essential to the Texas doctrine, hereinafter referred to, that the emergency shall have been created by the negligence of defendant.

No recovery without negligence.

There can, of course, be no recovery where there is no negligence.

Thus, where one who was passing along the street was warned of a blast about to be made, and took up a position of safety together with certain of the defendant's employees, and, the blast being very severe, he became terrified and rushed into a position of danger, where he was killed, it was held that the defendant was not liable. Gratz v. McKenzie, 9 Wash. 696, 35 Pac. 377.

Where a passenger jumped from a car after it was found to be off the track, the court said, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff: "The third instruction places the right of recovery on the sole ground of there being an accident, and that plaintiff jumped from the car and was injured, regardless of the question as to whether the defendant was in any manner guilty of negligence, and regardless of the question as to whether the plaintiff was in the exercise of the same care when he jumped from the train as would have been exercised by a man of ordinary care and prudence under the same circumstances." Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Klein, 43 Ill. App. 63.

d. Texas cases.

In Texas, since the Neff Case infra, the test of the ordinarily prudent man under the circumstances is not considered a practical one.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Neff, 87 Tex. 303, 28 S. W. 283, the court criticized the qualification, "if the acts done were such as an ordinarily prudent person might have been expected to do under like circumstances," and says: "If the standard by which the conduct of the imperiled party is to be judged is to be that which a person of ordinary prudence might be expected to do under like circumstances, how can it be determined what a man of prudence would do under such conditions? A jury is presumed from their knowledge of men and their affairs in ordinary transactions, to know what a man of ordinary prudence would do under a given state of facts; but when prudence itself is destroyed, and judgment yields to sudden impulse, when there is neither time nor capacity to reflect, how can anyone say what a man prudent under ordinary circumstances would do if he should be so situated? The rule is sound and just, which holds the party guilty of negligence responsible for the result, if that negligence has caused another to be surrounded by such circumstances as to him appear to threaten the destruction of his life or serious injury to his person, whether that person be prudent or imprudent, if, in an effort to save his life, he makes a choice of means from which injury results, and notwithstanding it may turn out that if he had done differently, or had done nothing, he would have escaped injury altogether." This last quotation is partly quoted in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Rogers, 91 Tex. 52, 40 S. W. 956. The theory of the Neff case is approved in International & G. N. R. Co. v. Sein, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 33 S. W. 558; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Byrd, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 61 S. W. 147; Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. v. Eddleman, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 181, 114 S. W. 425.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Knott, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 158, 36 S. W. 491, a case of master and servant, the court, referring to the Neff Case, said: "Under this rule it is not required that the act of the party which results in his own injury should be such as might have been expected from an ordinarily prudent person under like circumstances. Such qualification, by the opinion in the case referred to, is deemed to be useless, if not calculated to confuse the jury, when expressed in a charge; and it may now in this state be considered eliminated from the rule which before obtained in cases of this character."

The Neff rule is also approved in Bryant v. International & G. N. R. Co. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 88, 46 S. W. 82, where the court reversed a judgment for the defendant by reason of the following instruction: "Although there may have been apparent danger to plaintiff, yet, if there was in fact no danger, defendant would not be liable for plaintiff's imaginary danger."

In San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Peterson, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 495, 49 S. W. 924, the court approved the following instruction: "If you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the issue submitted to you, in the manner charged, and that, as a proximate result of such negligence (if any), the plaintiff was placed in a dangerous situation, where he must adopt a perilous alternative; or where, in the terror of an emergency for which he was not responsible (if you so find), and for which defendant was responsible (if you so find), he acted wildly or negligently, and suffered in consequence,—such negligent conduct, under such circumstances (if any), is not contributory negligence, for the reason that persons in great peril, when not caused by their acts, are not required to exercise all that presence of mind and carefulness which are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances.”

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Van Belle, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 511, 64 S. W. 397, where Van Belle caught his foot between the rails in the yards of his employer, and was run over, the court approved the following instruction: “In determining whether or not said Emil Van Belle used such means to extricate himself from his perilous position, if you believe he did get his foot fastened as alleged, and avoid the danger, as a reasonably prudent person would have used under like circumstances, you are authorized to take into consideration whether or not the said Emil Van Belle was excited to such an extent that the means to extricate himself was not thought of by him, and would not have been thought of by a reasonably prudent person under like circumstances, there being no allegation that the deceased, Emil Van Belle, was excited so as to render proper and prudent action on his part impossible, and the evidence showing that the time was ample for him to have extricated himself had he been so fastened and excited.”

In Saunders v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 35 Tex. Civ. App. 383, 80 S. W. 387, where the defendant was charged with running an engine at high speed, and in unnecessarily blowing a whistle frightening the mules of the plaintiff, and it was claimed by the defendant that the plaintiff should have dismounted from his wagon, the court said: “The court charged the jury in effect that if, after the team became frightened, the plaintiff could have dismounted from the wagon with safety; and if, under the circumstances, a man of ordinary prudence would have dismounted,—the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. This charge is objected to on the ground that it ignored and eliminated the question of imminent peril. The objection is well taken. The rule is that when one person is placed in a perilous position by the wrongful act of another, the person so situated is not required to exercise the same degree of care that a person of ordinary prudence would have exercised.”

In Texas Midland R. Co. v. Byrd, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 184, 90 S. W. 185, the court said: “If the servants of appellant operating the train in question were guilty of negligence in not signaling its approach sooner than they did, and by reason of such negligence appellee was placed in a position of real or apparent danger, and, impelled by sudden terror produced thereby, jumped from the trestle, or fell in his effort to escape such danger, and was not himself, under all the circumstances, guilty of contributory negligence in walking upon said trestle, then appellant would be liable, whether appellee acted prudently or imprudently to avoid the danger or apprehended danger,” but the judgment for the plaintiff was reversed upon another ground. (On an appeal after a subsequent trial, it was held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in going upon the trestle. 102 Tex. 263, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 429, 115 S. W. 1163, 20 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 137.)

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Bryant, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 54 S. W. 364, the court, referring to a former appeal in the same case, says: “It was then held that the issue of contributory negligence was not only not raised by the evidence, but that parties placed in a perilous position by the negligence of another were not held to any degree of care; that if it should afterwards appear that, had they remained still and done nothing, the injury would have been avoided, recovery would not be defeated thereby. 19 Tex. Civ. App. 88, 46 S. W. 82. The trial court, in submitting the case to the jury, followed that decision, and we are of opinion there was no error in so doing. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Neff, 87 Tex. 303, 28 S. W. 285.”

Where the plaintiff's wife, who was being scalded by steam from a locomotive, in attempting to escape ran into a post and was injured, the court, following the Neff Case, said that the trial court properly instructed the jury in substance “that if plaintiff's wife was, by the negligent act of appellant, placed in a situation of danger, and, in order to save herself from the danger, acted wildly and negligently, such act on her part would not prevent a recovery by plaintiff.” Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Tullis, 41 Tex. Civ. App. 219, 91 S. W. 317.

But in Texas Midland R. Co. v. Booth, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 322, 80 S. W. 121, the court reversed the case on account of the following clause in an instruction: “‘And that in her efforts to save herself and her child from the danger of being thrown from said wagon, undertook to alight therefrom,’ because it assumes as a fact that . . . [the woman referred to] was in danger of being thrown from the wagon.” And the court, while citing the Neff Case, says, as to the question of apparent danger: “We understand, of course, that the rule in such cases is not what an ordinarily prudent person would do under the same circumstances. At the same time, we are of opinion that it is not every appearance of danger, however slight, which will relieve the injured party from the exercise of ordinary care. In our opinion, the rule is that there must be either a real danger or that the circumstances as they appear to the party at the time must be such as to create in the mind of such person a reasonable apprehension of danger. Otherwise the fright and consequent injuries could hardly be held to have been such a reasonable consequence of the negligence of defendant as to constitute such negligent act the proximate cause of the injury."

In Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. Oslin, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 370, 63 S. W. 1039, the court seems to have instructed the jury as if the rule in Texas was similar to that in other states; but as the judgment was for the plaintiff, this point was not considered.

Where the plaintiff, an employee of a consignee of oils, was unscrewing the cap on an oil car, for the purpose of connecting the hose, and, by the negligence of the defendant, as was found by the jury, one of the valves was open so that the oil gushed over the face and eyes of the plaintiff, and he then endeavored to put the cap back to stop the oil, and it further gushed over his face and eyes, inflicting injuries, it was held that his action under the circumstances, in endeavoring to put back the cap, was not contributory negligence. Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. v. Wittnebert, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 104 S. W. 424.

III. Conduct of defendant.

In LEMAY v. SPRINGFIELD STREET R. Co. the court concedes that the fact of the emergency is one of the circumstances in which the conduct of the defendant is to be viewed by the jury. This is in accord with Tozier v. Haverhill & A. Street R. Co. 187 Mass. 179, 72 N. E. 953, where the court, after holding that there was no error in refusing the following instruction: "If the jury find that the motorman did not exercise the best judgment which the case discloses could have been exercised, he being called upon to act in a sudden emergency, his error would not be such negligence as would make the defendant liable," said: "If the request contained nothing but a statement of the familiar principle that, in determining whether one acts with reasonable care in a sudden emergency, the fact that he is obliged to act quickly and without an opportunity for deliberation is to be taken into account, and he is not to be deemed careless merely because he failed to do that which would have been best as shown by subsequent events, it properly might have been given. . . . But it went further, and included the proposition that the motorman's error in not exercising the best judgment in a sudden emergency, if the jury found such an error, would not be actionable negligence, whatever the error might be in other particulars," gross or otherwise.

But the doctrine of many of the cases is less guarded.

Where a motorman confronted with the emergency of a collision threw off the power and jumped from the car and attempted to remove it from the track, and in his haste did not completely throw off the power, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, whose injury in some degree was due to the fact that the power was not cut off, said: "Persons who have to act in a sudden emergency are not to be judged in the light of after events, but are to be judged, under all the circumstances of the case, by the standard of what a prudent person would have been likely to do under the same circumstances. Whether the failure of the motorman to turn the controller so as to completely shut off the power before he jumped from the car was negligence was a question of fact, to be determined from all the circumstances and in view of the evidence tending to prove that he was confronted with a sudden emergency and an unexpected danger, which required prompt and immediate action." Barnes v. Danville Street R. Co. 235 Ill. 506, 128 Am. St. Rep. 237, 85 N. E. 921.

Where the plaintiff's intestate was under a car the wheels of which rolled upon his leg, and no negligence was claimed against the defendant for this act, but it was charged with negligence in that its superintendent of the yard, in an endeavor to extricate the plaintiff's intestate, ordered that the train be backed, and it was backed and ran over his body and killed him, it was claimed on the part of the defendant that one acting in a sudden crisis was not required to exercise that deliberate judgment which time for reflection affords. The court, while agreeing with the doctrine in general, stated that the jury were warranted in finding that the superintendent was guilty of negligence in backing the train, when the result was obvious to the casual observer. American Car & Foundry Co. v. Inzer, — Ind. App. —, 86 N. E. 444, reversed on another ground in 172 Ind. 56, 87 N. E. 722.

In Bittner v. Crosstown Street R. Co. 153 N. Y. 76, 60 Am. St. Rep. 588, 46 N. E. 1044, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, said that if the jury "could believe the evidence of the witness Toms, that the car had passed so far beyond the boy, and then, while he was still alive, was backed down upon him, and again was sent over him, they could, perhaps, say that the motorman was careless in the management of his car at the time, and that, through such carelessness, the boy was in fact killed. But if they believed that the motorman was endeavoring, in the exercise of his judgment, to prevent injury to the boy, then there was no carelessness on his part, but merely an error of judgment, for which the defendant could not be held responsible. Upon the evidence, it appears that the motorman was confronted with a sudden emergency, and it should have been distinctly stated to the jury that if, in what he did, he used his judgment, the defendant was not responsible, even if it was an error which brought about the lamentable results claimed. Even the failure to exercise the best judgment would not be evidence of negligence."

In Stabenau v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 155 N. Y. 511, 63 Am. St. Rep. 698, 50 N. E. 277, reversing 89 Hun, 609, it was held that there was no negligence in the motorman of the defendant choosing one of two methods of stopping his car. The court said: "Whether the one or the other means provided for stopping the car should have been adopted was a matter for the exercise of the motorman's judgment, and, though newly employed, he was not shown to be incompetent. For an error in its exercise, the defendant could not be held responsible. Even the failure to have exercised the best judgment would not have been evidence of negligence."

In Wynn v. Central Park, N. & E. River R. Co. 133 N. Y. 575, 30 N. E. 721, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that there was not any evidence of want of skill on the part of the driver of a car which was running downhill with a broken brake, said that, while they did not see any evidence that there was any failure to exercise the best judgment which the case rendered possible, a failure to exercise the best judgment which the case rendered possible cannot clearly be claimed as evidence of a lack of care or skill.

In Lewis v. Long Island R. Co. 162 N. Y. 52, 56 N. E. 548, the following instruction was held to be error: "If you find that the engineer of the defendant's train, after seeing the horses attached to the trolley in which plaintiff was seated, omitted to do any act which might have prevented the collision, or might have lessened the danger to plaintiff, defendant was guilty of negligence." The court said: "Where an employee of a railroad company is confronted with a sudden emergency, the failure on his part to exercise the best judgment the case renders possible does not establish lack of care and skill upon his part, which renders the company liable."

... The short period of time in which he was obliged to act, the impending danger to his train, to himself, to his passengers, and to others, with the consequent excitement attending such a situation, the various acts required to stop or lessen the speed of the train, and all the other circumstances surrounding him at the time, should have been presented to the jury and considered by it before it could properly find the defendant negligent by reason of the acts of its engineer. By the portion of the charge under consideration, the jury was permitted to find the defendant negligent without regard to these facts and circumstances, and to hold it liable for any mistaken exercise of judgment upon the part of the engineer."

Where a flagman at a crossing suddenly confronted the plaintiff's horses with his lantern, and stopped them from continuing on over the crossing, it was held that if there was any negligence in the manner of action of the flagman, it was the act of a man in emergency saving human life which was apparently in peril; therefore, he was not negligent. Floyd v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 162 Pa. 29, 29 Atl. 396.

Where gasoline from a lamp on the defendant's premises had taken fire, and as one of the servants was carrying it to the door it burst into flames, severely burning him, and he threw it from him injuring the plaintiff, it was held that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant, as the servant was not negligent in acting as he did in the sudden peril which had overtaken him. Donahue v. Kelly, 181 Pa. 93, 59 Am. St. Rep. 632, 37 Atl. 186.

In Phillips v. People's Pass. R. Co. 190 Pa. 222, 42 Atl. 686, the court, in reversing a judgment for the plaintiff, while not satisfied that there was any lack of wisdom in the course pursued by the motorman, said: "It cannot be said that he was bound, upon being confronted by so sudden and immediate a danger, to do what after mature deliberation would have seemed to a prudent man to be the wisest thing under the circumstances. Where the sole basis of liability is the omission to perform a certain duty suddenly and unexpectedly arising, there must be not only a consciousness of the facts which raise the duty on the part of the person who is charged with its performance, but also a reasonable opportunity to perform it."

Where the motorman of an electric car saw a boy riding on the steps of a car of a steam railroad approaching him on a parallel track, and there being not sufficient space between the two tracks to enable the cars to pass without injuring the boy in his then position, the court, in affirming a nonsuit, said: "With a clear understanding that the boy would be injured unless he got out of the way of the electric car, the motorman called and motioned to him to jump off or climb on the bumper. Possibly under the circumstances it would have been better to stop the car, and thus lessen the injury, than attempt to avert it altogether; but since he was confronted by a sudden and unexpected danger, and had but a moment in which to act, the motorman cannot be held liable for failure to see and follow what might appear on reflection to have been the wiser course." Ackerman v. Union Traction Co. 205 Pa. 477, 55 Atl. 16.

Where a fire had broken out in a mine, and the plaintiff's intestate, who was killed, might have been saved if the fan of the mine had not been stopped, the court, in holding that the defendant was not liable for the stopping of the fan, said: "The evidence discloses that, at the time the fire was discovered by the men upon the outside of the mine, they were suddenly placed in a situation demanding immediate action, and that in the excitement and confusion occasioned by the discovery of the fire, and peril of the men below, and not knowing the precise location of the fire, they decided to do, and did do, what seemed to them best at the time. If what was done was not the best thing that could have been done, it nevertheless cannot be deemed an act of negligence, but must be considered a mere error of judgment, for which the company cannot be held responsible." Hughes v. Oregon Improv. Co. 20 Wash. 294, 55 Pac. 119.

But in Bessemer Land & Improv. Co. v. Campbell, 121 Ala. 50, 77 Am. St. Rep. 17, 25 So. 793, the court held that in considering the actions of the superintendent of a mine for the rescue, etc., of miners, and with reference to his closing the mine or ordering it closed, there was no predicate for the application of the in extremis rule in any case, in the absence of personal peril to the party seeking to have his conduct measured by reference to it.

Where one of a hand car crew was killed, and the question was as to the negligence of the defendant's foreman when he saw a train approaching, the court said: "It may be that the section foreman had the option of a safer course than the one he adopted; but, even then, we should not impute negligence to such mere error of judgment. Such mere error of judgment does not have within it the elements of negligence. We conclude, therefore, that where there are two or more different lines of action, any one of which may be taken, and a person with ordinary skill, in the presence of imminent danger, is compelled immediately to choose one of them, and does so in good faith, the mere fact that it is afterwards ascertained by the result that his choice was not the best means of escape cannot be imputed to him as negligence." Gumz v. Chicago, St. P. & M. R. Co. 52 Wis. 672, 10 N. W. 11.

Where the plaintiff was injured by a horse that was running away, Lindley, J., said in his opinion: "It is said that negligence is to be inferred from the fact that the driver did not call out or give warning. I cannot see that that per se affords any ground for inferring negligence. The coachman himself was in fear for his own life; and the probability is that in such circumstances even a cool man might abstain from calling out." Manzoni v. Douglas, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 145, 50 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 289, 29 Week. Rep. 425, 45 J. P. 391.

Where a passenger on a street car on runners was injured on account of the running away of the horses, and it was claimed that the driver could have directed them straight down the street, instead of permitting them to make a usual turn into a side street on the usual route, while the judgment was for the plaintiff, the jury expressly found that the driver was without fault. The court said: "The driver had to decide what to do in a very brief interval, and under unusual and trying circumstances; and clearly negligence is not predicable of his action, and so the jury have found." Rainnie v. St. John City R. Co. 31 N. B. 582.

In Pond v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 111 Va. 735, 69 S. E. 949, it was held that the defendant's servant could not be required to adopt the wisest possible action to avert an accident.

So, in Bishop v. Belle City Street R. Co. 92 Wis. 139, 65 N. W. 733, it was held that the defendant's motorman was not liable merely for failing to choose that course which, after the result was ascertained, might seem to have been the best.

In New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kistler, 66 Ohio St. 326, 64 N. E. 130, the court said obiter: "While engineers of locomotives are expected from their training, experience, and the nature of their duties, to be equal to almost any emergency in the management of their trains, yet it must be remembered in their favor that they have mind and nerves the same as other people, and that, when they are suddenly and unexpectedly confronted with imminent peril or danger to themselves or to the persons and property in their charge, by obstructions on the track or about to go thereon, they cannot be held to a strict course of conduct to prevent injury to persons or property not connected with the train, so that the action taken is in good faith, and at the time believed to be the best."

In Todd v. Daniels, 153 Ill. App. 223, it was held that where, in a certain emergency caused by an unavoidable accident, the facts that an order given by one in charge of servants was not the best order under the circumstances, and in consequence of it one of the servants was injured, would not establish negligence in the giving of the order.

But in Macdonald v. Thibaudeau, Rap. Jud. Quebec 8 B. R. 449, where a fire broke out in the defendant's warehouse, and as the employees were coming down the stairs the defendant's foreman told them to go back to their work as there was no danger, and the daughter of the plaintiff, who was among several of the employees who went back, later opened a window to escape from the smoke or to get the air, and fell or jumped out of the window and was killed, it was held that the defendant could not defend on the ground that his foreman under the emergency had perhaps not taken the best course, as he was liable for not letting the employees proceed out of the building, or in advising against it.

Limitations of doctrine.

In certain relations and under some circumstances there is little place for the doctrine.

In Lewark v. Parkinson, 73 Kan. 553, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1069, 85 Pac. 601, where the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the defendants, who ran a line of hacks, the court held that it was proper to refuse the following instruction: "You are instructed that carriers are not liable for mistaken exercise of judgment on the part of their servants in an emergency, nor for a failure upon the part of their servants to act with the utmost promptitude when the circumstances are such as to afford no time for deliberation." The court said: "This was properly refused; the negligence of the carrier in permitting the emergency to arise is lost sight of in the instruction. Moreover, it was not a correct statement of the law with respect to the liabilities of a common carrier for injuries caused to a passenger by the negligence of the carrier."

Where the defendant's elevator, carrying a number of passengers, stopped between two floors and could not be moved, and the president of the company, being notified, sent for the engineer, who after some time did an act which precipitated the elevator to the ground, it was held that this was not a case of one compelled to act in a certain emergency, as there was no apparent danger as long as the elevator remained untouched, and as a matter of law the defendant was required to exercise the highest degree of care for the safety of those in the elevator. Savage v. Joseph H. Bauland Co. 42 App. Div. 285, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1014.

In Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Smith, 38 Ind. App. 160, 77 N. E. 1140, it was held that there was no error in instructing the jury under the circumstances of the case that it was the duty of a motorman to exercise the highest degree of care to avoid injury to a person after discovering his peril; but in this case it seems that there was no evidence that the motorman attempted to stop his car.

In Valin v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 82 Wis. 1, 33 Am. St. Rep. 17, 51 N. W. 1984, where an engineer justified his failure to blow the whistle when he saw a man on foot driving a team of horses close to the track, by stating that they were standing still and he was afraid he would frighten the horses onto the right of way, the court said the horses were already on the right of way, and the reason given was unworthy of any consideration whatever.

In Blackwell v. O'Gorman Co. 22 R. I. 33, 49 Atl. 28, it was held that where the peril is caused by the defendant, he cannot claim that in the emergency he should not be held to ordinary judgment.

The doctrine denied.

In O'Rourke v. Lindell R. Co. 142 Mo. 342, 44 S. W. 254, where the plaintiff was a passenger on another railway, and was injured by a collision with the Lindell railway, it was held that there was no error in refusing to instruct the jury that in determining whether the motorman of the Lindell Railway Company exercised ordinary care, the jury must judge its condition in view of all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence as they existed at the time he had to act, and not by what may seem best to them when considering the facts after the accident." The court said: "The rule invoked relieves the injured party of the duty of exercising the care required of a prudent person, but does not excuse from his legal duty the party by whom the injury is inflicted, though by the negligence of a third person he was drawn into a situation which made imminent the danger of inflicting the injury. Plaintiff had no control over the Suburban Railway Company, and its negligence, if it was negligent, cannot be imputed to her."

Emergency created by negligence of person injured.

Where by the misconduct of the person injured, the defendant is placed in a position where he has to act in a certain emergency, he is not liable for a mistake of judgment. Robinson v. Manhattan R. Co. 5 Misc. 209, 25 N. Y. Supp. 91.

In Wise Terminal Co. v. McCormick, 104 Va. 400, 51 S. E. 731, where one servant of the defendant claimed that another servant was negligent in not doing all that he could to stop his engine after the plaintiff was under it, the court said: "Here the party doing the injury, i. e., the watchman or acting engineer, Taylor, claims, and as we think properly, that, having been suddenly put into an emergency by the negligence of the plaintiff, the latter could not require of him the wisest possible action. In other words, if the view of the plaintiff in this case be correct, A, by his gross negligence, may require action on the part of B to save him from the consequences of his own fault, and if B does not automatically and instantly do that which will conduce to his safety, B is liable. Having no reason whatever to expect that the plaintiff or anyone else would on a dark night attempt to mount the engine in his charge from the middle of the track in front, or be on the track where the engine could inflict an injury upon him, Taylor was, by the negligence of the plaintiff, suddenly put into an emergency when and where the wisest possible action on his part could not be reasonably required of him."

Where a man's boat by his own negligence got in the wash of the vessel of a third person, and then under the rake of a boat towed by the defendant's steamer, and he was drowned, it was held that it could not be claimed that his death was due to the fact that the steamer's crew had not, on the spur of the moment, used the best judgment as to what to do to rescue him. Brown v. French, 104 Pa. 604.

This case was followed in Sekerak v. Jutte, 153 Pa. 117, 25 Atl. 994, where a person drowned had by his own fault placed himself in front of a steamer which ran him down, and there was but a moment of time to enable those on the steamer to look out for his safety, the court, in holding that they did everything that could have been done, approved the doctrine that a mistake in judgment in a great and sudden emergency of that kind could not be considered as carelessness.

In this connection reference may be made to Illinois Steel Co. v. Rolewicz, 113 Ill. App. 312, where a servant was placed in a precarious position without any negligence of his master, and it was held that the master was not liable because other servants were not prompt in the emergency to rescue the plaintiff.

IV. Miscellaneous.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Daniels, 8 Ga. App. 775, 70 S. E. 203, it appeared that the plaintiff, driving his automobile, came upon the defendant's track, owing to its negligence in leaving the bars up. He was notified by the watchman that a train was coming on the first track, where he had stopped, and the plaintiff pushed the car from behind onto the middle track, when he was again notified that there was a train coming on that track, and he pushed the car over onto the third track. After the train had gone by, the gates were lifted, and he, then forgetting in his excitement that his car had the maximum power turned on, started it in that condition, when he was seriously injured, and it was held that the petition was not bad on demurrer, as the question was one for the jury.

In Lowery v. Manhattan R. Co. 99 N. Y. 158, 52 Am. Rep. 12, 1 N. E. 608, the defendant dropped ashes from its railroad into the street negligently, upon a driver and his horse. The horse ran away, and the driver endeavored to drive him against the post of the elevated railroad, and then into the curbstone, but was thrown out, and the horse ran over the plaintiff. It was held that there was no error in finding the defendant guilty of the injury. The court said: "The driver was passing along in pursuit of his customary business, driving his horse, when suddenly the falling of the fire upon himself and the horse placed him in a position of great danger, and he was justified in attempting to save his own life and protect himself from injury. If he made a mistake in his judgment, the company was not relieved from liability."

Where the plaintiff was injured by a coal cart being thrown against him by a collision of the cart with one of the defendant's trains, it was held that if the accident was due to a sudden and instinctive effort on the part of the coal cart driver to escape impending danger after receiving warning thereof, there not being sufficient time to form an intelligent and deliberate judgment as to the best means of escape, negligence was not imputable to him. Quill v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 16 Daly, 313, 11 N. Y. Supp. 80, affirmed in 126 N. Y. 629, 27 N. E. 410.

It may be noted that in Filippone v. Reisenburger, 135 App. Div. 707, 119 N. Y. Supp. 632, where the defendant, in order to get upon a runway where the plaintiff stood, stepped upon a barrel, which turned over or fell over, and the defendant, in order to save himself from falling, caught hold of the plaintiff's feet and caused him to fall, injuring him, it was held that no actionable negligence was shown. The court said the case "must be disposed of as governed by the principle of pressing danger, as applied in Laidlaw v. Sage, 158 N. Y. 73, 44 L.R.A. 216, 52 N. E. 679, and in this way expressed in Moak's Underhill on Torts, p. 14: 'The law presumes that an act or omission done or neglected under the influence of pressing danger was done or neglected involuntarily.'"

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

M. C. FERRELL, Admr., etc., of Samuel Ferrell, Deceased,

v.

DIXIE GOTTON MILLS, Appt.

(157 N. C. 528, 73 S. E. 142.)

Electricity — dangerous guy wire — injury to trespassing child.

1. A corporation which permits a guy wire to get loose and hang against wires carrying a deadly current of electricity to its factory, at a place used, to its knowledge, actual or imputed, by children of the neighborhood as a playground, will be liable for the death of a child who comes in contact with the wire, although he is in fact a trespasser.

Same — warning — effect.

2. That small children had been driven away from a pole from which a guy wire hung in contact with wires carrying a deadly electrical current, about which they were trespassers, but were in the habit of playing, does not absolve the owner of the pole from liability in case one is injured by coming in contact with the wire.

Same — location of pole — effect.

3. Whether a pole carrying a deadly current of electricity from which a wire is allowed to hang in a dangerous condition is on or off from property rented by its owner to the parent of a child injured by coming in contact with the wire is immaterial on the question of liability for the injury, if the owner had sole control of it.

Note. — As to duty, in stringing electric wires, to guard against danger to children, see notes to Temple v. McComb City Electric Light & P. Co. 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 449, and Wetherby v. Twin State Gas & Electric Co. 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1220. As to doctrine of attractive nuisance, see note to Cabill v. Stone, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1094. And generally, as to duty of property owner toward trespassing children, see note to Walsh v. Pittsburg R. Co. 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559.

Negligence — failure to watch child — dangerous playground.

4. Parents, one of whom is away from home all day and the other is engaged in household duties, are not negligent as matter of law in permitting their six-year-old child to go out of doors to play without someone to watch him, although near the house is a pole from which hangs a dangerous guy wire.

(December 23, 1911.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Iredell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Z. V. Turlington and H. P. Grier, for appellant:

Plaintiff cannot recover, and should have been nonsuited.

The authorities cited by the attorneys for appellee are fully set out in the opinion.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The negligence charged against the defendant is the maintaining by it of a highly dangerous and deadly condition and instrumentality on premises which were uninclosed, and which were in an attractive place to children, and on which premises defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable care ought to have known, that small children were accustomed to play. There was ample evidence to sustain this allegation. The contention of the appellant is that the child was a trespasser, to whom it owed no duty except to refrain from wilfully injuring it. If the injury had been to a person of such mature age that he could appreciate the nature of his acts, and the dangers attached to the situation, we would agree with this contention. But when, as in this case, the injury is suffered by a six-year-old boy, under such circumstances and surrounding conditions as the evidence showed to exist, a different rule of law governs the conduct and liability of the defendant. What did this six-year-old boy know about the dangers of electricity? What could he possibly have known about the rules of property and the laws of trespass? Technically he may have been a trespasser on defendant's land; but all he knew about it was that it was an attractive place to play, and that it was where he and the other little children of the neighborhood were accustomed to play, and had been playing for months past. The defendant knew, or ought to have known, that this pole with the loose guy wire attached to it was an instrument of death, which might become effective to anyone who came in contact with it. The defendant also knew, or ought to have known, that the children were in the habit of playing about this pole, and that they were also in the habit of swinging on this loose guy wire. Under these circumstances, the law will not permit the defendant to allege a technical trespass and thereby shield itself from the consequences of its negligence, resulting in the death of the son of the plaintiff.

The doctrine of the "turntable cases" was first before this court in the case of Kramer v. Southern R. Co. 127 N. C. 328, 52 L.R.A. 359, 37 S. E. 468. There the nine-year-old son of plaintiff was killed by climbing upon a pile of cross-ties negligently stacked by defendant in an unused portion of one of the streets of the town of Marion. The court held that plaintiff's son was not a trespasser; but it further says: "If he was too young to be bound by any rule as to contributory negligence, and had a habit of playing, with other boys, on the cross-ties, with the knowledge of the defendant, and without the defendant's attempting to prevent such sport, or to take precautions against injury to the children, then the defendant was negligent. In such a case the defendant's negligence would not consist in piling the cross-ties in the street, but it would consist in its failure to guard against injury to the children, after it had learned of their habit of playing on the ties, and its failing to provide against their injury."

62 S. E. 600, plaintiff was not permitted to recover, as the evidence failed to show that the premises of defendant were especially attractive to children, or that children were accustomed to play there; and also that this rule of law had never been held applicable in the case of a boy thirteen years of age. But, in the course of the opinion, Mr. Justice Connor states his approval of the rule of law which we think is applicable to the case in hand. On page 411 of 148 N. C., he says, quoting from 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 473: "A party's liability to trespassers depends on the former's contemplation of the likelihood of their presence on the premises and the probability of injuries from contact with conditions existing thereon." Immediately following this language, the editor says: "The doctrine that the owner of premises may be liable in negligence to trespassers whose presence on the premises was either known or might reasonably have been anticipated is well applied in the rule of numerous cases that one who maintains dangerous implements or appliances on uninclosed premises, of a nature likely to attract children in play, or permits dangerous conditions to exist thereon, is liable to a child who is so injured, though a trespasser at the time when the injuries are received; and with stronger reason when the presence of a child trespasser is actually known to a party, or when such presence would have been known had reasonable care been exercised."

In the case of Harrington v. Wadesboro, 153 N. C. 437, 69 S. E. 399, plaintiff was permitted to recover for the death of her son, a seventeen-year-old boy, who was killed by catching hold of a wire which was hanging low over a path used by people in going to a moving-picture show. The Harrington Case, supra; Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 203, 26 L.R.A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786, 19 S. E. 344; Mitchell v. Raleigh Electric Co. 129 N. C. 166, 55 L.R.A. 398, 85 Am. St. Rep. 735, 39 S. E. 801, as well as other cases in our reports, lay down the rule that persons and corporations dealing in electricity are held to the highest degree of care in maintenance and inspection of their wires, poles, etc. This rule is well stated in Mitchell's Case, supra: "In behalf of human life, and the safety of mankind generally, it behooves those who would profit by the use of this subtle and violent element of nature to exercise the greatest degree of care and constant vigilance in inspecting and maintaining the wires in perfect condition." See Hicks v. Western U. Teleg. Co. — N. C. —, 73 S. E. 139.

Pa. 384, 123 Am. St. Rep. 668, 68 Atl. 968, presents a state of facts almost exactly similar to the facts in this case. There the eleven-year-old son of plaintiff was killed by getting into a gas engine erected on a vacant uninclosed lot by defendant. The lot lay between two dwelling houses owned by defendant, in one of which the parents of the boy had formerly lived. The lot had been used as a sort of common, and as a playground for the children. There was a path across it. The court says: "A fair inference is that heedlessly, or without appreciating the danger, the child ventured too near and was injured. Under these circumstances he cannot fairly be regarded as a mere trespasser. The lot was really an appurtenance to the two houses and was a part of the curtilage."

As in the above case, we think that from the evidence in this case it is reasonable to infer that this pole was within the curtilage of plaintiff's dwelling. He says that it was right at, or near to, the corner of his uninclosed garden patch, only a short distance from his home.

In sustaining a recovery by the plaintiff in Mattson v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 95 Minn. 477, 70 L.R.A. 503, 111 Am. St. Rep. 483, 104 N. W. 443, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 498, it is said: "It [the defendant] failed to take proper care of dynamite brought into this vicinity, and left it exposed upon premises where children had, to the knowledge of its servants, been in the habit of loitering and amusing themselves."

In Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484, an eight-year-old boy was drowned in a gravel pit situated on an uninclosed vacant lot belonging to defendant. The court says: "The owner of land where children are allowed or accustomed to play, particularly if it is unfenced, must use ordinary care to keep it in a safe condition; for they, being without judgment, and likely to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger, are not to be classed with trespassers, idlers, and mere licensees." 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 705; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 53, and cases in note. In such case the owner should reasonably anticipate the injury which has happened. 1 Thomp. Neg. 304."

Tackett v. Henderson Bros. Co. 12 Cal. App. 658, 108 Pac. 151, cites at length the cases of Mitchell v. Raleigh Electric Co. and Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. supra, and approves the doctrine there laid down. It is there held: "A person or company using wires charged with an electric current is bound, while the public is not, not only to know the extent of the danger arising from them, but to use the very highest degree of care practical to avoid injury."

In Olson v. Gill Home Invest. Co. 58 Wash. 151, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 884, 108 Pac. 140, it is said: "Here the appellants, having no apparent use for the dynamite, and knowing of the trespassing proclivities of the boys, needlessly stored it, a most dangerous agency, where, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, they should have anticipated the trespassing boys would readily find, be attracted by, and take it. Under such circumstances, we cannot hold that the trespassing of the boys should, as a matter of law, excuse the appellants from liability." The boys above mentioned were thirteen and fourteen years of age, and the dynamite was stored in an unlocked building on a vacant, uninclosed lot.

In Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193, it is held: "Defendant piled lumber, in a large city, on an unfenced lot which the public were accustomed to cross and children to play upon, in a negligent manner, so that it fell upon and killed a young infant who was playing on the lot near it. Held, that a recovery was justifiable."

In Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 93 Pac. 570, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1004, an eight-year-old boy was drowned in a conduit situated near a schoolhouse. Entrance to the conduit was barred up; but one of the bars had been broken for a year or more, and children had played in and about it for several years, and its condition had been brought to the notice of the city authorities. The court says: "We are constrained to hold, therefore, that the doctrine of the turntable cases should be applied to all things that are uncommon and are artificially produced, and which are attractive and alluring to children of immature judgment and discretion, and are inherently dangerous, and where it is practical to guard them without serious inconvenience and without great expense to the owner."

In Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, 50 Pac. 450, an eleven-year-old boy was drowned in defendant's reservoir. The reservoir was fenced; but there was a kind of stile over the fence, and defendant had knowledge that boys played about the reservoir, fishing and indulging in other sports. The court says: "To maintain upon one's property enticements to the ignorant or unwary is tantamount to an invitation to visit and to inspect and enjoy; and in such cases the obligation to endeavor to protect from the dangers of the seductive instrument of place follows as justly as though the invitation had been express. . . . It would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon, baited with meat, so that his neighbor's dog, attracted by his natural instincts, might run into it and be killed, and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it and tempted to intermeddle with it by instincts equally strong, might thereby be killed or maimed for life. Such is not the law."

In Decker v. Itasca Paper Co. 111 Minn. 439, 127 N. W. 183, a five-year-old boy was killed while playing on an elevator in defendant's mill. The evidence showed that defendant permitted children and others to go about the premises, and that it had knowledge that children were accustomed to play in this room and on this elevator, and with reference to these facts the court said: "The elevator, in the condition in which defendant maintained it, was extremely dangerous as a playground for young children, and the precise manner in which the accident happened is not of serious moment as respects defendant's liability, since it is clear that death resulted from playing about the elevator. . . . Defendant offered evidence tending to show that small boys were forbidden the premises, and, when found, that they were driven away; and it is claimed that defendant performed its full duty in keeping them away. This evidence, in connection with that offered by plaintiff upon the same subject, presented a question for the jury."

In Franks v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. 78 S. C. 10, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 468, 58 S. E. 960, a ten-year-old boy was killed by drowning in a reservoir on defendant's premises. The reservoir was unfenced, and children were accustomed to play about it. The court says, quoting from Thompson on Neg. vol. 1, § 1030: "Although the dangerous thing may not be what is termed an attractive nuisance,—that is to say, may not have especial attraction for children by reason of their childish instincts,—yet where it is so left exposed that they are likely to come into contact with it, and where their coming in contact with it is obviously dangerous to them, the person so exposing the dangerous thing should reasonably anticipate the injury that is likely to happen to them from its being so exposed, and is bound to take reasonable pains to guard it, so as to prevent injury to them." Again, quoting from Thompson, Neg. vol. 1, § 1026: "One doctrine under this head is that if a child [technically] trespass upon the premises of the defendant, and is injured in consequence of something that befalls him while so trespassing, he cannot recover damages unless the injury was wantonly inflicted, or was due to the recklessly careless conduct of the defendant. This cruel and wicked doctrine, unworthy of a civilized jurisprudence, puts property above humanity, leaves entirely out of view the tender years and infirmity of understanding of the child, indeed, his inability to be a trespasser, in sound legal theory, and visits upon him the consequences of his trespass just as though he were an adult, and exonerates the person or corporation upon whose property he is a trespasser from any duty towards him which they would not owe, under the same circumstances, toward an adult." In Snare & T. Co. v. Friedman, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 94 C. C. A. 369, 169 Fed. 1, it is said: "We think, in reason, and in consonance with the legal principles by which the duty of individuals to protect others from the dangers that may result from the use of their own property is determined, and by which they are held responsible for their negligent acts in that regard, this defendant owed a duty to the children of tender years who, to its knowledge, were accustomed to play on the public streets in the vicinity of these piles of beams, and also to play and sit thereon, to use due care under the circumstances to prevent the piles from being in such an unstable condition as would be likely to cause injury to such of these children as might come in contact therewith."

Peirce v. Lyden, 85 C. C. A. 312, 157 Fed. 552, holds: "Defendant maintained a shed in a railroad yard of about 2 acres near a schoolhouse in a city, in which he kept open barrels of oil. During the daytime the shed was left unlocked, and for several months children living in the vicinity who played in the yard had been in the habit of stealing oil from the barrels . . . and making fires with it in the yard, which fact was known to defendant's watchman. On one such occasion, plaintiff, who was an infant, was burned and injured. Held, that defendant was chargeable with notice of such practice of the children from its long continuance and the knowledge of its watchman, and that the question of his negligence in keeping the place in such condition, in view of the danger of their injury therefrom, was for the jury."

In Akin v. Bradley Engineering & Mach. Co. 48 Wash. 97, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 586, 92 Pac. 903, defendant had thrown some dynamite caps on a vacant lot in rear of its place of business. A path ran through this vacant lot, and school children used the path. Plaintiff was a boy of eleven years of age. The court said: "We think that when the respondent left these dangerous explosives by the wayside, where it knew that children, naturally attracted by such things, were constantly passing and repassing and playing therewith, it must be held to have known that such children were liable to cause some of said caps to explode in a manner likely to cause them serious injury, and that the explosion of such a cap by a dry battery in the manner shown herein did not constitute an intervening cause that should relieve respondent from liability."

In Stollery v. Cicero & P. Street R. Co. 243 Ill. 290, 90 N. E. 709, a boy of ten years was killed, and his body found beside a conveyer operated by defendant on a vacant lot in a city. Held: "Under the decisions of this state, unguarded premises supplied with dangerous attractions are regarded as holding out an implied invitation to children which will make the owner of the premises liable for injuries to them, even though the children be technical trespassers." This case also holds: "The rule of law is, as already stated, that the proof of ordinary care on the part of appellee's intestate, as well as all the other elements of the action charged in the declaration, may be established by circumstantial evidence."

The principles of the law of negligence laid down in the foregoing cases, as well as in others too numerous to cite, is both just and humane; and, under the authority of these cases, the court committed no error in submitting the facts in the case to the jury for their decision.

Appellant's fifth exception is to the court's refusal to charge that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in that its watchman, the witness W. D. Plyler, had told the children to stay away from this pole. Considering the well-known propensity of children of the age of plaintiff's intestate and his playmates to desire to do what they are forbidden, the watchman's warning was hardly more than an invitation. The snip of a pair of wire cutters was all that was necessary to render this death trap perfectly harmless. The defendant, having negligently failed to perform this insignificant act, and thereby caused the death of this six-year-old boy, now asks the court to excuse its negligence by charging the jury that it is not liable because its watchman told those boys to stay away from this pole. This, we think, is hardly short of trifling with human life. In the excerpt already quoted from Decker v. Itasca Paper Co. 111 Minn. 439, 127 N. W. 183, the court, in speaking to this very question, says: "Defendant offered evidence tending to show that small boys were forbidden the premises, and, when found, that they were driven away; and it is claimed that defendant performed its full duty in keeping them away. This evidence, in connection with that offered by plaintiff upon the same subject, presented a question for the jury." We think that this disposes of appellant's fifth exception.

Appellant's sixth exception is equally without merit. The defendant's liability in this case is in no wise dependent on the question as to whether the pole was on or off of the premises which it had rented to plaintiff, father of the dead boy. In either event, the pole was not rented to the plaintiff. Nor would it make any difference if it had been, except that it may have rendered the question of the negligence of defendant more positive and clear. Turner v. Southern Power Co. 154 N. C. 131, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 848, 69 S. E. 767; Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 203, 26 L.R.A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786, 19 S. E. 344. There was no evidence tending to show that anyone except defendant had charge of this pole, or had any authority to remedy any defects in or about it. The defendant, therefore, was responsible for its dangerous and deadly condition.

Appellant's seventh exception is to the refusal of the court to charge the jury that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by his contributory negligence. Under the facts disclosed by the evidence in this case, the plaintiff and his wife were not guilty of contributory negligence in permitting their six-year-old boy to go out into the yard to play.

plaintiff's six-year-old boy was killed by contact with a live wire which was strung near the end of a roof. Plaintiff lived on the third story of a building, and this roof was used as a kind of back yard. As to the mother's contributory negligence, the court says: "There is not sufficient ground in the facts before us for declaring the mother of the child guilty in law of negligence. Under the facts disclosed, the characterization of her conduct was an issue for the jury to solve. There is no merit in the suggestion that this child, only six years old, was guilty of contributory negligence." In Henderson v. Continental Ref. Co. 219 Pa. 384, 123 Am. St. Rep. 668, 68 Atl. 968, the court says: "As to the suggestion that the parents were guilty of contributory negligence, they could not be so held as a matter of law, merely because they allowed a seven-year-old boy to go around by himself upon the streets in the vicinity of his home, or to visit a neighbor's house. At most, the question would be for the jury. Enright v. Pittsburg Junction R. Co. 204 Pa. 543, 54 Atl. 317. The same may be said as to the contention that the parents were negligent in not warning the boy to keep away from the machinery. It was not so clear a duty that the court could declare it as a matter of law." In Enright v. Pittsburg Junction R. Co. supra, holding a father not guilty of contributory negligence in permitting an eleven-year-old son to stroll along railway tracks 1½ blocks away from home, the court says: "The doctrine which imputes negligence to a parent in such a case is repulsive to our natural instincts and repugnant to the condition of that class of persons who have to maintain life by daily toil." In Colorado Springs Electric Co. v. Soper, 38 Colo. 126, 88 Pac. 161, twins, five years of age, were permitted to play in the grounds of a near-by public institution for deaf and dumb. A passing teamster allowed them to ride with him some two blocks away. One of the children, after being put down, took hold of a piece of barb wire lying in the grass, the other end of which was attached to an electric light pole and in contact with electric wires. The child was injured. In speaking to the question of the contributory negligence on the part of the child's parents, the court says: "They were away from the traveled portion of the street, safe and secure from all dangerous things rightfully on the street. The barbed wire charged with electricity had no right to be there. If parents are negligent in permitting children to play out of doors, on public grounds, in the daytime, unattended by the parents themselves or others, then, in the majority of cases, it will be necessary to go out of the business of rearing or attempting to rear children, because parents cannot be with children at all hours of the day; neither is it practical to employ others to be with them to guard them against unseen dangers." In Comptoy v. C. H. Starke Dredge & Dock Co. 129 Wis. 622, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 652, 109 N. W. 650, the court says: "Upon the issue of contributory negligence of plaintiff's mother, the evidence tends to show that she lived in a house something more than a block and a half from the place of injury, and around two street corners; that she was a woman who earned her own living as a nurse, and had the care of the housekeeping for her family, consisting of her mother, an adult brother, herself, and three children; that she had never known the plaintiff to go where the pile driver was at work; that on the day in question her brother was sick in bed, and she was engaged with her Saturday housecleaning; that she gave plaintiff his lunch in the kitchen, which had a door leading into the back yard, which was not locked; that after giving him his lunch she turned to her work in another room and was out of sight only fifteen or twenty minutes when she learned of his injury. . . . We think that the ordinary mother of a family, under these circumstances, would be very much surprised to learn that she had been guilty of negligence in the care of an approximately three-year-old child. Certainly the fact of such negligence is not clear enough to be declared as matter of law." In Tecker v. Seattle, R. & Southern R. Co. 60 Wash. 570, 11 Pac. 791, a boy six and one-half years of age went to the postoffice with his ten-year-old sister. She went in and got the mail, and when she came out, the boy had gone into the street and had been run over and killed by one of defendant's cars. The court says: "Nor can it be said as matter of law that the parents of a child are negligent in permitting him to go upon the street in the care of another child of sufficient age to appreciate and avoid danger, or other competent custodian. In such cases the question of negligence should be submitted to the jury." 29 Cyc. 558. The parent is only required to exercise ordinary care in watching and controlling the child. 29 Cyc. 556; Cameron v. Duluth-Superior Traction Co. 94 Minn. 104, 102 N. W. 208." In Saxton v. Pittsburg R. Co. 219 Pa. 492, 68 Atl. 1022, a boy six and one-half years of age was injured. The court says: "The father of the boy was not precluded from recovering because he permitted his son to go on the street in a business part of the city, unattended." It appeared in Gunn v. Ohio River R. Co. 42 W. Va. 676, 36 L.R.A. 575, 26 S. E. 546, that two boys, five and six years of age, were run over and killed by a train of defendant. They lived 300 to 400 yards from the railroad. In speaking to the question of the contributory negligence of the mother, the court says: "The mother sent them that morning to turn the cows up the road, and come back by the corn lot and garden,—a different direction from the trestle, I understand. They could not pen or imprison their children from light and air and exercise and play. They could not always keep unflinching watch upon them."

The evidence in this case shows that the father was away from home from early in the morning until late at night, earning a living for himself and family; that the mother was at home taking care of her household duties, which the presence of several children must have rendered both numerous and exacting. Under such circumstances, surely it cannot be held as matter of law that these parents were negligent in permitting their six-year-old boy to go out in the yard to play without constantly watching him. If such a rule should be adopted, a large majority of the mothers would be forced to keep their little children in the house, or else be responsible for any injury suffered by them at the hands of others.

As to the eighth exception, upon the question of contributory negligence, there is no evidence that the plaintiff knew of the condition of the pole and loose guy wire till August. The same may be said as to the contention that the parents were negligent in not warning the boy to keep away from the wire. It was not so clear a duty that the court could declare it as a matter of law.

The ninth exception is to the court's definition of "negligence." This exception is without merit, particularly as the court charged the jury as follows: "But if you find a reasonably prudent man ordinarily would have permitted that wire to remain as it was in the place as it was, detached from the ground, then it would not be negligent in the company in having it in that condition; or, if you should find that it was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's intestate's death, why you should answer the first issue, 'No.'" Hicks v. Western U. Teleg. Co. — N. C. —, 73 S. E. 139.

What has been said in regard to the preceding assignments of error, together with the authorities set out and the principles stated, disposes of the other exceptions.

Those facts of this case which are uncontested present a clear of negligence; the jury having found against the defendant's contention, under the charge of the court, which gave to it the benefit of every principle of law to which it was fairly entitled. At very small expense, the defendant, with notice of the dangerous situation, could, by the exercise of the slightest care, have prevented this accident, and the wonder is that it did not, at once, take steps to do so. It may be that the courts, in view of so many injuries from this deadly agency, which, without proper care, is a constant menace to the public, will have to suggest that companies who make use of it in their business must either convey it by wires laid under ground, or so safeguard their wires as to remove this ever-increasing danger to those who, in their ordinary avocations, must come in close proximity to this subtle, dangerous, and oftentimes fatal current. It is no injustice or hardship to the defendant that we hold it liable under the conceded facts of this case.

WINTON MOTOR CARRIAGE COMPANY,
Appt,
v.
BROADWAY AUTOMOBILE COMPANY,
Respt.

(65 Wash. 650, 118 Pac. 817.)

Conditional sale — negotiating purchase-money note — effect.

Under a conditional-sale contract by which the title remains in the seller until

The general question of the effect upon a conditional sale of the taking of collateral security is treated in the notes to Monitor Drill Co. v. Mercer, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1066, and Thornton v. Findley, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 491. As to whether acceptance of commercial paper for the purchase money in a conditional sale constitutes payment or satisfaction of the debt, see note to A. Leschen & Sons Rope Co. v. Mayflower Gold Min. & Reduction Co. 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1, at page 90.

As to whether the bringing of an action for the purchase price constitutes a waiver of the right of the vendor in a conditional sale to recover the property in specie, see note to Frisch v. Wells, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 144.

performance of the conditions, the indorsement of the purchase-money note to a bank as collateral for a loan to the seller is an election to treat the note as an absolute debt, which vests title to the property in the purchaser.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendant's favor in an action brought to establish plaintiff's title and right of possession to an automobile levied upon and held by the sheriff as the property of J. R. Burch, under an attachment and execution issued in an action by defendant as plaintiff against said Burch. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The contentions of counsel and authorities cited are set out in the opinion.

Messrs. Roberts, Battle, Hulbert, & Tennant and C. J. France for appellant.

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey and Frank P. Helsell for respondent.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was prosecuted by the plaintiff in the superior court for King county under §§ 573-577, Rem. & Bal. Code, to establish its title and right of possession to an automobile levied upon and held by the sheriff of King county as the property of J. R. Burch, under an attachment and execution issued out of that court in an action wherein the defendant was plaintiff and J. R. Burch was defendant. We think the facts upon which the respective rights of the parties rest are shown by this record beyond controversy to be in substance as follows: On August 24, 1908, the plaintiff of reservation of title to property as affecting negotiability of note for purchase price, see note to Choate v. Stevens, 43 L.R.A. 277.

There is a decided conflict among the authorities as to the effect of a transfer of a purchase-money obligation upon the title reserved in a conditional contract of sale. In some instances it has been held that such a transfer constitutes an election to treat the obligation as a debt, and that such an election vests the title to the property in the purchaser; in other cases it is held that a transfer of the obligation transfers the security, and vests the title to the property in the transferee; while in still other cases it is held that such a transfer leaves the legal title in the vendor. In a few instances the contrary holdings are reconcilable, but in some cases the courts have evidently proceeded upon theories which differ fundamentally from those adopted by other courts. An examination of the cases, how-delivered to Burch an automobile under a conditional-sale contract, which, in so far as we need to notice its terms, provides: "This agreement witnesseth: That the Winton Motor Carriage Company, a corporation, party of the first part, has, this 24th day of August, 1908, delivered to J. R. Burch, party of the second part, at 1305 Western Ave., Seattle, Washington, the following described personal property, to wit: One secondhand Winton automobile, Model M, No. 6723, for which the second party agrees to pay the sum of $2,000, $1,100 upon the delivery of said goods and chattels, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and the further sum of $900 in three months, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum from date until paid. It is further agreed that said goods and chattels shall remain absolutely the property of said Winton Motor Carriage Company until said sum of $900, with interest thereon, is paid in full. . . . It is agreed and understood that time is the essence of this contract, and if any said payment remain unpaid after the same shall become due, or if any of the above conditions be violated, said first party, its agents or assigns, may enter upon the premises where said property is stored and retake possession thereof, without previous demand, and retain all instalments paid, and terminate this contract." This contract was not filed under § 3670, Rem. & Bal. Code. At the same time Burch executed and delivered to the plaintiff his promissory note for $900, ever, will more accurately demonstrate the various rules and their applications than can be done in a general summary.

In addition to WINTON MOTOR CARRIAGE COMPANY v. BROADWAY AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, but one case seems to have passed upon the effect of an indorsement of a conditional-sale note to a bank as collateral for a loan to the seller, and that is Ensley Lumber Co. v. Lewis, 121 Ala. 94, 25 So. 729, in which a conclusion opposite to that reached in the former case was announced, although the court was not directly discussing the effect upon the rights of the vendee of such an indorsement. In the Ensley Lumber Company Case notes for the purchase money of certain machinery, the title to which was reserved by the vendor, were indorsed to a bank as collateral to secure a loan to the vendor, and held by the bank until the loan was repaid, when the notes were returned to him; and in an action for conversion, instituted by the vendor against the conditional vendee and the purchaser upon foreclosure of a mortgage upon the machinery, given by the conditional vendee, on the issue that the plaintiff did not have title, as it had passed to the bank by the indorsement of the notes, it was held that the legal title to the property for which the notes were given did not pass to the bank, and that when the loan for which they were hypothecated to the bank was paid and they were returned to the plaintiff, the legal title to both the property and the notes was in him. However, in connection with this case, it should be noted that the court did not consider the real ground of the decision in the WINTON MOTOR CARRIAGE COMPANY CASE, which was that the indorsement of the note was an election to treat it as an absolute debt, and therefore an election which vested title to the property in the purchaser.

A somewhat similar case, however, is that of Hyatt v. Bell, 83 Ark. 360, 103 S. W. 748, wherein a purchase-money note, containing an express reservation of title pending payment, was deposited with one to whom the vendee mortgaged the property, with the vendor's consent, as additional security for the mortgage loan, and the note and mortgage were subsequently sold to a bank. Later the note was returned by the bank to the original payee and by him sold, after maturity, to one who brought replevin against the purchaser at a sale under the mortgage, and it was held that the plaintiff's vendor, by depositing the note as security for the loan, waived, as against the purchaser at the mortgage sale, any right to assert the title reserved by him in the note.

A case which applies directly the doctrine of election between the right to treat the purchase-money obligation as an absolute debt and the right to retake under the contract of sale is Truax v. Parvis, 7 Houst. (Del.) 330, 32 Atl. 227, wherein it was held that an assignment of purchase-money notes which recited the reservation of title constituted an election to rely upon the notes for the purchase money, if, by such an assignment, the vendor intended to make an election between his two remedies, the court saying that the jury must take into consideration what he really intended. This decision seems to be more consonant with reason and well-settled principles of law than that of WINTON MOTOR CARRIAGE COMPANY v. BROADWAY AUTOMOBILE COMPANY.

Other cases which apply the rule of election are Merchants' & P. Bank v. Thomas, 69 Tex. 237, 6 S. W. 565, which is set out in WINTON MOTOR CARRIAGE COMPANY v. BROADWAY AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, and Parlin & O. Co. v. Harrell, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 368, 27 S. W. 1084, which follows the Thomas Case. In Georgia, where there is an admitted conflict in the authorities, the following cases held that when a promissory note for the purchase money of personal property, which contains a reservation of title to the property in the payee until the note is paid, is, by the payee, transferred for value to a third person "without recourse," the title reserved for securing the payment of the debt is divested; and if, at the time of such transfer, the title so held was not likewise payable three months after date, with interest at 8 per cent per annum. This note, it is conceded, represented the balance of the purchase price, and it will be noticed was for the same amount, the same time, and the same rate of interest, as stated in the contract. It was an entirely separate instrument from the contract of sale, and there was nothing in that contract indicating any purpose by the parties thereto of having this balance of the purchase price further evidenced in this manner. Soon thereafter the plaintiff indorsed this note, and placed it in the hands of the First National Bank of Seattle as collateral security for a loan which that bank made to the plaintiff. Thereafter, on November 21, 1908, this note being then about to mature, an extension of time of payment was granted, both Burch and the bank consenting thereto, and, in pursuance thereof, a new note was executed by Burch, payable direct to, and left with, the bank, as collateral in lieu of the first note. This second note was indorsed by the plaintiff, and made payable February 21, 1909. A short time after the execution of this note, Burch absconded, leaving many unpaid obligations. At the time of and prior to the time Burch absconded the automobile was kept by him at plaintiff's garage, but his possession thereof under the contract was in no manner interfered with or questioned prior to that time. Soon thereafter the plaintiff took up the second note from the bank, and also took possession of the auto-transferred to the purchaser of the note as a security in his hands, it vests in the maker, and the transferee becomes an ordinary creditor of such maker. Burch v. Pedigo, 113 Ga. 1157, 54 L.R.A. 808, 39 S. E. 493; Bradley v. Cassels, 117 Ga. 517, 43 S. E. 857; McCullough v. Pritchett, 120 Ga. 585, 48 S. E. 148; Swann Davis Co. v. Stanton, 7 Ga. App. 668, 67 S. E. 888. In connection with these cases, see the Georgia cases set out infra. And see Heinlockle v. Zugbaum, 5 Mont. 344, 51 Am. Rep. 59, 5 Pac. 897, wherein, in discussing the question whether a conditional sale was made absolute by the taking of purchase-money notes, it was said that "if the notes were negotiable, and had been transferred for value by the plaintiff [vendor] he could not recover the goods or the price for which he sold them."

In a number of jurisdictions, it is held that the assignment of a purchase-money promissory note, which contains a reservation of title pending payment, does not constitute a waiver of the right to reclaim the property, complete the sale, and vest the title in the vendee, but that, on the other hand, the transfer carries the legal title with it, and subrogates the assignee to all the original rights and remedies of his assignor. The following cases are to this effect: Barton v. Groseclose, 11 Idaho, 227, 81 Pac. 623; Spoon v. Frambach, 83 Minn. 301, 86 N. W. 106; Esty v. Graham, 46 N. H. 169; Cutting v. Whittemore, 72 N. H. 107, 54 Atl. 1098; Standard Steam Laundry v. Dole, 22 Utah, 311, 61 Pac. 1103; W. W. Kimball Co. v. Mellon, 80 Wis. 133, 48 N. W. 1100. In Barton v. Groseclose, supra, the court said: "It must be conceded that when the vendor of property parts with possession, and at the same time reserves to himself the legal title to the property, and thereupon sells, assigns, and transfers to a third party all of his rights and interests in and to the contract [here a promissory note, containing reservation of title], that he is thereafter left without any interest either in the title or possession of the property or the contract. While this is L.R.A. (N.S.)

true, the title to the property must necessarily rest somewhere,—either, we take it, in the original vendee of the property, or the assignee of the contract. To say that the title passed to the vendee of the property would be to deprive the owner of the legal title, to whom the purchase price had not yet been paid, of a valuable property right. It would amount to depriving him of the right of disposition of his property, and cutting off the security which he had retained for the payment of the debt. We think the assignment of a contract like the one under consideration carries with it the legal title to the property, and gives to the assignee of the contract all the rights and remedies enjoyed by his assignor, and that in such case an attachment will not lie until the property has first been exhausted." And in Bank of Little Rock v. Collins, 66 Ark. 240, 50 S. W. 694, it was held that a note given for the purchase money of personal property, the title to which was thereby reserved, could be assigned under a statute allowing the assignment of all notes, written agreements, etc., and that the assignment passed the title to the vendor's assignee, together with the right to sue for and recover the property in his own name, upon default in payment of the purchase money at maturity of the note. According to brief of counsel it was here contended that the assignment of the note waived reservation of title until payment, and was an election to enforce payment; citing, among others, the case of Merchants & P. Bank v. Thomas, 69 Tex. 237, 6 S. W. 565, which is set out and commented upon in WINTON MOTOR CARRIAGE COMPANY v. BROADWAY AUTOMOBILE COMPANY, but the court in its opinion did not consider such contention.

And this rule has been applied where the contract and notes are separated and distinct instruments and both are assigned. Heyns v. Meyer, 46 Ind. App. 45, 91 N. E. 973; Bean v. Edge, 84 N. Y. 510. And see Ross-Meehan Brake Shoe Foundry Co. v. Pascagoula Ice Co. 72 Miss. 608, 18 So. 364,—a case where both the note and the contract were assigned, wherein it was held, mobile, continuing in possession thereof until it was levied upon and taken from his possession by the sheriff on January 4, 1909, under a writ of attachment issued out of the superior court in an action commenced therein by the defendant against Burch to recover a debt existing prior to the date of the conditional-sale contract. Judgment being rendered in that case in favor of the defendant, against Burch, and execution having issued thereon to the sheriff for the sale of the automobile, on February 26, 1909, the plaintiff commenced this action by filing an affidavit with the sheriff under § 573, Rem. & Bal. Code, claiming ownership of the automobile. This claim is based upon the plaintiff's rights under the conditional-sale contract. Upon issues raised by the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's affidavit, a trial was had, resulting in findings and judgment in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

Did the acts of appellant in taking from Burch the $900 note representing the balance of the purchase price of the automobile, and thereafter indorsing that note over to the bank as collateral security for the loan, constitute in law an election by appellant to make the sale absolute, and it being contended that the vendor had waived any stipulated securities (and in Mississippi a reservation of title is considered as security for the purchase price), that an assignee could maintain an action to subject the property to the debt, but that, as the contract contained stipulations obligatory on the vendor, he should be made a party defendant in order that a complete settlement of all matters involved might be made. But that the vendor need not be joined, see Blackley v. Dooley, 18 Ont. Rep. 381.

And the same has been held true where the reserved title was expressly assigned with the notes, although the agreement was merely a part of the note itself. English v. Hill, 116 Ga. 415, 42 S. E. 717; Blackley v. Dooley, supra.

In Cade v. Jenkins, 88 Ga. 791, 15 S. E. 292, where the right to collect notes given for the purchase money out of personal property sold conditionally, the seller retaining title, was held extended by statute to the holder of such notes, to whom they had been transferred without recourse on the payee, the court held that such transfer did not operate to divest the notes of their character as a debt for the purchase money. In the later conflicting decisions of the Georgia supreme court, which are set out herein, no reference was made to the statutes applied in this case. The Georgia courts in some instances, however, do recognize the existence of a conflict, but seem reluctant to do more than recognize it, as they have failed even when good opportunity was presented, to settle the law, contenting themselves by merely following either one line of decisions or the other.

And in the following Georgia cases it was held that the "unconditional assignment" of a purchase-money note containing a reservation of title does not extinguish the security, but carries it along, and the reserved title becomes vested in the assignee until the purchase price is paid: Townsend v. Southern Product Co. 127 Ga. 342, 119 Am. St. Rep. 340, 56 S. E. 436; Turnell v. Carter, 5 Ga. App. 847, 64 S. E. 114, citing and following Cade v. Jenkins, supra; Laurens Bkg. Co. v. Bales, 4 Ga. App. 142, 60 S. E. 1014. And see 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

West Yellow Pine Co. v. Kendrick, 9 Ga. App. 350, 71 S. E. 504, wherein the indorsement of purchase-money notes which contained reservations of title until the notes should be paid, "We hereby transfer the within property . . . without recourse," was held to transfer both the indebtedness and the reserved title to the transferee.

But the rule that the indorsement or transfer of a promissory note which stipulates that the property for the purchase price of which it was given shall remain the property of the vendor until paid vests the title in the indorsee is not universally applied, as will be seen by an examination of the following cases, which hold that such an indorsement, standing alone, does not vest the title in the indorsee, but leaves it in the indorsers, it being said that a mere indorsement does not constitute a sale and assignment of their property in the property conditionally sold. Domestic Sewing Mach. Co. v. Arthurhultz, 63 Ind. 322; Hyde v. Courtwright, 14 Ind. App. 106, 42 N. E. 647. In Spoon v. Frambach, 83 Minn. 301, 86 N. W. 106, supra, the contention was made that by the terms of the note the payee, and not his assigns, was alone authorized to retake the property, but the court, as above stated, held that the title passed to the assignee.

In Mississippi, where the vendor may institute replevin for the recovery of property, and at the same time sue in assumption on the notes, it was held, in McPherson v. Acme Lumber Co. 70 Miss. 649, 12 So. 857, that the vendor may, after default, replevy the property, although he has assigned the notes, and suits thereon are pending against the vendee, it being said that in such case the vendor will hold the property or proceeds as trustee for the assignees; and as to the rights of the vendee, it was said that the court had ample power to protect him from being compelled to pay twice. It will be noted that the court must have proceeded upon the assumption that the debt did not follow the assignment of the note. Also that in Mississippi the rule is different where the debt is assigned. See Ross-Meehan Brake Shoe Foundry Co. v. Pascagoula Ice Co. as set out supra.

thereby vest the title to the automobile in Burch? The correct answer to this question we regard as by far the most important factor to be considered in determining this controversy. It is apparently conceded by counsel for both parties that under a conditional-sale contract and a temporary promissory note representing the unpaid purchase price, such as are here involved, the seller has a choice of two remedies, to wit: He may disaffirm the sale and retake the property upon failure of the conditions which it is agreed will vest title in the purchaser, or he may, by some act clearly manifesting his intention so to do, elect to treat and rely upon the unpaid purchase price as an absolute debt due from the purchaser. It is a general rule that the seller cannot have both remedies, and that, when he has elected to avail himself of one, he has thereby divested himself of all right to the other. Whatever exceptions there be to this rule, a reference to the authorities will show that such exceptions occur for the most part in jurisdictions where the law regards such contracts of sale only as security for the payment of the debt, in the nature of a lien, or where the contract by its terms evidences an intention to create a lien upon the property as security for the debt. The title which is by this contract reserved in the seller is the absolute title, under which he may retake the property, if at all, and retain it without any obligation whatever to account therefor, or for any surplus of the value thereof above the unpaid purchase price, to the purchaser. The thing which our law recognizes as being retained by the seller under this contract is not a mere lien or equity securing the balance of the purchase price, but the absolute title, which remains in him or passes from him to the purchaser absolutely, accordingly as the conditions of the sale are broken, or as they are fulfilled, or as may result from some act of election on the part of the seller. The nature of this title is clearly stated by the supreme court of Connecticut in Crompton v. Beach, 62 Conn. 25, 38, 18 L.R.A. 187, 36 Am. St. Rep. 323, 25 Atl. 446, 448, as follows: "A contract of conditional sale imposes no lien upon property in favor of the vendor, for that or any other purpose. He does not sell, and receive back a pledge. He retains the title until he elects to part with it and, when he does so elect, the title passes from him; but nothing else thereby springs up in its place in the nature of a lien or encumbrance upon the property, inuring to his benefit." The supreme court of Minnesota in Alden v. W. J. Dyer & Bro. 92 Minn. 134, 90 N. W. 784, expressed substantially the same view as follows: "It must now be regarded as the settled law of this state, as well as of most others, that, where personal property is sold and delivered with an agreement that the title thereto shall remain in the vendor until the payment of the purchase price, it is a conditional sale, and the transaction cannot be held a mortgage; and it is equally as well settled that, upon the vendee's failure to comply with the condition as to payment, the vendor may elect to retake the property, or may treat the sale as absolute, and bring an action for the price; but the assertion of either right is an abandonment of waiver of the other." Not only is this the undoubted law of this state, but it is the very theory upon which appellant is now resting its claim of absolute title to this automobile. The application and importance of this principle to our inquiry will be rendered more apparent as we proceed.

An examination of the authorities will show that there are several ways in which the seller under conditional-sale contracts may so act that the law will impute therefrom to him an election to waive the conditions of the sale resulting in title passing to the purchaser. While the decisions so holding will be found to relate to varying acts of the seller, they all rest upon the same underlying principle; to wit, that an election to hold the purchaser personally bound as a debtor owing the purchase price results in such election vesting title in the purchaser. The bringing of a simple suit to recover the purchase price, unaided by any claim of lien upon or attachment of the property conditionally sold, constitutes an election to vest title in the purchaser, and look to him only as a debtor owing the purchase price under the holdings in the following cases: Mathews Piano Co. v. Markle, 86 Neb. 123, 124 N. W. 1129; Poirier Mfg. Co. v. Kitts, 18 N. D. 556, 120 N. W. 558; American Process Co. v. Florida White Pressed Brick Co. 56 Fla. 116, 47 So. 942, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1054; Holt Mfg. Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 353, 42 Pac. 435; Avery v. Chapman (Sup.) 127 N. Y. Supp. 721; Crompton v. Beach, 62 Conn. 25, 18 L.R.A. 187, 36 Am. St. Rep. 323, 25 Atl. 446; Richards v. Schreiber, C. & W. Co. 98 Iowa, 422, 67 N. W. 569; Alden v. W. J. Dyer & Bro. 92 Minn. 134, 90 N. W. 784. The following decisions deal with suits seeking recovery of the purchase price, accompanied by attachment or claim of lien against the conditionally-sold property: Butler v. Dodson, 78 Ark. 569, 94 S. W. 703; Smith v. Barber, 153 Ind. 322, 53 N. E. 1014. It might be argued that an attempt by suit to fasten a lien upon the very property sold furnishes a stronger reason for holding such suit to be an election by the seller to pass the title to the purchaser. But, after all, such suits are only efforts to recover the purchase price as a debt against the purchaser, and that fact is just as inconsistent with the seller retaining the title as his claim of lien upon the property. It seems inconceivable that the absolute title remain in the seller and at the same time the purchase price be an enforceable debt obligation against the purchaser. This court has expressed views in harmony with the decisions above noticed in Jones v. Reynolds, 45 Wash. 371, 373, 88 Pac. 577, and Ramey v. Smith, 56 Wash. 604, 608, 106 Pac. 160. The latter involved a suit and judgment rendered thereon against the purchaser, without any effort to fasten a specific lien upon the conditionally-sold property. The following decisions are of particular interest, in that they involve suits by the seller against the purchaser, which were unsuccessful or voluntarily abandoned, yet they were held to constitute elections: Orcutt v. Rickenbrodt, 42 App. Div. 238, 59 N. Y. Supp. 1008; Hickman v. Richburg, 122 Ala. 638, 26 So. 136; Frisch v. Wells, 200 Mass. 429, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 144, 86 N. E. 775. In this last-cited case the court observed: "It must be presumed from the record that with knowledge of his legal rights, and being in possession of the facts, the plaintiff chose to bring suit for the balance due, and to arrest and hold the body of the debtor until he was discharged upon taking the oath prescribed by Rev. Laws, chap. 168, § 40. The plaintiff failed to enter the writ. It is not, however, the judgment which may be obtained, but the commencement of a suit to enforce a coexisting inconsistent remedy in a court having jurisdiction, which constitutes the decisive act, and makes the election binding. Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49; Connihan v. Thompson, 111 Mass. 272; Bailey v. Hervey, 135 Mass. 172. The answer was a general denial, which put in issue, not only the plaintiff's right to possession, but his title to the property. D'Arcy v. Steuer, 179 Mass. 40, 41, 60 N. E. 405. And the plaintiff having once made an irrevocable election, the title was relinquished or waived, and the present action is absolutely barred. Bailey v. Hervey, 135 Mass. 172; Whitney v. Abbott, 191 Mass. 59, 77 N. E. 524."

No decision has come to our notice involving an election resting alone upon the indorsing and transferring to a third party of a conditional-sale note of the nature here involved, as collateral security for a loan made to the payee and seller. We are, however, cited to two Texas decisions seemingly directly in point in so far as the principle here involved is concerned. They are Merchants' & P. Bank v. Thomas, 69 Tex. 237, 6 S. W. 565, and Parlin & O. Co. v. Harrell, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 368, 27 S. W. 1084. These cases apparently involve indorsement and sale of the notes. In the latter case the former is commented upon and followed; the court observing: "They are not in an attitude to maintain the suit. They indorsed at least one of the notes given by Burns & Munn for the goods to a bank in Illinois, thus making their election to rely on their right to enforce the contract of sale. Upon failure of Burns & Munn to pay the purchase price of the goods, they could elect to sue on the notes for the debt due, or to abandon the sale and recover the goods. They could not, after electing to abide by the sale, by transfer of the notes or one of them, sue to recover the goods sold. In the case of Merchants' & P. Bank v. Thomas, supra, it was decided by the supreme court of this state that when the owner of personal property transfers its possession to one who executes his notes for the purchase price, and, by a contract executed at the time the title to the goods is to remain in the vendor until the price is paid, and, on default of payment, the vendor may regain possession of the goods, the vendor may elect to enforce payment of the notes or recover possession; but that he could not do both, and that the assertion of one right is the abandonment of the other; that the transfer of the notes was an election to enforce payment thereof, and an abandonment of the title, vesting it in the vendee. 'The contract, once abandoned,' says the court, 'could not be restored by any action on the part of the vendors and the indorsees without the consent of the vendee.' And it was held that, if the vendors repossessed the notes, they thereby obtained only such rights against the makers as were held by the parties (the indorsees) from whom they received them,—the right to enforce their payment by suit against the makers. 'Had the notes been indorsed simply for collection, the case might have been different, as no suit had been brought upon them; but as to this there was no proof, and the presumption is that the sale of the notes was absolute, and for a valuable consideration.' The transfer of one of the notes, as shown in the case before us, had the same effect as to election of rights under the contract as the transfer of all of them. Upon the ground, then, that plaintiff could not recover the property after having elected to enforce payment of the purchase price, we conclude that the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed."

Counsel for appellant seek to lessen the force of the doctrine of the decisions above noticed, as applicable to the facts of this case, by citation of decisions which hold that acts of the nature therein involved, as well as certain other acts indicating an intention on the part of the seller to look to the purchaser only as a debtor, do not necessarily constitute an affirmation of the sale. Let us notice some of them. In Goodkind v. Gilliam, 19 Mont. 385, 48 Pac. 548, after entering into the conditional-sale contract, the seller took from the purchaser a mortgage upon the property which he foreclosed, and thereby became the owner of the property. Thereafter, by agreement between them, the property was again placed in the possession of the purchaser, under the terms of the original contract of conditional sale. The taking of the chattel mortgage and foreclosing of it was held not to be a waiver affecting subsequently acquired rights of the seller, evidently because it could not influence the subsequent agreement which simply adopted the original contract, and was in effect a new conditional sale. In Sargent v. Metcalf, 5 Gray, 306, 66 Am. Dec. 368, it was merely held that the vendor did not waive the conditions of the sale and pass title to the vendee merely by asking and being promised additional security which was never given. This was not an unqualified election to look to the vendee as a debtor only. In Warner Elevator Mfg. Co. v. Capital Invest. Bldg. & L. Assn. 127 Mich. 323, 89 Am. St. Rep. 473, 86 N. W. 828, an unsuccessful attempt to enforce a mechanics' lien was held not to be a waiver, evidently upon the theory that the contract created nothing but a lien to secure the purchase price, and that two such liens could exist at the same time. In American Box Mach. Co. v. Zentgraf, 45 App. Div. 522, 61 N. Y. Supp. 417, the contract by its very terms prevented a waiver of one remedy by an attempt to exercise the other, so in that case there was no question of an election. In the case of Monitor Drill Co. v. Mercer, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1065, 90 C. C. A. 303, 163 Fed. 943, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 214, there was held to be no election by the taking of collateral security for the purchase price. But in that contract it was provided that, upon retaking the property by the seller, he was to apply the proceeds to the payment of the indebtedness, and deliver the surplus, if any, to the purchaser. It is apparent that an unconditional title was not reserved in that contract as in this. In Ward v. Yarnelle, 173 Ind. 535, 91 N. E. 7, it was simply held that the waiver of a right to a mechanics' lien upon the building into the construction of which the conditionally sold property went was not an election, and did not affect the reserved title. This was not only not inconsistent with the seller's title, but was directly in harmony therewith. Had the seller insisted on his right of lien, there might have been some room for argument as to whether or not that constituted an election. The following cases cited by appellant's counsel may not be so readily distinguishable, and possibly lend some support to appellant's contentions: Standard Steam Laundry v. Dole, 22 Utah, 311, 61 Pac. 1103; First Nat. Bank v. Reid, 122 Iowa, 280, 93 N. W. 107; William W. Bierce v. Hutchins, 205 U. S. 340, 51 L. ed. 828, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524. These decisions, however, are not of such controlling force as to lead us to adopt appellant's contentions and depart from the doctrine of the authorities we have noticed, supporting the contrary view, with which our own decisions are in harmony, especially in so far as they hold that the suing for the purchase price constitutes an election, where the title reserved by the seller is absolute and unconditional, as in this case.

Did the title pass with the transfer of the note to the bank as collateral security? Counsel for appellant do not seriously contend that it did, but call our attention to the following decisions holding that under certain circumstances the title to the property passes with the transfer of the note evidencing the balance of the purchase price. Cutting v. Whitemore, 72 N. H. 107, 54 Atl. 1098; Ross-Meehan Brake Shoe Foundry Co. v. Pascagoula Ice Co. 72 Miss. 608, 18 So. 364. These decisions and others in harmony therewith it will be found upon examination hold that the property passes with the assignment of the purchase-money note because of the law of the jurisdiction which regards such contracts only as security in the nature of liens, or because of the terms of the contract creating only a lien securing the debt. This is nothing but an application of the well-known doctrine of equity that an assignment of the secured debt carries the right to the security. Of course, counsel for appellant could not safely rest upon this theory, because it would at once destroy the absolute unconditional title which it is claiming. Thus is emphasized the importance of keeping in mind the fact that the sale contract did not create a lien, but that it reserved an absolute title in the seller which was as absolutely to pass to the purchaser upon certain conditions. There is not the slightest question of security for a debt here involved.

Now, let us view the situation as it existed at the time of the indorsement and transfer of the note to the bank by appellant, as collateral security, ignoring for the present all subsequent events. That note upon its face had no connection whatever with the conditional-sale contract. It was in the manner stated transferred to the bank before maturity, as collateral security. There is nothing in the record indicating any intention to transfer to the bank with the note, appellant's title in the conditionally sold property. At that time no conditions of the contract were broken entitling appellant to retake the property, nor had appellant at that time assumed to retake the property. In view of these facts, what intention will the law impute to appellant by thus transferring this note? Now, of course, the purpose of the transfer to the bank was to render the note available to the bank as collateral security for its loan to appellant. The only value that this note could possibly have in the hands of the bank was that of any other piece of negotiable paper acquired by the bank before maturity; that is, it became a debt payable unconditionally at a stated time from Burch to the bank or its assignees. Appellant must have then elected to have that note assume this function, for in no other way could it be of any value to the bank as security. By that transfer the note was freed from all connection with the conditional-sale contract. The bank acquired no right in or lien upon the property, for the title thereto either remained absolutely in appellant, or, by the transfer of the note, passed absolutely from appellant to Burch by virtue of that act, as an election on his part. Some effort is made to distinguish between the effect of the assignment of this note as collateral security and an assignment of a note upon a sale thereof, as in the Texas cases above cited. It will not do to make any such distinction; for to do so would be to take away from the note in the hands of the bank the very quality which it was intended to possess by the transfer to the bank; to wit, the quality of an absolute debt obligation against Burch as any negotiable note executed by him would have. We are of the opinion that, when appellant assigned the note to the bank, that act constituted in law an election on its part to waive the conditions of the sale, and resulted in vesting absolute title in Burch. It was an election to place Burch in such a position that he became an unconditional debtor for the purchase price of the property.

Counsel for appellant rely upon the events which occurred thereafter as in some way preventing or undoing this result.

That such events did not prevent this result seems to us to be fully answered by what has already been said. How, then, was the title to the automobile restored to appellant? We are unable to see how the taking possession of the automobile by appellant at the time it did would have any effect towards restoring the title to it. At that time none of the conditions of the sale were broken by Burch, and there is nothing in this record to indicate that appellant had any right whatever to take possession of the automobile at that time, even had not the absolute title previously passed to Burch. The mere fact that Burch absconded did not give to appellant any such right of possession, and it cannot be seriously claimed that Burch consented to the retaking of the property by appellant. Neither are we able to see that the taking up of the note by appellant from the bank had the slightest effect upon the title of the automobile. We have seen that the title had already passed to Burch by the act of appellant in assigning the note to the bank. The title to the automobile did not pass with the note back to appellant any more than it passed with the note from appellant to the bank. The very fact, as we have seen, that we are not dealing with the property as security for a debt, renders all speculation touching the effect of the events subsequent to the original transfer of the note by appellant to the bank, as wholly foreign to the question of the title to the automobile.

Considerable is said in the briefs about the moral and equitable rights of the respective parties. To enter upon the consideration of the rights of the parties from such a standpoint would probably show that they are fairly evenly balanced. But such considerations have no place in this case. The controlling facts are beyond dispute; and from them by well-settled rules of law the rights of the parties can be clearly ascertained. Our conclusions render it unnecessary to express an opinion on the effect of the failure to file the sale contract with the county auditor under § 3670, Rem. & Bal. Code, involving the question of whether or not respondent, as an attaching creditor suing for a debt existing before the date of the sale contract, is such an encumbrancer that the conditional sale is void as to it without such filing.

We conclude that the judgment of the learned trial court is in accord with the law as applicable to the undisputed facts.

The judgment is affirmed.

I. General rule.

It is a general rule, denied in but few jurisdictions, that the sale of seed as and for a certain kind, that is a sale by description, constitutes a warranty of the seed. In some jurisdictions it is treated as an express warranty, and in some as an implied warranty, while in others it is not regarded as a warranty, but as a condition the breach of which gives rise to an action in the nature of a breach of warranty.

As to most of the questions arising in this note, it is immaterial whether a sale of seeds in effect by description constitutes an express warranty of the seeds, or whether it raises an implied warranty, or a condition. The question is of importance, however, when considering the effect of a non-warranty or disclaimer of warranty clause. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Door County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the purchase price of a quantity of seed peas grown for defendant by plaintiff under a written contract. Affirmed.

Statement by Barnes, J.:

On February 14, 1908, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant certain varieties of seed peas. Among other things, the plaintiff agreed to furnish 1,000 bushels of "Advancer" peas, and guaranteed 75 per cent delivery. Such peas were to be grown during the season of 1908, to be delivered after harvest, but in season for the planting trade for the year 1909. A quantity of peas was de-

On this subject see infra, V., "Effect of nonwarranty or disclaimer of warranty clause." On the more general question of whether a sale by description constitutes an express or implied warranty, or a condition, and the distinction with reference thereto, see note in 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 258.

As already stated the weight of authority holds the seller of seeds liable as upon a warranty, when he sells seeds as being of a particular kind. The cases so holding are hereinafter grouped with reference to the question of the nature and extent of the warranty.

In a few jurisdictions, however, the theory of a warranty or condition being created by a sale of seed as and for a certain kind is denied, and the right to recover damages if the seed delivered is not the kind that it was sold for is denied, although the purchaser by inspection could not have ascertained that fact. This is the doctrine in Pennsylvania. Thus, in Lord v. Grow, 39 Pa. 88, 80 Am. Dec. 504, the sale of wheat as spring seed wheat was held not to constitute a warranty that the wheat was true to name, the doctrine being that in a sale of this character the rule of caveat emptor applies, even though the true character of the seed could not be determined by inspection. The court said: "True, the difference between spring wheat and other wheat is not ascertainable by inspection, and it may be assumed that they are not the same in species. Still, the case is one of a purchase on inspection of an article, of which the vendor's means of knowledge were no greater than those of the vendee." This is also the doctrine, as to a very similar state of facts, of Kircher v. Conrad, 9 Mont. 191, 7 L.R.A. 471, 18 Am. St. Rep. 731, 23 Pac. 74, the case being influenced by and following the preceding case. The doctrine was also applied in Shisler v. Baxter, 109 Pa. 443, 58 Am. Rep. 738, as to the sale of seed as and for Wakefield cabbage seed.

And see Calhoun v. Brinker, 5 Ohio N. P. N. S. 122, 17 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 705, holding that a dealer furnishing seed upon the request of a buyer of seed, for seed livered under this contract to the defendant, it giving its promissory notes in payment therefor according to the terms of the contract. The peas so sold were in turn sold by the defendant to various farmers for the purpose of planting, and under contracts by virtue of which the farmers agreed to sell the peas raised from such seed to the defendant. The plaintiff brought action upon the notes. The defendant, among other things, interposed a counterclaim setting forth that the peas furnished were not "Advancer" peas, that they were received by the defendant without knowledge of that fact, that there was no means of discovering that they were not "Advancer" peas until after they had been sowed and the seed had germinated, and that as soon as the defendant discovered that the peas were not of the variety purchased, it notified plaintiff. The counterclaim further set forth that the peas were mixed with other different varieties, making it impossible to harvest them without a mixture of overripe peas of varieties other than "Advancer." Facts are pleaded tending to show damage, and judgment is asked for the amount thereof. On the trial the court allowed the defendant to amend its answer by setting up a new counterclaim for the purchase price of the peas. The trial court held that the peas were sold without warranty as to quality or description, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed less $343.75. The peas were shipped from Chi-of a certain kind, does not thereby impliedly warrant the seed to be true to name. In this respect a distinction is made between a dealer and a grower.

II. Warranty that seed is true to name.

It has been held that in a sale of seed for planting or sowing, where the sale is by description, the doctrine of implied warranty does not apply, but the doctrine of express warranty does, and it is said that "no particular form of expression or words is necessary to make an express contract of warranty. The word 'warranty' is not necessary to it. An affirmation of the fact as to the kind or quality of an article offered for sale, of which the vendee is ignorant, but upon which he relies in purchasing such article, is as much a binding contract of warranty as a formal agreement using the plainest and most unequivocal language on the subject." Hoffman v. Dixon, 105 Wis. 315, 76 Am. St. Rep. 916, 81 N. W. 491.

Considering the question as to what will constitute a warranty that seed, when sold for planting or sowing purposes, is true to name, in Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425, the court said: "The subject of warranty, in its application to the class of cases in which the present one is comprehended, has been involved in much confusion. The authorities are not consistent; . . . the tendency of recent adjudications has been . . . to put this subject on a reasonable footing. Starting from the admission that, in the absence of fraud and of a warranty, the rule of caveat emptor applies, the effort is, not to elevate particular expressions contained in a given contract into a general rule of law, but to regard each case in the light of its own circumstances, and with respect solely to the understanding of the parties. Whether the representation or affirmation accompanying a sale shall be regarded as a warranty or as simplex commendatio is a question to be solved by a search for the intention of the contracting parties."

To raise an implied warranty that seed is true to name, the circumstances must be such as to amount to a representation of fact on the part of the seller that the article is of the particular kind or description. If the buyer in terms asks for seed of a particular kind, and the seller purports to comply with his request, he will be held to warrant the article as being of that kind, although he may not have made any declaration in words to that effect. Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co. 158 Cal. 54, 109 Pac. 839. An order for a particular kind and quality of seed raises an implied warranty that the seed furnished complies with the order. Gubner v. Vick, 25 N. Y. Week. Dig. 356, 6 N. Y. S. R. 4. So, where a purchaser calls for a certain kind of seed, supplying the article raises an implied warranty that the seed is of that variety. Gardner v. Winter, 117 Ky. 382, 63 L.R.A. 647, 78 S. W. 143.

If barley is sold for seed purposes as being of a certain kind, and a partial failure of the crop from such seed results from the fact that it is of a different kind, the seller is liable for the damages as for a breach of warranty. Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co. supra.

A sale of seed as rape seed constitutes an express warranty that the seed is true to name where the purchaser is ignorant of the appearance of rape seed, and hence an inspection of it by him would not aid him to determine the true character of the seed. Hoffman v. Dixon, supra. The sale of turnip seed as "skirvings seed" constitutes a warranty that the seed is of that kind. Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560. A sale of turnip seed as and for "early strap-leaf red-top turnip seed" constitutes a warranty that the seed is of that kind. Wolcott v. Mount, supra. A sale of seed for seed purposes as and for "Arlington white spine cucumber seed" constitutes a warranty that the seed will produce that kind of cucumbers. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410. Selling seed for sowing or planting as being a particular kind of seed constitutes a warranty that it is true to name, which is breached by de-ago and invoiced on the basis of 56 pounds to the bushel. The court held that the defendant was entitled to receive 60 pounds per bushel, and hence made the foregoing reduction. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant appeals.

Mr. W. L. Evans, with Mr. W. E. Wagener, for appellant:

In a contract of sale of personal property, in the absence of fraud or any express or implied warranty, an action for a breach of contract for failure to deliver the thing contracted for survives a delivery of something other than contracted for, the buyer not being able by inspection to ascertain the failure to deliver the thing contracted for, and only a use of the property, which prevents its return, showing this fact.

delivering seed of a different kind, utterly unproductive. VanWyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136.

A sale of seed by description, without opportunity of inspection, raises an implied warranty that the seed is true to name. Wieler v. Schilizzi, 17 C. B. 619. A warranty that seed sold for sowing or planting purposes is true to name will be inferred where the seller asserts at the time of the sale that the seed is of a species which the buyer is in search of, the seller at the time being aware that the buyer has no opinion himself on the subject, the character of the seed not being ascertainable by sight or touch. Wolcott v. Mount, supra. A sale of seed for seed purposes raises an implied warranty surviving acceptance, that the seed is true to name and free from noxious weed seed, where the true character of the seed and the presence of noxious weed seed cannot be ascertained by any reasonable inspection. Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. Supp. 390. affirmed without opinion in 197 N. Y. 528, 90 N. E. 1158. But there is no implied warranty that seeds sold for seeding purposes are up to the standard in quality. Ibid. A sale of onion sets by description raises an implied warranty that the sets shall not only answer the description, but that they are salable or merchantable. Frith v. Hollan, 133 Ala. 583, 91 Am. St. Rep. 54, 32 So. 494.

III. Warranty of germinating power.

One who sells a farm product to a purchaser, the purchaser making known at the time of the purchase that he wants the article for seed with which to plant a crop, and who guarantees that the article which he sells is good for the purpose of seeding, is liable in damages in case of the entire worthlessness of the article for seed purposes, discovered after the land had been prepared and the seed sown. Reiger v. Worth, 127 N. C. 230, 52 L.R.A. 362, 80 Am. St. Rep. 798, 37 S. E. 217.

Where at the time a contract for the purchase of flaxseed for seeding purposes is entered into, the seed is not present so that it can be inspected by the purchaser, and when it arrives and is delivered to him a defect in the seed is not apparent, and is not discoverable by ordinary means of inspection, and is in fact not discovered until after it is sowed, and it fails to germinate, these circumstances, together with the fact that by the terms of the sale the seller is to buy the crop resulting from such seed, raise a warranty that the seed is fit for the purpose for which it was bought. Shaw v. Smith, 45 Kan. 334, 11 L.R.A. 681, 25 Pac. 886. Where flaxseed is sold with the understanding on the part of both parties that it is to be sowed or planted with the view of raising a crop which, when harvested, is to be sold to the seller of the seed, the circumstances raise an implied warranty that the seed is of a kind that will grow. Johnson v. Sproull, 50 Mo. App. 121.

A representation that rice is excellent or good seed rice, where made with the knowledge that the purchaser intends to use it for seed purposes, constitutes a warranty that it possesses germinating power. Reiger v. Worth, 130 N. C. 268, 89 Am. St. Rep. 865, 41 S. E. 377. Selling peas for seed in response to a request for seed peas raises an implied warranty that the seed is fit for that purpose. Landreth v. Wyckoff, 67 App. Div. 145, 73 N. Y. Supp. 388. A sale of seed for the purpose of planting raises an implied warranty of fitness for that purpose, which is breached by a want of germinating power. Moore v. Koger, 113 Mo. App. 423, 87 S. W. 602. The sale of seed with the intent upon the part of both buyer and seller that it is to be used in planting or sowing raises an implied warranty of fitness for that purpose; that is, that it is clean seed, possessing no defects in germinating power. Cline v. Mock, 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710. A warranty that onion seed for planting purposes is fresh and genuine, and the product of the preceding year, constitutes a warranty that the seed will germinate and grow, where the term "fresh seed" is understood in the vicinity of the contract as

Mr. Henry Graass, for respondent:

The defendant waived its claim that the peas delivered failed to satisfy the contract, by not notifying the plaintiff of such claim as soon as, by reasonable diligence, the defendant could have discovered the defects.

Neither defendant's first counterclaim nor third counterclaim states facts sufficient to constitute a defense or counterclaim.

meaning seed which will germinate and grow. Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513.

It is not always necessary that the seller be expressly informed that it is the intention of the buyer to use the seed which he is purchasing for sowing or planting; the nature of the seed may be such that in the sale of it the seller will be charged with knowledge of the intention of using it for such purpose. Thus, as to clover seed, which has little, if any, commercial value except for the purpose of seeding, a seller of it to a farmer will be charged with knowledge of the intention of the purchaser to use it for seeding purposes. Fox v. Everson, 27 Hun, 355.

A sale of grain for seed described as "rust-proof oats," while constituting a warranty that the oats are of the described variety, does not, however, constitute a warranty that they are suitable for any particular use, if the purchaser in selecting the variety he intends to sow does not rely upon the judgment or skill of the seller, whose judgment and skill he trusts only to the extent of providing the designated species. Gachet v. Warren, 72 Ala. 288.

Where a purchaser calls for seed of a certain variety, supplying the article raises an implied warranty that the seed is of that variety, but it does not raise an implied warranty that it will germinate and produce good crops when sown, or that it is fit for the purpose intended. Gardner v. Winter, 117 Ky. 382, 63 L.R.A. 647, 78 S. W. 143.

The word "seed" used in a bill of sale does not amount to an express warranty that the seed will germinate or grow; neither does it raise an implied warranty to that effect. Moore v. McKinley, 5 Cal. 471.

IV. Freedom from noxious weed seeds, etc.

A contract by a grower to raise and furnish seed of a described kind, to be of good growing stock, constitutes a warranty that seed of good growing stock shall be sown, and that everything shall be done in regard to sowing and caring for the seed 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 116 Wis. 392, 67 L.R.A. 705, 89 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246.

Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contract for the sale of the peas contained the following provision: "It is also understood and agreed that the party of the first part [plaintiff] does not give, and its agents and employees are forbidden to give, any warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds delivered or to be delivered by it, and that it is not, and will not be, in any way responsible for the crops."

Counsel for the appellant admit "that that can reasonably be required in the ordinary course of raising seed. There is, however, no implied warranty that the seed, when raised, shall be good. Pinder v. Button, 7 L. T. N. S. 269, 11 Week. Rep. 25.

A grower of wheat, by selling it for seeding purposes, impliedly warrants that it is suitable for seed, and free from latent defects arising from the manner of cultivation, harvesting, and storing, which would render it unsuitable for that purpose. Prentice v. Fargo, 53 App. Div. 608, 65 N. Y. Supp. 1114, affirmed without opinion in 173 N. Y. 593, 65 N. E. 1121. A sale of seed for seed purposes by the grower thereof raises an implied warranty that it is free from noxious weed seed. Bell v. Mills, 78 App. Div. 42, 80 N. Y. Supp. 34; and that there is no impurity in the seed from cross fertilization. Landreth v. Wyckoff, supra.

In Shatto v. Abernethy, 35 Minn. 538, 29 N. W. 325, a jury were held justified in finding on the facts that a warranty that wheat sold was pure Saskatchewan fife wheat was not breached by the presence of foreign seeds and different kinds of wheat.

V. Effect of nonwarranty or disclaimer of warranty clause.

The courts are not agreed as to the effect of a notice accompanying seed sold for planting or sowing, containing a clause in effect that the seller does not warrant the seed in any respect, and that if the purchaser is not willing to take it without warranty he must return it.

In some jurisdictions a distinction is made between a warranty and a condition, and it is held that a sale by description constitutes a condition rather than a warranty, and that a nonwarranty or disclaimer of warranty clause does not cover the rights of the parties claiming a violation of the condition.

Thus, in Wallis v. Pratt [1911] A. C. 304, a clause that "sellers give no warranty, expressed or implied, as to growth, description, or any other matters," was held not to relieve a seller of seed sold by de-plaintiff is freed by the terms of this contract from all liability as to the seed in question being good or bad, large or small, wrinkled or smooth, black or white, wormy or sound, vital or dead." But counsel argue that the peas furnished under the contract must be of the Advancer variety, and that plaintiff was not relieved by its contract from liability for damage resulting from furnishing peas other than Advancer peas. It was practically conceded on the argument that the clause quoted was intended to exempt the plaintiff from such liability as was sought to be enforced against it under the counterclaim in this action. The concession was advisedly made. The peas to be delivered under the contract were described therein as Advancer peas. But the contract provided that no warranty, express or implied, was given that the peas furnished should be of the description named therein. If a dealer in seed peas can exempt itself from liability for selling bad, wormy, or dead peas to a grower, no good reason is apparent why it cannot go further and say that it will not be responsible in the event of an intermixture of other peas with the variety agreed to be furnished. Neither of the parties here is under guardianship or incompetent to contract. There is no claim that the contract signed was not the one agreed upon, or that both parties did not fully understand what they were agreeing to. Plaintiff plainly undertook to relieve itself from liability in case of intermixture, and defendant description, for planting or sowing purposes, from damages if the seed delivered was not true to name. Lord Loreburn, L. C., remarked: "When you are dealing in a commodity the inspection of which does not enable you to distinguish its exact nature, there are risks both on the buyer and on the seller, if they see fit to sell by description. But if it is desired by a seller to throw the risk of any honest mistake onto the buyer, then he must use apt language.

. . . I do not think he has done so in the clause to which I have referred." On the same point, Lord Alverstone, Ch. J., remarked: "It is quite impossible to suggest, . . . when these parties made a contract whereby they required that the goods should be common English sainfoin, and the sellers put in a stipulation that they would not give any warranty, express or implied, it was intended that it was always to be understood that they were not making themselves liable in regard to any condition as to the goods or for the consequences of a breach of the condition." The reasoning of Lord Alverstone is to the effect that the disclaimer or nonwarranty clause does not apply to the sale of seeds for seed purposes by description, since such a sale raises a condition rather than a warranty, and renders the seller liable for breach of the condition, and the clause referred to does not cover this liability. This distinction between a warranty and a condition is discussed in a note in 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) subdiv. IV. and V. pages, 265, 273.

A very similar clause was also held in Howcroft v. Laycock, 14 Times L. R. 460, not to relieve the seller from damages for the sale of cabbage seed by name, where the seed he furnished was not true to name. The clause in question read, "Messrs. — give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter connected with the seeds they send out, and they will not be in anyway responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned." Said Mr. Justice Day: "The clause in question of L.R.A. (N.S.)

could not be construed to mean that no action should be brought. When Couve Tronchuda was ordered the seed sellers were not entitled to deliver something quite different. The custom of a trade might qualify a contract, but it could not destroy it. A rational construction must be put on the words relied upon. The construction desired by the respondents to be established unreasonable." This construction was to quote counsel: "When, in ordinary cases, goods have been accepted, the purchaser could only recover for breach of warranty. Here, however, the purchaser had agreed not to raise any question of warranty, and therefore had no remedy. It was an important matter for seed sellers and seed growers all over the country. In this case the seed sellers had bought the seed from someone else, so there was no imputation on their bona fides. Seed would be very much dearer if the sellers had to guarantee it."

In other jurisdictions a sale by description is regarded as constituting a warranty, and it is held that the nonwarranty or disclaimer of warranty clause is binding upon the purchaser, if it comes to his notice, but is not unless it does.

Thus, in Bell v. Mills, 68 App. Div. 531, 74 N. Y. Supp. 224, a disclaimer reading, "I exercise the greatest care to have all my seeds, potatoes, bulbs, and plants, etc., fresh, pure, clean, and true to name, and if such should not be the case, I will re-fill the order, free of charge, providing sufficient proof is given me within a reasonable length of time. I cannot guarantee crops, and will not be held responsible for them. If these goods are not accepted on these terms, they must be returned at once." — was held to preclude a purchaser with knowledge of the disclaimer from recovering damages to his land caused by the presence of mustard seed in the seed which he had purchased and sowed. When subsequently before the court, this clause was held not to be binding unless known to the purchaser and assented to by him, he using the seed with knowledge of the notice. 78 App. Div. 42, 80 N. Y. Supp. 34.

agreed that it should be relieved. It is not claimed that the contract is void, because contrary to public law or to public policy, and, if not, effect should be given to it. The vendee might reject and refuse to receive the peas if they were not "Advancer" peas, or it might well be that, in the event of the shipment being made in bad faith, and with the purpose and intention of committing fraud upon the vendee, an action for damages for the fraud would lie; but we have no such case before us. If it be conceded that the contract is one-sided, it must also be conceded that the parties had a right to make a one-sided contract if they saw fit.

Counsel for appellant cite the following authorities to sustain the contention that,

A disclaimer of warranty printed in fine type in the corner of a bill rendered the purchaser of the seed, prior to his planting the same, does not affect an implied warranty raised by the sale, where the notice does not in fact come to his attention. Landreth v. Wyckoff, 67 App. Div. 145, 73 N. Y. Supp. 388.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that a purchaser of seed is bound to know or understand that a card containing in one corner in fine print such a disclaimer, which he found in a bag of the seed, is intended as a contract, and that he must read and inform himself of its contents; but it is a question for the jury whether, coming to him as it did, he was bound to read the card and inform himself of its contents. Bell v. Mills, 78 App. Div. 42, 80 N. Y. Supp. 34.

Whether there was a warranty that onion seed was true to name, in view of the circumstances of the sale, and the fact that on the package containing the seed there was printed a nonwarranty provision, was held in Coates v. Harvey, 17 N. Y. S. R. 389, 2 N. Y. Supp. 5, a question for the jury.

In other jurisdictions a nonwarranty or disclaimer of warranty clause is held to preclude an implied warranty, whether actually coming to the notice of the purchaser or not, if by custom and usage it is a part of the contract.

Thus, it has been held that where a general custom prevails in the seed trade that the seller of seeds sells the same for seed purposes with a disclaimer of warranty, and such disclaimer is printed upon the package containing the seed, a sale is presumed to have been negotiated with reference to the general custom of the trade, and no implied warranty arises that the seed is true to name. Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' Canning Co. — Iowa, —, 132 N. W. 66.

Although it did not appear that the buyer read a disclaimer of warranty notice printed upon a package containing the seed purchased, it is held in Calhoon v. Brinker, 5 Ohio N. P. N. S. 122, 17 Ohio S. & C. P. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

notwithstanding the agreement of the parties, there was a warranty that the peas sold would answer the description contained in the contract, or in any event that there was a breach of a condition of the contract by the failure of the plaintiff to furnish the thing contracted for: Josling v. Kingsford, 13 C. B. N. S. 447, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 94, 9 Jur. N. S. 947, 7 L. T. N. S. 790, 11 Week. Rep. 377; Columbian Iron Works & D. D. Co. v. Douglas, 84 Md. 44, 33 L.R.A. 103, 57 Am. St. Rep. 362, 34 Atl. 1118; Shepherd v. Kain, 5 Barn. & Ald. 240, 24 Revised Rep. 344; Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560; Wieler v. Schilizzi, 17 C. B. 619. These cases do not hold that a party selling an article under a designated name may not relieve him-

Dec. 705, that the notice nevertheless constitutes a contract between the parties, and the purchaser cannot recover damages suffered by him because seed furnished was not true to name.

Where a canning company contracts to purchase for canning purposes the crop grown from seed which it sells, an implied warranty is raised that the seed sold will produce a crop suitable for canning purposes, and this is true although the grower of the seed has attached to the package containing the seed furnished a disclaimer of warranty on its part, since this disclaimer under the circumstances does not inure to the benefit of the canning company. Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' Canning Co. supra.

VI. Effect of ignorance on part of seller.

In Hoffman v. Dixon, 105 Wis. 315, 76 Am. St. Rep. 916, 81 N. W. 491, the court remarked: "There is no good reason why a dealer should be permitted to exhibit seed to his customers, asserting it to be rape seed when it is something else, and then protect himself from the consequences of his falsehood by a plea of ignorance. The injury by the deception is just as great whether it be wilful or innocent. The customer has the same right to rely upon the representation in the one case as in the other. Knowledge on the part of the vendor is not essential either to actionable fraud or a contract of warranty."

VII. Negligence of purchaser.

Opportunity on the part of a purchaser to inspect the seed which he purchases does not militate against his right to insist upon the condition of the contract as to the identity of the article delivered being made good, where he relies wholly on his contract, not knowing whether the article he receives answers such condition or not; and he is not chargeable with negligence because he did not inspect. Hoffman v. Dixon, supra.

A purchaser of seed can recover damages self from liability in his contract of sale, in the event that the article delivered does not answer the description contained in the contract. Some very general language is used in the contracts of sale involved in the cases cited, and in some of them it might well be construed as being broad enough to extend to the description of the article; but in none of the cases has it been so construed. These cases were decided upon the theory that this general language was intended to refer to the quality of the article furnished, and not to the description of the article itself. In Taylor v. Bullen, 5 Exch. 779, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 21, where an article was sold and the party undertook to relieve himself from liability in his contract of sale by stating that he would not be liable for "any defect or error whatsoever," it was held that the word "error" was broad enough to include an error in description, as well as an error in quality, and that there was no liability on the part of the vendor, even though the article furnished did not answer the description of the article contracted for. If the seller expressly refuses to warrant, there can be no excuse for raising an implied warranty. Habersham v. Rodrigues, 1 Speers, L. 314; Farr v. Gist, 1 Rich. L. 68; Fauntleroy v. Wilcox, 80 Ill. 477; Lynch v. Curfman, 65 Minn. 170, 68 N. W. 5.

The case of Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' Canning Co. — Iowa, —, 132 N. W. 66, is directly in point. There a package was where the seed in quality is inferior to the warranty, if it is a reasonable thing for him to plant the seed without examination. Wagstaff v. Short-Horn Dairy Co. Cab. & El. 324.

Contributory negligence on the part of the purchaser in failing to inspect the seed before sowing or planting the same may affect his right to recover damages for foul seed contained therein, discoverable upon inspection, even though the seller sold the seed as good clean seed, and stated that it was pure seed. The purchaser is not entitled to rely entirely upon representations as to the kind or quality of seed, but he should make an inspection of it before using, and if he fails to do so the question of his negligence in that regard is a question for the jury. Fox v. Everson, 27 Hun, 355.

After discovering that noxious seed is growing from seed purchased, it is the duty of the purchaser to use reasonable means to root it out and prevent its further growth if he can do so. He cannot lie idle and permit the noxious weed to seed and spread over his entire farm, and thus enhance his damages. Ibid.

VIII. Remedies of purchaser.

a. Rescission.

The purchaser upon discovering a breach of implied warranty of seeds may rescind the sale within a reasonable time and return the property, or he may retain it and avail himself of the damages he has suffered either by bringing a cross action for breach of warranty, or proving the real value and abating the recovery pro tanto. Frith v. Hollan, 133 Ala. 583, 91 Am. St. Rep. 54, 32 So. 494. If seed is sold to be sowed or planted, and it proves wholly worthless for this purpose, and totally useless and valueless for any purpose whatever, no recovery can be had in an action for the purchase price. Jolinson v. Sproull, 50 Mo. App. 121.

A purchaser may refuse to receive seed if not of the quality described in the con- 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tract. Gloster Oil Works v. Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. 87 Miss. 618, 40 So. 225. But a purchaser purchasing seed under a contract that the seed shall be clean and satisfactory, vital and fit for seed purposes, cannot arbitrarily reject seed that is clean, vital, and fit for such purposes, even though he claims the same is not satisfactory. Ferry v. Ballinger, 8 Kan. App. 756, 60 Pac. 824.

b. Damages.

1. In general.

The purchaser of seeds under a warranty of kind, quality, or fitness for the purpose intended, is entitled to recover from the seller damages for the breach of the warranty, which, by the weight of authority, include any loss occasioned him by the breach, the amount of which is reasonably certain, or capable of being ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty, providing the same can be said to have been fairly within the contemplation of the parties as a result of the breach. The amount recoverable frequently depends upon the nature of the warranty breached, and hence the cases have been classified according to the character of the warranty.

Consequential damages cannot be recovered where the purchaser has knowledge of the inferior character of the seed before sowing it. Oliver v. Hawley, 5 Neb. 439.

Where, in his petition for damages, the plaintiff seeks to apply a rule for ad-measuring the same which will result in his obtaining less damages than he is really entitled to, he will be limited in his recovery to the damages claimed. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410; Crutcher v. McManus, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 592.

That the purchaser uses the seed on land he leases on shares does not affect the measure of damages which he is entitled to recover. He is entitled to recover full damages for the breach of warranty, the warranty inuring to the benefit of the landlord as well as the tenant. Phillips v. Vermillion, 91 Ill. App. 133.

marked "Large Cheese Pumpkin Seed," and sold as such, when in fact it contained "Connecticut Pie Pumpkin Seed" mixed with a few squash. On the package the following warranty was printed: "While we exercise great care to have all seeds pure and reliable and true to name, our seeds are sold without any warranty, express or implied, and without any responsibility in respect to the crop." There was no evidence to show that the purchaser read this warranty, but there was evidence showing that it was a general custom among seedmen to sell seeds without warranty as to quality and as to true name, and such custom was held to be binding

Or the landowner may join with the tenant in an action for the damages. Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. post, 89.

2. Where seed is not sowed or planted.

Where seed is not as warranted, and the purchaser discovers this fact before using it, he may retain the seed and recover in damages the difference between the market price of the seed he received and the purchase price of the seed had it been as warranted. Dunn v. Bushnell, 63 Neb. 568, 93 Am. St. Rep. 474, 88 N. W. 693.

Where no special damages have resulted from a breach of warranty as to the kind of seed, and the seed is retained by the purchaser, the measure of damages is the difference between the value of seed of the kind which it was warranted to be and the value of the seed actually delivered. Americus Grocery Co. v. Brackett, 119 Ga. 489, 46 S. E. 657.

3. Where seed is mixed with other seed.

Where the seller is not informed that the buyer intends to mix the seed with other seed before sowing or planting it, the purchaser is not entitled to recover the value of the seed thus mixed with the impure seed purchased. Fox v. Everson, supra.

4. Where seed is not true to name.

It has been held that where seed is not true to name and no crop results from sowing it, the measure of damages for breach of the warranty of kind is the market value of the crop which would have been raised had the seed been as represented together with expenses actually incurred in producing the crop, not, however, including any cost of harvesting. Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. post, 89.

The damages recoverable for breach of an express or implied warranty that seed is true to name, where, before ascertaining the breach, the seed is planted or sown, and a crop results different in character than that which would have resulted had the seed been as warranted, is the difference between the value of the crop produced and the crop which would have been produced if the seed had been answerable to the warranty, embracing the profits. Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 490, 20 Am. Rep. 425.

For breach of an express warranty that seed is true to name, the measure of damages recoverable is the value of a crop 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

had the seed been true to name, such as would ordinarily have been produced that year, deducting the expense of raising the crop, and also the product and value of the crop actually raised. Grutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 592; Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753; White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13; Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed without opinion, in 107 N. Y. 523, 90 N. E. 1158; Gubner v. Vick, 25 N. Y. Week. Dig. 358, 6 N. Y. S. R. 4; Wagstaff v. Short-Horn Dairy Co. Cab. & El. 324; Page v. Pavey, 8 Car. & P. 769; Randall v. Raper, El. Bl. & El. 84, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 260, 4 Jur. N. S. 662, 6 Week. Rep. 445.

This measure of damages was applied in Moody v. Peirano, — Cal. App. —, 84 Pac. 783, as to the sale of wheat warranted to be white Australian, where the wheat was not true to name and produced a crop inferior in value to that which would have been produced had the seed been as warranted.

This rule of damages has been held to apply whether no crop at all or a crop of an inferior kind is grown. Crutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 592.

Where seed is sold under a warranty, express or implied, as to kind, the natural consequence of the breach of the warranty in this respect is a crop different in kind and quality from that which would have resulted had the seed been as warranted. If the seed produces a crop not harmful to the land, but of a poor character or of an inferior quality, and less value than would have been produced had the warranty been fulfilled, the measure of damages is the value of the crop of the true product such as the seed was warranted to produce, and such as would have ordinarily been produced that year, less the expense of raising it, and less also the value of the crop actually raised from the seed sold, — in other words, the difference between the market value of the crop raised and the crop which might have been raised from the seed ordered. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410.

The measure of damages for breach of warranty that hop roots were female hop roots, and good runners, where breached because the roots were male roots and worthless for cultivation and production, is all the damages thereby occasioned the purchaser, including the difference between the value of the crop raised and what it upon the purchaser. A contract deliberately entered into between two parties, exempting one of them from liability in case seeds sold are not true to name, should be as binding as a custom among dealers not to sell with a warranty that the seeds furnished are true to description.

As before stated, we do not hold that, if would have been had the roots been as warranted. Schutt v. Baker, 9 Hun, 556.

Where bulbs are sold for the understood purpose of raising lilies for a certain market, the measure of damages for breach of warranty as to the kind of bulbs is the difference between the value of the crop which the plaintiff raised and a crop of the kind he would have raised had the bulbs been true to name. Edgar v. Joseph Breck & Sons' Corp. 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083.

Where seed germinates and grows, but produces a crop different from what it would had the seed been as impliedly warranted, and the crop produced is worthless, the measure of damages for breach of the implied warranty is the value of the crop which might have been raised had the seed been as warranted, where such value is shown with reasonable certainty. Cline v. Mock. 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710.

Where seed, if true to name, would result in a perennial crop, that is one lasting from year to year, the measure of damages is the fair value of the crop lost, or the crop which would have been produced under ordinary circumstances if the seed had been as represented, together with the cost of reseeding, the cost of recultivation, and the cost of new seed sown. Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. Supp. 390, affirmed without opinion in 197 N. Y. 528, 90 N. E. 1158.

Where the seed germinates and a crop results of a different character from that which would have resulted had the seed been true to name, loss of profits are properly included in the measure of damages, since, from a legal point of view, they are neither remote nor uncertain, and the parties must have perceived at the time of making the contract that its breach would probably result in the loss of definite profits. Wolcott v. Mount, supra.

Where a crop, though of inferior quality, is raised from the seed, the means are thus furnished to enable the jury to make a proper estimate of the injury resulting from the loss of profits, and prospective profits are allowed. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, supra.

In Hurley v. Buchi, 10 Lea, 346, the right to recover speculative profits for breach of warranty in a sale of seed by description, where it is breached by furnishing seed of a different kind, is denied, and the measure of damages is said to be the difference between the value of the seed delivered and the value of the seed had it the plaintiff acted in bad faith and with the intention of deceiving and defrauding the defendant, or even if it failed to exercise due care and caution in selecting the seed, the latter would not have a cause of action for the resulting damage. No such cause of action has been stated in the counterclaim, and no claim was made on been as represented or warranted. In this case the purchaser planted the seed he had purchased and it produced a crop, but a crop much less in value than would have been the crop, had the seed been true to name, the principal difference being the time of maturity of the crop.

In determining the value of a crop which would have been raised if the seed had been of the kind represented, the seasons, the character of the land, the manner in which it was prepared and cultivated, and the crops which were grown in the neighborhood from the seed of the kind represented, are all to be considered. Crutcher v. Elliott, supra.

5. Where seed does not possess germinating power.

The damages recoverable for breach of warranty of seed warranted as to kind and quality, where, because of poor quality, it does not properly germinate and grow, but a partial crop results, is the difference in the price of the crop raised from the seed and the price of the crop which would have been raised from the seed had it been as warranted. Dunn v. Bushnell, 63 Neb. 568, 93 Am. St. Rep. 474, 88 N. W. 693.

Where seed is not in quality as represented, the measure of damages is the difference between the crop as actually raised and what it would have been had the seed been of the quality represented. Flick v. Wetherbee, 20 Wis. 392.

For breach of warranty for failure of seed to germinate, the purchaser may recover damages from the seller for all the loss necessarily sustained by him by reason of this defect. Shaw v. Smith, 45 Kan. 334, 11 L.R.A. 681, 25 Pac. 886.

For breach of warranty in the sale of seed, breached by the failure of seed to germinate and grow, the damages recoverable by the purchaser is the value of his labor expended in preparing his ground for the reception of the seed, after deducting all general benefit to the land resulting from such labor, and also value of the labor expended in planting the seed, and the amount paid for the seed, with interest on the several amounts. Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513.

Where seed fails to sprout and make a crop, the purchaser is entitled to recover only the actual expenses of planting the seed and the rental value of the land; he cannot recover the value of the crop had the seed been as warranted. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, supra.

the argument that any such cause of action was relied upon or existed.

The ruling of the trial court excluding testimony tending to show that the peas furnished were not Advancer peas was correct on the record presented. There was present but one of two elements that were necessary to constitute a cause of action. The element of bad faith was not presented by the pleadings, and no claim was made by counsel that such bad faith existed. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

The reason for denying the right to recover the value of the crop, where the seed wholly fails to germinate or grow after being planted, is that the evidence of the probable produce of the right seed in the land and the year in question are lacking, and the rule that the plaintiff must establish a quantum of his loss by evidence which will enable the jury to estimate the extent of his injury excludes such elements of the injury, the same being incapable of being ascertained by the usual rules of evidence to a reasonable degree of certainty. Ibid.

Where no fraud is alleged, nor any knowledge on the part of the seller that seed sold for planting purposes is bad, and the action is merely a suit on the warranty of the merchantable quality of the seed, which the law imposes, or on the express warranty of the fitness of the seed for planting, the breach being the failure of the seed to germinate and grow, the measure of recovery for breach of the warranty if the seed is worthless is the purchase money with interest and expense incurred in complying with the contract after the sale was entered into, such as the hauling of the seed, preparing the land for planting, etc. Butler v. Moore, 68 Ga. 780, 45 Am. Rep. 508.

Damages recoverable for a breach of warranty in the sale of seeds for seeding purposes, where breached by failure of the seed to germinate, is the amount which the purchaser paid for the seed, the amount which he expended in the preparation of the soil for the crop, and for the planting or sowing of the seed, and, where it is too late to plant another crop, the reasonable rent for the land, subject to be reduced, however, by such amount as the seller may be able to show that the purchaser could have rented the land for. Reiger v. Worth, 127 N. C. 230, 52 L.R.A. 362, 80 Am. St. Rep. 798, 37 S. E. 217.

It has, however, been held that where the seed fails to produce a crop, the measure of damages for breach of warranty is the fair value of the crop that might have been raised had the seed been as warranted. Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136; Crutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 592. And see Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. post, 89.

6. Where seed contains noxious seed, etc.

The measure of recovery for damages from the sale of seed as pure seed, which contains noxious seeds, is the amount of loss which the purchaser actually sustains, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and which would necessarily be expected to follow from the sale of impure seed. Fox v. Everson, 27 Hun, 355. The difference in value between pure seed and that sold is the measure of recovery where the land is not injured by noxious seeds therefrom. If the land is injured, in addition to these damages, the purchaser is entitled to recover the difference between the value of the land before the sowing of the seed, and the value of it after sowing, and for the purpose of determining the damages to the land, it is competent to show the extent to which the noxious seed had grown upon the land from the seed sown, the expense and labor, together with the difficulty, of removing and killing it, and the extent to which it would interfere with the growing and production of crops. Ibid.

Where the purchaser of seed, after sowing the same, discovers that it contains noxious weed seed which will injure his land, it is his duty to do whatever he can to make the damages as little as possible, and whether he acts in good faith in what he does in that regard is a question for the jury. Bell v. Mills, 68 App. Div. 531, 74 N. Y. Supp. 224. Thus, if he could remedy the injury by plowing up the noxious weeds, it would be his duty to do so, and thereby save his crop, and he would not be justified in plowing up the entire crop, although he would be justified in doing the latter if he could not otherwise get rid of the noxious weeds. Ibid.

7. Interest.

The purchaser is not entitled to recover interest on the damages from the time the crop would have been harvested and sold, since the demand is unliquidated, and the amount cannot be determined by computation simply, or reference to market values. White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, same case subsequent appeal in 78 N. Y. 393, 34 Am. Rep. 544.

But it has been held that where a warranty is breached by failure of the seed to germinate and grow, the purchaser is entitled to recover interest on the value of his labor expended in preparing his ground for the reception of the seed, after deducting benefits to the land from such labor, also interest on the value of the labor expended in planting the seed, and interest on the amount paid for the seed. Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513.

Generally, as to interest on unliquidated damages, see note in 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1.

Landlord and tenant — joint tenancy in crop — action for sale of unfit

1. One who, in renting land, reserves a share of the crop as rent, may join with the tenant in an action for damages against one from whom the tenant purchased seed which proves to be worthless, by reason of which the crop was lost.

Seed — unfitness — liability of seller.

2. One who sells unfit seed, knowing the purpose for which it is to be used, is liable for damages in case the crop is lost because of such unfitness.

Damages — loss of crop — deduction of cost of production..

3. To ascertain the damages for loss of a crop because of defective seed, the cost of production which has actually been incurred should not be deducted from the market value of the crop which should have been produced.

Same — contract price of seed.

4. The contract price of seed purchased for use on land, if not paid, should be deducted from the market value of the crop, in awarding damages for loss of the crop because of the defective character of the seed.

Appeal — erroneous instruction on

5. A judgment for damages should not be reversed for error in an instruction as to the measure of damages, if the amount which the verdict was increased by the error is easily ascertained, and a remittitur is filed for that amount.

15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 544; Foote v. Colvin, 3 Johns. 216, 3 Am. Dec. 478.

Crow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for damages by M. P. Fuhrman and Frank L. Huston against the Interior Warehouse Company, a corporation. The complaint, in substance, alleges that the plaintiff Frank L. Huston, being the owner of tillable land in Klickitat county, granted its possession to his coplaintiff, M. P. Fuhrman, under a lease, by the terms of which Fuhrman agreed to pay Huston a rental of one third of any and all crops grown thereon during the year 1909; that Fuhrman, with the intention of growing a crop of wheat-hay, thoroughly plowed, cultivated, and prepared the land, and applied to defendant, Interior Warehouse Company, to purchase blue-stem wheat with which to seed the land, that he notified the defendant he wanted blue-stem wheat for seed; that defendant, so knowing his wants, needs, and purposes, sold him a variety of winter wheat known as "forty-fold," which Fuhrman used in seeding, believing it to be a blue-stem; that Fuhrman seeded the land in March and April, 1909; that forty-fold wheat is not adapted to, but is worthless for, spring sowing; that it will sprout, but will not mature or produce a crop, and that the plaintiffs, without fault on their part, lost their entire crop, to their damage in the sum of $1,050. To this complaint a demurrer was overruled, and the defendant answered. On trial the jury, in compliance with instructions of the trial court, divided the damages in the proportion of two thirds and one third, and returned a verdict in favor of Fuhrman for $420, and in favor of Huston for $210. The defendant has appealed from the final judgment entered thereon.

The demurrer was special and general; its grounds being (1) a defect of parties plaintiff, (2) improper joinder of several causes of action, and (3) insufficient facts pleaded to state a cause of action. Appellant first assigns error on the order overruling the demurrer, and in substance contends that, as respondent Huston was the landlord of respondent Fuhrman, the alleged sale of wheat, if made to either, was made to the latter only; that no privity of contract exists between Huston and appellant; that Huston has no separate cause of action against appellant; that he and Fuhrman have no joint or common cause of action against appellant; and that they are improperly joined as parties plaintiff. The allegations of the complaint show Fuhrman was tilling the land upon an agreement to yield to Huston a specified portion of the crop raised. This made the respondents tenants in common in the crop. The weight of authority is that every contract whereby use of land is given to a party to cultivate and return to the owner a specified portion of the crop produced creates a tenancy in common in the crop, and that this is true whether the agreement between the parties is a lease or a mere cropping contract. The tendency of the courts is to hold that, whenever there is a provision in any form of contract for a specific division of crops produced, a tenancy in common arises therein. Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, 2d ed. § 100; Foote v. Colvin, 3 Johns. 216, 3 Am. Dec. 478; Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill, 234, 37 Am. Dec. 309; Aiken v. Smith, 21 Vt. 172; Smyth v. Tankersley, 20 Ala. 212, 56 Am. Dec. 193; Dinehart v. Wilson, 15 Barb. 595; Abernethy v. Uhlman, 52 Or. 359, 93 Pac. 936, 97 Pac. 540. In Smyth v. Tankersley, 20 Ala. 212, 56 Am. Dec. 193, the court said: "In the case of Thompson v. Mawhinney, 17 Ala. 362, 52 Am. Dec. 176, it was decided by this court that a contract made with the owner of land, which the other party agreed to cultivate and to divide the products equally with him, was not, technically speaking, a lease, but that a tenancy in common was created in the products. In the contract under consideration, the mode of compensation adopted repels the conclusion that it could have been the intention of the parties that the land should not be cultivated, and thus assimilates its terms more closely to the contract in the case last cited. It is true the phraseology adopted is that which is usual in leases, but the substance of the agreement is to be regarded, rather than the words. Putnam v. Wise, supra. And in contracts of this description the true test seems to be that, wherever provision is made for dividing the specific products of the land, a tenancy in common results. Putnam v. Wise, supra, and authorities there cited."

Although the appellant sold the seed wheat to Fuhrman only, the sale was for the benefit of Huston as well. He was interested in the prospective crop. A sale of seed wheat unfit for use damaged him as directly and positively as it did Fuhrman. It caused him to lose the one third which he was to receive for the use of his land as completely as it caused Fuhrman to lose his two thirds. In Foote v. Colvin, supra, it was held that the owner of land, and his lessee cultivating it on shares, have joint property in the crops, and may jointly maintain an action against a third person who wrongfully cuts and removes them. If Huston and Fuhrman were both injured as the direct result of appellant's act in selling the latter seed wheat unfit for use, they, as tenants in common in the crop, have a joint cause of action against appellant for their damages sustained. The demurrer was properly overruled.

Appellant contends its motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. We have carefully examined the evidence, and find that, although conflicting, it was sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury on the issues of fact submitted, and that the nonsuit was properly denied. The evidence introduced was sufficient to show that, for the joint benefit of Huston and himself, the respondent Fuhrman properly plowed, cultivated, and prepared the land for seeding; that he purchased the wheat, which he understood and appellant represented to be blue-stem, suitable for spring sowing; that Fuhrman used it to seed the land; that the crop did not mature sufficiently to justify the expense of harvesting; that it was not harvested for that reason; and that it was a total loss. It also appeared that the respondent Fuhrman had not paid appellant for the seed wheat purchased and used by him. On the measure of damages the trial court instructed the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence and a preponderance thereof that plaintiff is entitled to recover from defendant, you will allow him such sum, not exceeding $1,050, as is equal to the market value of such crop as plaintiff would have raised upon his land if the wheat had been as represented by the defendant, less the cost of harvesting such crop, and less the value, if any, of such crop as was raised that season upon the land plant-

Appellant contends this instruction was erroneous, in that it stated an improper measure of damages. In Shotwell v. Dodge, 8 Wash. 337, 36 Pac. 254, this court held the proper measure of damages for a lost crop to be its market value, less the cost of producing, harvesting, and marketing the same. Here the respondent Fuhrman had incurred and paid all expense of cultivating, seeding, and producing a crop, aside from the cost of the seed wheat used, but he incurred no expense of harvesting. Expense or cost of producing the crop, actually incurred by respondent Fuhrman, should not be deducted from its market value, but such expense of producing and harvesting as he had not incurred should be deducted. The value of a probable crop upon the land was shown, and no expense of marketing should be deducted. The instruction was erroneous, in that it failed to instruct the jury to deduct the cost of the seed wheat used which respondent Fuhrman had purchased from appellant, and for which he had not made payment. Appellant claimed the seed wheat was not sold to Fuhrman, but to his mother. The jury, however, found the sale was made to the respondent, and the evidence sustains this finding. Appellant, in a communication made to Mrs. Fuhrman, claimed sales of the wheat in dispute were made for a total price of $87.84, the highest value mentioned in the evidence. It is apparent that the only possible prejudicial effect of the instructions given and above quoted was to increase the damages to that extent.

Other objections are predicated upon rulings of the court on the evidence, and on instructions given or refused. We, however, find the record free from prejudicial error, except as above stated, and consider that we have discussed all controlling questions of law or fact arising on this appeal. As the only possible effect of the erroneous instruction above mentioned, prejudicial to the appellant, would be to increase the damages awarded to the extent of $87.84, a new trial should not be granted, except at respondents' election. It is ordered that if, within twenty days after remittitur, the respondents file with the clerk of the superior court notice of their election to remit $87.84 of the damages awarded, the judgment as thus modified be affirmed; and that otherwise a new trial be granted. The appellant will recover its costs in this court.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

AMERICAN SALES BOOK COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.
E. G. WHITAKER.

(— Ark. —, 140 S. W. 132.)

Principal and agent — authority to accept rescission of sale.

1. One employed to solicit orders for, or make sales of, goods, has no implied authority to take back goods sold and delivered, because of dissatisfaction on the part of the customer.

Appeal — wrongful admission of evidence — withdrawal.

2. The erroneous admission of evidence is not reversible error if it is withdrawn by the court from the consideration of the jury.

Evidence — parol to show when written contract is to take effect.

3. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a written contract of sale was not to take effect until the purchaser had an opportunity to inspect the goods and find them satisfactory.

(October 16, 1911.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County affirming a judgment of a Justices' Court in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the purchase money for certain goods alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant under a written contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Implied power of agent to assent to rescission of contract.

In general.

It is a general rule that the law will not imply the power to abrogate from the mere power to fulfil or carry out a contract. Ye Seng Co. v. Corbitt, 7 Sawy. 368, 9 Fed. 423. Nor will mere authority to make a contract for another raise an implication of authority to cancel or surrender the contract, once it is made. Stilwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 385.

Authority to sell.

It is very generally held that mere authority to sell, or solicit orders for the sale of, an article, raises no inference of authority to rescind a completed sale, even though the rescission is by the same agent who made the original contract of sale. Stoddart v. Warren, Fed. Cas. No. 13,471; Bradford v. Bush, 10 Ala. 386; Lindow v. Cohn, 5 Cal. App. 388, 90 Pac. 485; Luke v. Griggs, 4 Dak. 287, 30 N. W. 170; Diversy v. Kellogg, 44 Ill. 114, 92 Am. Dec. 154; Samuels v. Northrup Nat. Bank, 234

Messrs. Pace & Pace for appellant.

Mr. J. W. Story, for appellee:

The evidence did not tend to contradict the alleged written order, or to vary its import. It only showed that the order had never in fact been delivered as a present binding obligation, and it was competent to show the circumstances and conditions under which the alleged order and the goods were delivered.

W. 855; State v. Wallis, 57 Ark. 64, 20 S. W. 811; Ware v. Allen, 128 U. S. 590, 32 L. ed. 563, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174; Burke v.

Gorsuch, 154 Pa. 413, 26 Atl. 434; Mange-Weiner Co. v. Patton Worsham Drug Co. 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 315; Adrain v. Lane, 13 S. C. 183; Kountz v. Gates, 78 Wis. 415, 47 N. W. 729.

Stating the rule in Bradford v. Bush, 10 Ala. 386, the court said: "It does not follow that if a person is authorized to sell property, his agency continues, so as to permit him to rescind the sale, or adjust the damages which the vendee may sustain by a breach of warranty. The transaction is complete by the sale, and the rights of the parties become vested, the one in the thing sold, and the other in the price."

Applying the general doctrine, it has been held that an agent for subscriptions, or a canvasser of books, has no implied authority to cancel subscriptions after taking them. Stoddart v. Warren, Fed. Cas. No. 13,471. And that a traveling agent or solicitor of orders has no implied authority to rescind or change a contract for the sale of goods after the receipt of the goods by the purchaser (Brigham v. Hibbard, 28 Or. 386, 43 Pac. 383; Diversy v. Kellogg, 44 Ill. 114, 92 Am. Dec. 154), even though some were to be applied as a credit upon goods thereafter to be furnished (Lindow v. Cohn, 5 Cal. App. 388, 90 Pac. 485).

Employment to solicit and send in orders for goods and to collect outstanding accounts does not authorize an agent to release a purchaser from liability for the price of goods theretofore purchased, and accept another in his stead. Ludwig v. Gorsuch, 154 Pa. 413, 26 Atl. 434.

A mere agent to sell personally does not possess implied authority to rescind an executed sale, thereby reinvesting his principal with title to property, the title to which had theretofore passed to another under a pre-existing contract of purchase. Fletcher Bros. v. Nelson, 6 N. D. 94, 69 N. W. 53.

Frauenthal, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit to recover from appellee the purchase money of a recapitulator, and certain supplies connected therewith, which appellant alleged it had sold to him in pursuance of a written contract therefor. The suit originated in a justice of the peace court, from whose judgment an appeal was taken to the circuit court. In the circuit court a verdict was returned in favor of appellee, and from the judgment entered thereon this appeal is prosecuted.

The appellant was located at Elmyra, with authority to sell or dispose of it in his discretion does not authorize him to rescind a contract of sale after having entered into it. Kountz v. Gates, 78 Wis. 415, 47 N. W. 729.

—land contracts.

Authority to sell land does not operate per se to confer upon the agent authority to cancel the contract of sale without the principal's knowledge or consent. West End Hotel & Land Co. v. Crawford, 120 N. C. 347, 27 S. E. 31.

Acting as agent in a sale of land raises no inference of authority, after the execution of the contract, to rescind the sale or modify the terms thereof. Adrain v. Lane, 13 S. C. 183.

Upon execution by an agent of the contract to sell real estate for his principal, his authority ceases, and he has no authority thereafter to cancel or rescind the contract. Samuels v. Northrup Nat. Bank, 234 Ill. 9, 84 N. E. 721.

A power of attorney to sell real estate confers upon the agent no authority to cancel the contract once made. Luke v. Griggs, 4 Dak. 287, 30 N. W. 170.

Where authority not terminated by contract.

Where a contract of sale is incomplete, it has been held that an agent having general authority in reference to the sale and delivery of the property has implied power to consent to rescission of the contract. On this theory Denman v. Bloomer, 11 Ill. 177, same case, subsequent appeal, 12 Ill. 240, holds that authority to make a sale implies authority to rescind it, where the sale is not entirely complete, because all the purchase price has not been paid. This doctrine is also sustained in Palmer v. Roath, 86 Mich. 602, 49 N. W. 590, holding that an agent who obtained an order for a machine which was shipped direct to him in fulfillment of the order had authority to agree with the purchaser to take the machine back if he did not want it, the purchaser objecting to it on the

New York, and was engaged in the manufacture and sale of the goods for the purchase money of which this action was instituted. It claims to have sold the goods to appellee through a salesman under a written contract executed by appellee. The written contract is in the nature of an order, signed by appellee, by which he directed the appellant to ship to him by freight, f. o. b. Elmyra, New York, said goods on or about June 20, 1909, and agreed to pay therefor the sum of $35; it being stated in said written order that $5 of said purchase money was paid in cash, and the balance was to be paid in monthly instalments.

The testimony on the part of the appellant tended to prove that it shipped the goods in the manner set out in said written order, and that appellee had refused to pay therefor. The appellee testified that the appellant's salesman saw him at his place of business at Alpena, Arkansas, and endeavored to sell him the goods, and that he refused to buy, and finally the salesman said: "I have one more proposition to make to you, and that is this: I will send an outfit to you on trial for thirty days, and at the end of that time, if it is not satisfactory, you can ship it back;" and that appellee thereupon signed the order. Afterwards the goods were shipped, and upon trial they proved unsatisfactory to the appellee. Later the salesman came to appellee's place of business, and he told the salesman that the goods were not satis-ground that it did not comply with the order.

So, where the authority of an agent is not exhausted by merely executing in behalf of his principal a contract, the power to rescind a previously executed contract is implied. Thus, an agent and blockman having authority to make contracts, settlements, collect balances, and such like, has power to relieve a purchaser of surplus goods previously sold him, and have them shipped to other points. Herpolsheimer v. Arme Harvester Co. 83 Neb. 53, 119 N. W. 30.

Apparently upon the same theory it has been held that a person having transacted business at different times with the traveling representative of another, who had approved of such transactions and delivered goods to him upon orders to such agent, and had accepted payments for the same through the agent, has the right to rely upon an agreement by the agent for his release as guarantor of notes held by the principal, substituting therefor a chattel security. A. A. Cooper Wagon & Buggy Co. v. Torbert, 86 Neb. 143, 124 N. W. 1134.

Where agency general.

It has been held that where the powers of the selling agent are general, it is competent for him, with the consent of the purchaser, to rescind a prior executed sale, revert the title, and make a conditional sale to the same purchaser on terms which would leave the property at his principal's risk until the conditions were performed. Scott v. Wells, 6 Watts & S. 357, 40 Am. Dec. 568.

An agent authorized to contract generally for the purchase of grain may rescind a contract theretofore made by him for the purchase of certain grain so long as authority to make other purchases continues. Anderson v. Coonley, 21 Wend. 279.

A person having charge of an elevator, with authority to buy and receive grain, to contract for future deliveries, and attending generally to the principal's business at the place where the elevator is located, has authority to rescind a contract to purchase grain. Middle Division Elevator Co. v. Vandeventer, 80 Ill. App. 669.

General authority as managing clerk, in the absence of the principal, authorizes the clerk to consent to take back goods sold to another, who tendered them back on the ground that he was insolvent and unable to pay for them, and such rescission is binding upon attaching creditors of the insolvent, attaching the goods after the rescission. Sturtevant v. Orser, 24 N. Y. 538, 82 Am. Dec. 321.

A general agent taking in his own name a bond importing a direct obligation for a conditional reconveyance of land to him within a certain time has the right to discharge, modify, or control the obligation. He may entirely release the obligor, or cause him to reconvey to himself or another. Ricketson v. Richardson, 19 Cal. 330.

Authority to rent or collect rent.

Authority to collect rent does not imply authority to accept a surrender of the lease. Blake v. Dick, 15 Mont. 236, 48 Am. St. Rep. 671, 38 Pac. 1072. Neither does authority to rent premises and collect the rent. Berry v. No. 1465 Broadway Co. 132 N. Y. Supp. 1050. That a husband living with his wife has collected the rents from her property and attended to the making of repairs raises no implication of authority on his part to accept a surrender of a lease. Rex v. Forbes, 36 N. B. 333. Authority to approve of a subtenant implies no authority to accept a surrender of a lease. Baylis v. Prentice, 75 N. Y. 604. A lawyer controlling the general legal business of a lessor has no implied power to consent to the surrender of a lease and release the lessee for rent thereunder. Jamestown & F. R. Co. v. Egbert, 152 Pa. 53, 25 Atl. 151.

Miscellaneous.

Power to receive and receipt for money paid does not include power to release or exchange a security for the balance of a debt. McHany v. Schenk, 88 Ill. 357.

Authority to obtain a release of a right factory, and that he did not want them. He testified that the salesman then told him to box the goods up, and he would advise him where to send them. Thereupon the appellee delivered the goods to a common carrier, taking bill of lading therefor, and shipped same to appellant, who refused to take them back. The lower court ruled that all the testimony introduced by appellee relative to the statements of the salesman at the time the written order was signed, to the effect that the goods would be sent on trial with the privilege to appellee of shipping them back if not satisfactory, was incompetent, and instructed the jury not to consider same in evidence. Thereupon the lower court, among other instructions, gave the following to the jury: "(2) I further instruct you that if the agent salesman who sold the goods to defendant took up the goods in question, ordered the goods boxed and held for further orders, that it would be a cancellation of the order, and you should find for the defendant."

It is urged that the court erred in giving said above instruction, because the salesman had no authority to rescind or cancel the sale after it had been completed. It is well settled, we think, that the power which an agent has to bind his principal rests upon the authority which the principal has given to him. If the agent has acted without authority, or outside of the scope of his authority, real or apparent, then the principal is not bound for such act. One who deals with an agent is at once put upon inquiry, and must discover whether the agent has the authority to do the proposed act. But, where the agency is proved without showing its extent, then it is presumed that general authority has been given in regard to the business in which such agency is concerned. Without notice to the contrary, the agent is presumed to have authority to do all acts necessary to carry out the particular employment in which he is engaged by the principal. This court has held in the case of Keith v. Herschberg Optical Co. 48 Ark. 138, 2 S. W. 777, that "a third person has a right to assume, without notice to the contrary, that the traveling salesman of a wholesale house has an unqualified authority to act for the firm he represents in all matters which come within the scope of that employment." The ob-of way does not imply authority to cancel a release after having obtained it. Guess v. South Bound R. Co. 40 S. C. 450, 19 S. E. 68.

Mere authority to act for the charterers of a vessel in procuring a cargo in a foreign port does not authorize the agent to modify or cancel the charter party of his principal. Ye Seng Co. v. Corbett, 7 Sawy. 368, 9 Fed. 423; Ricketson v. Richardson, 19 Cal. 330.

A husband taking out an insurance policy in favor of his wife has no implied authority to consent to its cancellation where the policy is irrevocable so far as concerns the husband, since authority to make a contract for another is not sufficient to authorize its cancellation or surrender. Stillwell v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 385.

The purchaser of a ticket for the transportation of another has implied authority to return the ticket so long as it remains in his possession, and receive the money therefor, the seller having no knowledge that the ticket belonged to others for whom the purchaser was acting as agent. Lurie v. Public Bank, 65 Misc. 583, 120 N. Y. Supp. 855.

Right to agree to subsequent rescission.

An agent authorized to sell may stipulate as one of the terms of sale that the goods sold may be returned if not satisfactory. Oster v. Mickley, 35 Minn. 245, 28 N. W. 710; Eastern Mfg. Co. v. Brenk, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 97, 73 S. W. 538. If intrusted with an article to sell, with no restrictions on his authority, he may sell subject to 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

trial, and agree that the property may be returned and the sale rescinded if the article is not satisfactory to the purchaser. Deering v. Thom, 29 Minn. 120, 12 N. W. 350. And after entering into a contract for the sale of a machine, the agent has authority to modify the contract by agreeing that the purchaser may take the machine home, try it, and if not satisfactory, return it, and the sale be rescinded. Warder, B. & G. Co. v. Fischer, 110 Wis. 363, 85 N. W. 968.

Authority to sell goods is presumed to authorize sales in the usual manner in which similar articles are sold, and does not imply authority to give the purchaser the right to return goods subsequently purchased from the principal. Ide v. Brody, 156 Ill. App. 479.

A traveling salesman without express authority or the right of custom or trade so to do cannot, on the sale of goods to a customer, agree in behalf of his principal that the goods or any portion of them may be returned up to the date of settlement, even though at the time the season for the sale by his principal of such goods to the retail trade had quite, if not entirely, expired. Friedman & Sons v. Kelly, 126 Mo. App. 279, 102 S. W. 1066.

A soliciting agent whose authority is by the contract restricted to the mere solicitation of contracts, with no authority to receive money thereon, the contract also containing a provision that "any statement, verbal or otherwise, to be recognized, must be written on the face of this contract, in ink," has no power to rescind or modify the contract by verbal agreement. White v. Massey, 65 Mo. App. 260. A. G. S.

ject of the employment and the authority, real or apparent, given to an agent who makes sales or solicits orders for goods, is to do all those things and to enter into such agreements as are necessary to make the sales or to secure the orders for the goods. He has the authority, real or apparent, to agree upon the terms of the sale, and to sell conditionally or unconditionally, where the person with whom he deals has no notice of any limitation upon his authority. Ibid.; Jacobway v. Insurance Co 49 Ark. 320, 5 S. W. 339. But, according to the great weight of authority, an agent who is only empowered by his principal to solicit orders for or to make sale of goods has no implied authority to receive payment therefor or to modify or cancel such sale. After an order is executed or a sale completed, the authority of the agent in the matter is at an end. His authority is only to make contracts, to solicit orders for goods, or to make sale thereof. He has no implied power to give up interests that have been acquired, or to cancel rights which have been obtained.

The agent who solicits orders for or makes sales of goods has no implied power, once the order is executed or the sale made, either to modify or to rescind the contract. As is said in 1 Clark & Skyles Law of Agency, 588: "It is well-settled rule that an agent with authority to sell goods has no authority, after the contract of sale has been completed or executed, to revoke or rescind the sale and receive back the goods which he had previously sold, or to alter his contract in any material point." 2 Mechem, Sales, §§ 1448, 1456; 31 Cyc. 1360. The case at bar was tried by the lower court upon the theory that the appellee had entered into a written contract by which he had made an unconditional purchase of the goods. The agent representing the appellant in making the sale was a traveling salesman. The scope of his authority was only to make such an agreement as was necessary to secure the order for or make the sale of the goods. After the order was executed and the sale completed his authority ceased, and he could not bind his principal by any act done which was thereafter without the scope of his employment. There is no testimony indicating that this salesman had express authority to cancel or to alter the contract of sale after it was made, and he had no implied authority under the law to do this.

He therefore had no authority by which his principal could be bound, to direct the appellee to box up the goods and ship them back, and thereby to settle his indebtedness to appellant. He had no power, either actual or apparent, to compromise the debt by taking the goods back. There was therefore no evidence adduced upon the trial of this case upon which to base the above instruction No. 2, which was given by the court; and it follows that the court erred in giving said instruction to the jury.

The appellant also urges in his brief that the court erred in permitting the introduction of the parol testimony that the sale was made with the further parol agreement that appellee could return the goods in event they did not prove satisfactory after a thirty-day trial. This contention is made upon the ground that such verbal testimony would add to or vary the terms of the written contract. But appellant is in no attitude to complain of the action of the court in this particular, for the reason that the court subsequently withdrew this testimony from the consideration of the jury, and specifically instructed them not to regard it as evidence in the case. The question raised by that testimony was not afterwards made an issue in the case, by instructions or otherwise. Inasmuch, however, as this case must be remanded for a new trial, we deem it proper to note the question thus raised by the attempted introduction of this parol testimony.

It is a well-settled rule of evidence that, where a written contract is plain, unambiguous, and complete in its terms, parol evidence is not admissible to contradict, vary, or add to any of its terms. Dalhoff Constr. Co. v. Maurice, 86 Ark. 162, 110 S. W. 218; Boston Store v. Schleuter, 88 Ark. 213, 114 S. W. 242; Bradley Gin Co. v. J. L. Means Mach. Co. 94 Ark. 130, 126 S. W. 81; Cox v. Smith, — Ark. —, 138 S. W. 978. But this rule of evidence applies only to those written contracts which have been fully executed and finally consummated. Parol testimony is always admissible to show that a purported written contract was not actually executed and concluded as a completed contract, and that the written instrument, though signed, was not, in fact, finally executed and finally delivered as a contract. It is competent to show by parol testimony that a written instrument, though signed, should not be a binding and completed contract until certain precedent conditions should be fulfilled; in other words, that a written instrument was not in fact to take effect in event of certain contingencies not happening or conditions not being performed.

In the case at bar, if the written instrument, though signed, was not actually delivered as a binding contract, but was signed with the understanding that it should only be held, without becoming effective, until after the appellee had an opportunity to inspect the goods and accept them, if satisfactory, then the instrument, though signed, would not be a completed contract. Such testimony tended to prove that the purported written instrument was not actually executed and delivered. Instead of adding to or varying any of the terms of the written contract, such testimony tended to show that the written contract was not actually entered into. A written contract, actually entered into, which is unconditional in its terms, cannot be varied by parol testimony, which tends to add a condition as one of the terms of the contract. Cox v. Smith, supra. But parol testimony is admissible to show that a written instrument was not signed or delivered as a concluded contract, but was only signed and delivered, to be held pending the happening of a contingency or the performance of some condition, and that subsequently such contingency did not happen or that such condition was not performed, and therefore that the written instrument did not actually become effective as a completed contract. Graham v. Remmel, 76 Ark. 140, 88 S. W. 899, 6 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 167; Barr Cash & Package Co. v. Brooks-Ozan Mercantile Co. 82 Ark. 219, 101 S. W. 408.

We do not deem it proper to pass on the question as to the sufficiency of the above parol testimony adduced upon the trial of this case to show that the written instrument was not a completed contract, for the reason that upon the further trial of this case other and different testimony may be introduced upon this question of fact.

For the error in giving said above instruction No. 2, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

PERRI W. FRISBY, Appt.,

v.

UNITED STATES.

(38 App. D. C. 22.)

Criminal law — ex post facto law — changing rules of evidence.

The repeal, after the commission of an alleged forgery, of a statute which prevents the use against accused of any discovery or evidence obtained from him by means of any judicial proceeding, so as to permit the use against him of the paper alleged to have been forged, which was originally exhibited by him in an equity suit, and of his testimony in that suit, is ex post facto and invalid, where the crime could not have been established without the aid of the record in the other suit.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court, convicting him of forging a contract for the sale of land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry E. Davis for appellant.

Mr. Jesse C. Adkins, with Mr. Clarence R. Wilson, for the United States:

The repeal of the statute is not ex post facto.

Mr. Justice Van Orsdel delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Perri W. Frisby, hereafter for convenience referred to as defendant, was indicted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia for the forgery of a certain written instrument purporting to be a contract for the sale of real estate. This paper was originally produced by defendant as an exhibit to his answer in a suit in equity, in which cause he also testified as a witness in his own behalf. It was after the alleged forged instrument had been exhibited in the equity pleading and defendant had testified in said cause that he was indicted for forging the instrument.

At the time the instrument was filed, § 860, U. S. Rev. Stat., U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 661, was in force in this District. It was as follows: "No pleading of a party, nor any discovery or evidence ob-

Note.—Ex post facto law: repeal of statute excluding evidence discovered or obtained by judicial proceedings against accused.

No other case has been found passing upon this precise point. Some light is thrown upon it, however, by general principles laid down by the courts.

It is stated that laws which make conviction easier by changing the rules of evidence, so that less or different evidence is required to convict, are ex post facto as to prior offenses. 8 Cyc. 1031. And this rule goes to support the doctrine of FRISBY v. UNITED STATES.

Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to tained from a party or witness by means of a judicial proceeding in this or any foreign country, shall be given in evidence, or in any manner used against him or his property or estate, in any court of the United States, in any criminal proceeding, or for the enforcement of any penalty or forfeiture; provided, that this section shall not exempt any party or witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in discovering or testifying as aforesaid." Between the finding of the indictment and the conviction of defendant this statute was repealed. 36 Stat. at. L. 352, chap. 216.

convict the offender, is an ex post facto law within the words and the intent of the constitutional prohibition. It is stated by the court that Sir William Blackstone also considered such a law ex post facto, and that the same opinion was confirmed by the editor of the Federalist. Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 391, 1 L. ed. 650.

This definition has been accepted and followed in other cases. Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. ed. 356; Goode v. State, 50 Fla. 45, 39 So. 461.

Calder v. Bull, supra, is a leading case upon the scope of the constitutional prohibition against ex post facto laws. The court seems, however, to have gone beyond the actual necessities of the case, and the broad definition laid down there has been said to be a mere dictum.

Where, under the law as it stood at the time of the offense, a conviction of murder in the second degree, even though set aside or reversed, was conclusive evidence of innocence of the charge of murder in the first degree, a subsequent change providing that murder in the second degree, if reversed or set aside, shall not operate as a bar to a conviction of murder in the first degree, is an ex post facto law within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition. Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443.

A law authorizing conviction upon different testimony than was required at the time the act was done is ex post facto as to such an act. This rule was applied to a statute giving the term "horse" a generic meaning, so that an indictment for stealing a horse could be sustained by proof of the theft of a gelding. Valesco v. State, 9 Tex. App. 76. Same rule applied to a statute allowing an allegation of ownership of joint property to be in either of the joint owners. Calloway v. State, 7 Tex. App. 585; Hannahan v. State, 7 Tex. App. 664.

Where, after an indictment for bigamy, a law was passed allowing marriages to be proved by circumstantial evidence in addition to direct evidence, it was held, as to such an indictment, ex post facto. State v. Johnson, 12 Minn. 476, Gil. 378, 93 Am. Dec. 241.

There was a strong dissenting opinion, however, in FRISBY v. UNITED STATES. And there is considerable weight of authority to support this opposing view. Thus it is said that a constitutional provision against ex post facto laws cannot properly be regarded as affecting a change of a rule of evidence. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 2a.

But alterations which do not increase the punishment nor change the ingredients of the offense, nor the ultimate facts necessary to establish guilt, but leave untouched the nature of the crime, and the amount or degree of proof essential to conviction, relate to modes of procedure only, in which no one can be said to have a vested right, and which the state, upon grounds of public policy, may regulate at pleasure. Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 28 L. ed. 262, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 417; Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U. S. 380, 43 L. ed. 204, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922.

A statute which enlarges the class of persons who may be competent as witnesses is not ex post facto in its application to offenses previously committed, for it does not attach criminality to any act previously done, and which was innocent when done, nor aggravate past crimes, nor increase the punishment therefor; nor does it alter the degree or lessen the amount or measure of the proof made necessary to conviction for such offenses. Such alterations relate to modes of procedure only, which the state may regulate at pleasure, and in which no one can be said to have a vested right. Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 28 L. ed. 262, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 417; Laughlin v. Com. 13 Bush, 261; Hart v. State, 40 Ala. 32, 88 Am. Dec. 752; Mrous v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 597, 37 Am. St. Rep. 834, 21 S. W. 764.

There is no vested right in a rule of evidence. Such rules affect the remedy only, and it is within the constitutional power of the legislature to change them. This was applied to a case where a statute was passed, permitting husband and wife to testify against each other in special cases. Burk v. Putman, 113 Iowa, 232, 86 Am. St. Rep. 372, 84 N. W. 1053; Meadowcroft v. People, 163 Ill. 56, 35 L.R.A. 176, 54 Am. St. Rep. 447, 45 N. E. 303.

Opening new sources of light, or increasing the means of proving or detecting crime, cannot be said to require less evidence to convict, or become ex post facto. So with a statute permitting a seduced woman to testify against the accused. Mrous v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 597, 37 Am. St. Rep. 834, 21 S. W. 764.

After a conviction for arson a statute was passed making an authenticated copy of a former judgment and commitment competent and prima facie evidence of such judgment and commitment. In a later trial for larceny, this statute was alleged to be ex post facto; but the court disregarded the allegation, chiefly, however, upon the ground that the record did not show that the trial court considered the statute at all. State v. Dowden, 137 Iowa, 573, 115 N. W. 211.

H. C. Sh.

On trial, the contract as it appeared in the equity cause, together with certain portions of defendant's evidence in that proceeding, was admitted in evidence against the accused over the objection and exception of his counsel, who contended that defendant could not be deprived of the immunity granted by § 860, supra, and that the repealing act was, as to him, ex post facto legislation, and therefore void. This is the sole question presented on this appeal.

It is not always an easy task to determine just when a statute is ex post facto in its application to a given case. The provision of the Federal Constitution forbidding the enactment of ex post facto laws (art. 1, § 9, cl. 3) has called forth a vast volume of opinion by the Federal and state courts. In the early case of Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648, the court defined an ex post facto law as follows: "1st. Every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal; and punishes such action. (2d.) Every law that aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed. 3d. Every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed. 4th. Every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender. All these and similar laws are manifestly unjust and oppressive."

It will be observed from the above definition that a law, to be ex post facto, must be one that deprives the person accused of crime of a substantial right in which he was protected and granted immunity by the law in force at the time of the commission of the offense. In other words, any statute is held to be ex post facto "which, by its necessary operation, and in relation to the offense or its consequences, alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage." However, it has generally been held that the constitutional inhibition does not extend to enactments affecting mere matters of procedure. Public policy, it is said, demands that remedies shall always be under the control of the legislature. This is true where a statute does nothing more than to admit evidence of a particular kind upon an issue of fact arising in the trial of a criminal case which was not admissible when the crime was committed, and which does not create a new issue in the case. In such a case it merely adds to the quantum of evidence to prove the facts existing and subject to proof when the crime was committed. Within these limits the accused is held not to be deprived of a substantial right or immunity such as is contemplated in the prohibitive clause of the Constitution.

It is well settled, however, that the general rule that laws regulating mere matters of procedure are not ex post facto is subject to numerous exceptions. The word "procedure," as a legal term, has a most indefinite meaning. The leading law dictionaries do not attempt to define it. Bishop, in his work on Criminal Procedure, § 2, says: The term "procedure" is so broad in its signification that it is seldom employed in our books as a term of art. It includes in its meaning whatever is embraced by the three technical terms, "pleading," "evidence," and "practice." The same author defines "practice" as meaning "those legal rules which direct the course of proceeding to bring parties into court, and the course of the court after they are brought in." In Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443, Mr. Justice Miller, referring to the above definition of procedure, said: "If this be a just idea of what is intended by the word 'procedure,' as applied to a criminal case, it is obvious that a law which is one of procedure may be obnoxious as an ex post facto law, both by the decision in Calder v. Bull, supra, and in Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 277, 18 L. ed. 356; for in the former case this court held that 'any law which alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law requires at the time of the commission of the offense in order to convict the offender,' is an ex post facto law; and in the latter, one of the reasons why the law was held to be ex post facto was that it changed the rule of evidence under which the party was punished. But it cannot be sustained without destroying the value of the constitutional provision that a law, however it may invade or modify the rights of a party charged with crime, is not an ex post facto law, if it comes within either of these comprehensive branches of the law designated as 'pleading,' 'practice,' and 'evidence.' Can the law with regard to bail, to indictments, to grand juries, to the trial jury, all be changed to the disadvantage of the prisoner by state legislation after the offense was committed, and such legislation not held to be ex post facto because it relates to procedure, as it does, according to Mr. Bishop? And can any substantial right which the law gave the defendant at the time to which his guilt relates be taken away from him by ex post facto legislation, because, in the use of a modern phrase, it is called a law of procedure? We think it cannot."

Even conceding that the changes wrought in the status of the defendant by the repealing statute relate alone to procedure, that is not of itself sufficient to warrant an affirmation of the judgment, if it appears that he has been deprived of a substantial right which amounted to an immunity at the time the offense was committed.

With these general rules and their exceptions before us, what is the situation of this defendant? "Forgery at the common law is the false making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy or the foundation of a legal liability." 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 523. To constitute the crime of forgery, three things must exist: There must be a false making or other alteration of some instrument in writing; there must be a fraudulent intent; and the instrument must be apparently capable of effecting a fraud. Clark, Crim. Law, § 118. Our Code defines the crime as follows: "Whoever, with intent to defraud or injure another, falsely makes or alters any writing of a public or private nature, which might operate to the prejudice of another, or passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish, as true and genuine, any paper so falsely made or altered, knowing the same to be false or forged, with the intent to defraud or prejudice the right of another, shall be imprisoned for not less than one year nor more than ten years." [D. C. Code, § 843, 31 Stat. at L. 1326, chap. 854.] It will be observed that the statute defines two distinct criminal acts, either of which constitutes the crime of forgery. The making of a false instrument with intent to defraud is forgery. The uttering of a forged instrument with intent to defraud is forgery. But where the instrument is both forged and uttered by the same person, as in this case, there is only the single crime of forgery committed. State v. Klugherz, 91 Minn. 406, 98 N. W. 99, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 307.

Intent in forgery will not be presumed from the mere making of a false instrument. It must be gathered from some affirmative act or from the existence of circumstances from which criminal intent may be inferred. No such circumstances were present in this case; hence criminal intent could not be imputed to defendant until he uttered the instrument by incorporating it in the pleadings in the equity cause. The utterance, therefore, was essential to establish the commission of the crime charged. To find the existence of an essential element of the crime,—in fact, to find the crime itself,—the government was compelled to search the record in the equity proceeding. Without it the crime of forgery could not have been established or even charged against the defendant. It is true that defendant committed the crime of forgery before he incorporated the instrument into the equity pleading, and its utterance was only the disclosure of the criminal intent which existed concealed in his mind when he made it. But the record in the equity case does not serve the mere purpose of amplifying the evidence already existing of the commission, of the crime; it furnishes not only the sole evidence of intent, an essential element of the crime itself, but the complete disclosure of the crime. What before the repeal of the act could not be used as the basis of the charge of forgery and proof of its commission, it is sought by the repeal, not only to make the basis of the crime, but the sole proof of its commission.

Under the existing law the utterance of the forged instrument and the disclosure of the complete crime of forgery by means of the pleading in a civil suit did not constitute a crime for which the defendant could be punished, unless it could be established without reference either to the pleadings or evidence of the defendant in the equity case. It is not contended that the crime charged could have been established upon any theory independent of such reference. Had witnesses been produced to prove that the signatures to the contract were all in the handwriting of defendant, they could have testified only to information gained from a reference to the instrument itself as it appeared in the equity pleading. Such reference was expressly forbidden by the statute. Any use of defendant's testimony in the civil proceeding was also forbidden. Witnesses could not have been produced to testify to the substance of defendant's testimony in the equity case, since the immunity granted by the statute extended to both the pleadings and evidence in the civil suit. The immunity granted by the statute is comprehensive. It forbids the use of such evidence or pleadings "in any manner" against the defendant "in any criminal proceeding," except for perjury. If the instrument was a forgery, defendant clearly subjected himself in the equity proceeding to a criminal prosecution for the crime of perjury, the only crime chargeable under the statute.

To sustain this conviction would be equivalent to holding that the repealing statute changed an unpunishable forgery, because of the source of its disclosure, into a punishable forgery. Before the act, defendant, by existing law, was granted absolute immunity from any criminal prosecution growing out of disclosures made by him in the civil proceeding, except for perjury. After the act, it is contended that the immunity no longer exists, and he is liable to answer for another crime, which we must assume but for the immunity would never have been committed. As was said in Calder v. Bull, supra: "The restriction not to pass any ex post facto law was to secure the person of the subject from injury or punishment, in consequence of such law." To sustain the contention of counsel for the government would be to totally disregard the immunity afforded the defendant by the existing law, which this court held in the former case to constitute a substantial right. Frisby v. United States, 35 App. D. C. 513.

Under the inducement of the existing law, defendant placed in the hands of the prosecution something which could not be used against him or made the basis of the present case, but which, by the repealing act, it is insisted, was made competent evidence to establish the crime charged. It must be remembered that this is not an instance of merely increasing the number of witnesses to prove the same case that formerly existed, as in Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 28 L. ed. 262, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 417, or of changing the method of proving an existing fact, as in Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U. S. 380, 43 L. ed. 204, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922. In each of those cases the evidence made competent by statutes enacted after the commission of the crime (murder in each instance) was of so little consequence as proof that former convictions had been secured and the death penalty imposed in both cases without the evidence legislated into existence being used until the second trials. The statute here took the thing upon which the charge of the commission of the crime was predicated, which defendant had placed in the hands of the prosecution before indictment, under the protection and immunity afforded by the existing law, and made it the chief instrument in encompassing his conviction. Can it be said that defendant's situation had not been changed to his disadvantage by the enactment of the repealing act? We think not.

The judgment is reversed, and it is so ordered.

Mr. Chief Justice Shepard, dissenting:

I find myself unable to concur in reversing the judgment in this case.

In my opinion, § 860, Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 661), regulates procedure, and its repeal is not, as to this appellant, an ex post facto law.

Changing a rule of evidence merely, the repealing section did not alter, add to, or diminish the ultimate facts necessary 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to establish the guilt of the appellant. Having no relation to the amount or degree of proof essential to conviction, it did nothing more than remove a restriction upon the competency of certain evidence. The conditions shown bring the case entirely within the principle declared by the Supreme Court in cases the authority of which has not been limited or impaired in any later decision. Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574-589, 28 L. ed. 262-268, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 202, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 417; Thompson v. Missouri, 171 U. S. 380-387, 43 L. ed. 204-207, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 922. As shown in Thompson's Case, the statute declared ex post facto in Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443, took from the defendant a complete defense against the charge of murder in the first degree. It was more than a change of procedure affecting the competency of evidence; it operated to increase the degree of crime. The following language of Mr. Justice Harlan, who delivered the opinion of a unanimous court in Thompson's Case, is, in my judgment, directly applicable to the conditions here presented: "If persons excluded, upon grounds of public policy, at the time of the commission of an offense, from testifying as witnesses for or against the accused, may, in virtue of a statute, become competent to testify, we cannot perceive any ground upon which to hold a statute ex post facto which does nothing more than admit evidence of a particular kind in a criminal case upon an issue of fact which was not admissible under the rules of evidence as enforced by judicial decisions at the time the offense was committed. . . . The statute did nothing more than remove an obstacle arising out of a rule of evidence that withdrew from the consideration of the jury testimony which, in the opinion of the legislature, tended to elucidate the ultimate essential fact to be established; namely, the guilt of the accused."

Section 860, rendering incompetent as evidence in any criminal case against him, the pleadings of a party or any evidence or discovery obtained from him in a judicial proceeding, was the result of the sense of Congress, at the time of its enactment, that it established a rule of evidence in accord with sound public policy. A change of opinion in that regard caused its repeal. The section made no change in, and had no relation to, the substantive criminal law. It merely created a new rule of evidence, applicable in criminal cases, and operating generally, which, for satisfactory reasons, had been repealed prior to the trial of appellant, thereby restoring the rule of the common law.

I cannot concur in the contention that the section was practically an offer of immunity, of the benefit of which the appellant cannot be deprived by its repeal. Immunity statutes are intended to compel the production of evidence that would, without their protection, tend to show that the witness had committed a crime. See 27 Stat. at L. 443, chap. 83, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3173; Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 40 L. ed. 819, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 369, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644. In this case the appellant pleaded the forged instrument in his own interest and under no compulsion. In so doing he was protected by the section while it was in force, but he took the risk, as did Hopt and Thompson in the cases cited, that the rule of evidence might subsequently be changed. It is true that the forged instrument was uttered when set up in his answer in the civil suit, and it may be conceded for the sake of the argument, that it could not be offered in evidence against him in a prosecution for uttering the instrument. But that question is not involved and need not be discussed. Forgery, and uttering a forged writing are separate and distinct offenses by the terms of § 843 of the Code, which, in that respect, follows the common law. It is forgery to falsely make or alter any writing of a public or private nature, with intent to defraud or injure another. The offense is complete when the writing shall have been falsely made or altered with that intent. Uttering the forged writing is not an ingredient of the offense. It is not perceived that proof of utterance is essential to conviction of the offense charged, though it would ordinarily be quite sufficient to establish the intent to defraud. That intent may be shown by other facts and circumstances surrounding the transactions, against the proof of which no objection could be made on any valid ground. The government may, indeed, have difficulty in proving the fraudulent intent if deprived of the right to prove the particular utterance of the forged writing, but it is the same difficulty that would occur in all prosecutions for forgery, where the false writing may never have been uttered at all. If deprived of the right to prove this particular utterance, it ought not to be prevented from using the writing in connection with evidence of other facts and circumstances that might tend to show that it had been falsely made, with intent to defraud or injure.

Convinced that the trial court did not err in admitting the writing in evidence, I must dissent from the conclusion of my brethren.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF EDWARDSVILLE, Appt.,

v.

COUNTY OF MADISON.

(251 Ill. 265, 96 N. E. 238.)

Eminent domain — power of municipality to take county property.

Authority conferred upon a municipality to exercise the power of eminent domain to take private property for the purpose of laying out streets does not by implication include authority to condemn land owned by the county and used for a poor farm.

(October 25, 1911.)

A PPEAL by the city from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County in defendant's favor in a proceeding to condemn land for a public street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles E. Gueltig, for appellant:

The power granted necessarily implies and includes the power to institute condemnation proceedings for the purpose of carrying into effect the donated powers.

Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Cicero, 154 Ill. 658, 39 N. E. 574; Summerfield v. Chicago, 197 Ill. 272, 64 N. E. 490.

The grant of power, being for a public purpose, carries with it the right to condemn under the eminent domain act.

Helm v. Grayville, 224 Ill. 278, 79 N. E. 689; Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 140 Ill. 216, 29 N. E. 704; People ex rel. Escott v.

Note. — Eminent domain: power to take property already devoted to a public use by a political or governmental agency.

It is well established that property previously devoted to a public use may, by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, be taken for a different public use whenever the interests of the public so require. 15 Cyc. 612, 613. This note, however, is confined to the taking of property which has been devoted to a public use by some political or governmental agency, and the cases are limited to those in which public property of this character is sought to be taken.

In the case of streets and highways, the taking is more frequently for a use that does not exclude entirely the previous use, and collateral questions, not in point in this note, arise. The cases, therefore, relating to the taking of streets and highways have been excluded. Likewise, the cases relating to the taking of drains are excluded, as are also those relating to the taking of cemeteries, whether such cemetery is owned by a private corporation or a municipal body. The power of diversion from a particular public use is beyond the scope of the pres-

Hoffman, 97 Ill. 234; Perry County v. Jefferson County, 94 Ill. 214; Castner v. Walrod, 83 Ill. 171, 25 Am. Rep. 389; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Cicero, 154 Ill. 656, 39 N. E. 574; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Morrison, 195 Ill. 277, 63 N. E. 96; English v. Danville, 170 Ill. 133, 48 N. E. 328.

Land held for a public use can be condemned for another public use, when the latter use is more beneficial to the general public, and not destructive of the rights of the public under the first.

The power of eminent domain resides in the state, and can be exercised only by it, or some agency to which the power has been delegated. It may be delegated under general statutes, or the agency may have been authorized to take the particular property by express words or necessary implication.

In the absence of authority conferred expressly or by necessary implication, an agency of the state cannot take land devoted to a public use by a political or governmental agency. Re New York & B. B. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Re Pottsgrove Twp. Road, 5 Pa. Ct. 361, it is held that a public school property cannot be taken for a road when, by a slight curve in the road, the necessity of the taking can be avoided.

And see Moline v. Greene, post, 104.

In Davis v. Nichols, 39 Ill. App. 610, the right to compel a school board to proceed to condemn a part of the public square of the village as a site for a schoolhouse was denied, on the ground that the public square could not thus be appropriated to a use inconsistent with, and destructive of, the original use.

In United States v. Ames, 1 Woodb. & M. 76, Fed. Cas. No. 14,441, an award which allowed land of the United States used for an armory to be overflowed upon payment of damages as provided by a state statute was held invalid. In this case there were several reasons given for holding the award void, and it does not clearly appear that the court regarded the reason that it was a taking of public property as alone sufficient.

But in Re Certain Land, 119 Fed. 453, it is held that land dedicated to a city for use as a public park may be taken by the United States government as a site for a post-office, if the latter use is more important than the former. There is dictum to the effect that it may be taken also if there is express legislative authority to take the particular tract. The Federal government in this case was acting under authority delegated it by the state, and not by virtue of its paramount authority.

In Indiana C. R. Co. v. State, 3 Ind. 421, the right of a railroad company to cross a farm owned by a state institution for educating the deaf and dumb was upheld. The charter of the railroad authorized it to construct the road along a general route named therein, and the farm was on this route, and the court seems to proceed on the theory that there is a necessary implication from the grant to the railroad company to take this particular land.

In Portland & W. Valley R. Co. v. Portland, 14 Or. 188, 58 Am. Rep. 299, 12 Pac. 265, land held by a municipal corporation in trust for the use of the public as a levee or public landing was held subject to be condemned by a railroad company without compensation to the city, under express authority from the legislature, so long as that use was not inconsistent with the purposes of the dedication of such land.

In Rominger v. Simmons, 88 Ind. 453, it is held that lands acquired by a township for school purposes, but not absolutely necessary to the enjoyment of the franchise of such municipal corporation, may be taken for the location of a highway by the county commissioners.

Mr. F. E. Sebastian, with Mr. J. F. Gillham, for appellee:

To authorize the taking by a municipality for a public use, of land already devoted to another public use, the legislative intent to grant the authority must be shown by clear and express language, or by necessary implication from the words of the grant.

In Easthampton v. Hampshire County, 154 Mass. 424, 13 L.R.A. 157, 23 N. E. 298, it is held that the county commissioners may take a strip of land from a schoolhouse lot for a town way without express authority, although the taking will injure the lot considerably for school purposes, but will not prevent its use.

In Southwest Pennsylvania Pipe Lines v. Directors of Poor, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 460, the right of the pipe line company to take property of a county poor farm for the purpose of laying a pipe line through it was upheld. This case was heard on demurrer to the counter petition of the directors of the poor, and the demurrer sustained, but without prejudice to future proceedings in law or equity.

So, in Boston v. Brookline, 156 Mass. 172, 30 N. E. 611, it is held that a strip of land used by a city in which to lay its water pipes may be crossed by a highway of a town, through which it runs, when there is no interference with the first use.

In Roberts v. Seattle, 63 Wash. 573, 116 Pac. 25, a taking of land owned by a university, but not actually used by the university, by a city for the purpose of widening a street, was held valid, in an action to avoid an assessment on the ground that the land could not be thus taken.

In Re St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 34 Minn. 227, 25 N. W. 345, the right of a railway company to take some lots belonging to the state university, but not contiguous to the university ground, was upheld.

In McCullough v. Board of Education, 51 Cal. 418, an action by a contractor against a school board for failure to put him in possession of a part of a public square on which it was agreed he should erect a schoolhouse, it is stated that the board of education had no authority to thus appropriate the public square for schoolhouse purposes, consequently it was held that the contract sued upon was ultra vires, and the plaintiff could derive no rights thereunder.

In State ex rel. Gotzian v. District Ct. 77 Minn. 248, 79 N. W. 971, it is held that the board of public works of a city is authorized, where the city does not object, to condemn for a public street or alley a part of a lot owned by the city and used as a site for an engine house for its fire department, the part condemned not being covered by the building.

Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Sanitary Dist. 218 Ill. 292, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 226, 75 N. E. 892; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 151 Ill. 357, 37 N. E. 842; Mills, Em. Dom. § 46; 2 Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed § 440.

A city has no right to condemn public property, as distinguished from property merely devoted to public use; and the Madison county poor farm is public property.

In State, Pancoast, Prosecutrix, v. Troth, 34 N. J. L. 377, it is held that an engine house owned by a fire company and situated on privately owned land is not such a public building as is contemplated by a statute prohibiting the surveyors of highways from destroying public buildings, and that such a building may be taken.

In California & N. R. Co. v. State, 1 Cal. App. 142, 81 Pac. 971, the nature of the property sought to be taken does not clearly appear, the real question involved being one of statutory construction. It was held that under subdivision 2 of § 1240 (a statute that does not appear in the opinion) of the Code of Civil procedure, private property of the state of California was subject to condemnation for the use of a railroad.

In People v. Sanitary Dist. 210 Ill. 171, 71 N. E. 334, a strip of land owned by the state lying along a river bank was sought to be taken by a city. It does not appear whether or not this land had been devoted to any public use. It is held that property of the state is not thus subject to condemnation under a statute which authorizes the courts of a state to entertain jurisdiction of proceedings after condemnation, when the right to take private property for public use is involved.

In Daniel v. Columbus, 8 Ohio C. C. 642, 4 Ohio C. D. 293, it is held that land owned by a city on a conditional fee for the purpose of a market house may not be taken by the state as a site for an armory and market house without compensation; and an act which authorized such taking was held unconstitutional. The act further provided for the taxing of the cost of such building upon the state and county where located, and this fact was regarded also in arriving at the conclusion that the act was unconstitutional. This case seems to treat the question from the point of diversion, a class of cases that are excluded from this note, and the court expressly states that it does not attempt to answer the argument of counsel that property held for a public use may be appropriated for another consistent use.

For note on the power of the legislature to control use to which property taken for the purpose of a park or square may be put, see 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 938.

For discussion of question as to what use of squares, parks, or common amounts to diversion from the use for which they were dedicated, see note in 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 980.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Edwardsville attempted to condemn for a street a strip of land through the Madison county poor farm, consisting of 19 acres, within the corporate limits of the city. On motion of the county of Madison the court dismissed the petition, and this appeal presents the question of the right of the municipality to condemn for public use the property of a county used for public purposes connected with the administration of the state government.

The right of eminent domain is the power of the state to appropriate private property to the public use, and it extends to every kind of property and to every public use. It is inherent in the state, and may be exercised by a municipality only by virtue of a grant from the state. The power has been granted to cities for the purpose of laying out streets. Such power extends, however, only to the taking of private property. The statute does not authorize the taking of the property of the state, or of the subordinate municipalities through whose agency the state government is administered, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Such property is already devoted to the public use, and is subject to the control of the state, which may authorize such use of it as it sees fit. The legislature may authorize one use to-day and another use to-morrow, and, except where private rights are affected, its discretion is absolute. People ex rel. Bransom v. Walsh, 96 Ill. 232, 36 Am. Rep. 135.

A county is merely a political subdivision of the territory of the state, organized for the convenient exercise, locally, of such powers of the government as may be delegated to it. It has no powers except such as are derived from the statutes constituting tionally enacted, and it can own no private property.

Property, the title to which is vested in the county, is public property, held by the county as a state agency, and in the absence of positive constitutional restriction is subject to the disposition of the legislature without the consent of the county authorities. Harris v. Whiteside County, 105 Ill. 445, 44 Am. Rep. 808; Marion County v. Lear, 108 Ill. 343; Wilson v. Sanitary Dist. 133 Ill. 443, 27 N. E. 203; Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties, 193 Ill. 439, 58 L.R.A. 353, 62 N. E. 201; People ex rel. Wies v. Bowman, 247 Ill. 276, 93 N. E. 244. The property of the state is not subject to condemnation under our law. Our statute (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 47) only authorizes the courts of the state to entertain jurisdiction of proceedings for condemnation when the right to take private property for public use is involved (People v. Sanitary Dist. 210 Ill. 171, 71 N. E. 334); otherwise the city might condemn the courthouse square for an engine house, the school district might condemn the engine house for a schoolhouse, the county might condemn the schoolhouse for a courthouse, and an endless chain of condemnations by various municipalities might be set in operation. Such a series would, in any event, be unlikely to occur; but under the law the occurrence is impossible.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is right, and it will be affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF MOLINE, Appt.,
v.

NELSON H. GREENE et al.

(252 Ill. 475, 96 N. E. 911.)

Municipal corporation — power to widen street — taking public property.

1. Charter authority to widen streets does not empower a municipal corporation to condemn for such purpose property already devoted to public use, such as a public library.

Eminent domain — right to object to taking — taxpayer.

2. A citizen and taxpayer of a city for the benefit of the citizens of which property is held in trust for library purposes may file objections against the taking of a portion of the library property for the purpose of widening a street.

Note. — As to power to take property already devoted to a public use by a political or governmental agency, see note to Edwardsville v. Madison County, ante, 101.

Public improvement — dismissal of petition — partial invalidity of ordinance.

3. A petition to take land to widen a street for a distance of three blocks will be dismissed in toto if the ordinance under which the proceedings are instituted is invalid as to certain public property, the taking of a portion of which is an essential part of the improvement.

Farmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the county court of Rock Island county, dismissing a petition of the city for a local improvement by special assessment. The special assessment was for the purpose of improving Fifth avenue, a street of said city running east and west, by widening it from 60 feet to 70 feet from Fifteenth street to Eighteenth street, and paving it. The widening was proposed to be done by taking a strip 10 feet wide from the property abutting upon the south side of the street. The Moline Public Library is situated at the southeast corner of Fifth avenue and Seventeenth street, and has a frontage of 160 feet on Fifth avenue, and extends south 150 feet to an alley. Ten feet of the library property was proposed to be taken for the widening of the street. Upon the filing of the petition by the city, commissioners were appointed, as provided by § 14 of the local improvement act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 24, § 520). They made a report in accordance with the provisions of § 15. Appellees Nelson H. Greene and A. A. Crampton, who were not the owners of any property proposed to be taken or assessed, and were not members of the library board, but were residents and taxpayers of said city, filed objections. The only objection necessary to be referred to is that the property of the library sought to be taken was public property already devoted to a public use, and could not be condemned or taken for another public use. This objection was sustained, and the petition dismissed. From the judgment sustaining the objection and dismissing the petition, the city has prosecuted this appeal.

Appellant contends (1) that the property of the library was subject to be taken for the purpose of widening the street, which is a different public use from that to which it is now devoted; (2) that Greene and Crampton had no right to file objections to the taking of the property; and (3) that if they were authorized to file objections, and the property could not be taken, it was error to dismiss the petition as to the property other than the library property.

The library was established by an ordinance adopted in 1892 in accordance with the provisions of the statute. The property was purchased for $10,000, and the money to pay for it was raised by subscription. The deed was made to the board of directors of the Moline Public Library of Moline, Illinois, and contained no conditions. A donation of $40,000 was made by Andrew Carnegie for the construction of the building.

Conceding that the legislature has power to authorize public property devoted to one public use to be taken and appropriated to a different use for the public benefit, the question here for decision is: Has the legislature, by any act adopted by it, authorized the taking of the library property by appellant? The library is a public library, and the land sought to be taken from it is devoted to a public use. The general rule is that such property cannot be taken and appropriated to another and different use, unless the legislative intent to so take it has been manifested in express terms or by necessary implication. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pontiac, 169 Ill. 155, 48 N. E. 485; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, 151 Ill. 348, 37 N. E. 842; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1094; 15 Cyc. 616.

It is not contended by appellant that express authority is found in any legislative act to take the property here sought to be taken; but it is insisted such authority is necessarily implied from the 7th clause of § 1 of article 5 of the cities and villages act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, chap. 24, § 62), which confers power upon the municipal authorities "to lay out, to establish, open, alter, widen, extend, grade, pave, or otherwise improve streets, alleys, avenues, sidewalks, wharves, parks, and public grounds, and vacate the same." In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Chicago, supra, the right of the city to extend streets across the right of way of the railroad company was denied by the company. The court held that the clause of the cities and villages act above quoted did not authorize the taking of property already devoted to a public use, but that the 89th clause of § 1 of article 5 did authorize the city to extend its streets across the railroad right of way and tracks. That clause confers power upon the city to extend, by condemnation or otherwise, any street, alley, or highway over or across any railroad track, right of way, or land of any railroad company within the corporate limits. Section 17 of the chapter on railroads (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1900, chap. 114, § 18) confers power upon railroad corporations to take, by condemnation, property necessary to the building, operating, or running of its road; but in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 122 Ill. 473, 13 N. E. 140, it was held that this general grant of power to railroad corporations to take real estate for railroad purposes was not intended to extend to property already applied to a public use. In that case the Chicago, Burling- ton, & Northern Railroad Company sought to condemn for railroad purposes land belonging to the Illinois Central Railroad Company running longitudinally with and constituting a part of that company's right of way. The court held this was unauthorized, and said: "That the legislature of the state might, subject to the conditions imposed by the Constitution, take the property for the purposes in question, we have no doubt. And we think it equally clear that the legislature might, by a general law manifesting such intention, authorize one railroad company to condemn a part of the right of way of another to the extent and for the uses proposed in this case; but without such legislative authority or enabling act it is manifest the taking of it would be unauthorized."

Appellant cites numerous cases where the right of one railroad corporation to cross the right of way and tracks of another railroad corporation, and to condemn the property for such crossing, has been sustained. But those decisions have been based upon the express authority conferred upon railroad corporations by clause 6 of § 19 of chapter 114 of the Revised Statutes. Power is also given cities by the local improvement act to take private property for the purpose of local improvements, but no authority is given, as we construe the act, to take property already devoted to a public use and apply it to a different use. The grant of power to take property by the local improvement act is general, and the same rule of construction is applicable to it that applies to the general grant of power to railroad corporations under the railroad act.

Cases are cited by appellant from other jurisdictions, where a general grant of power to take property has been construed to authorize an appropriation of property devoted to a public use to another use, when it does not essentially interfere with the public use to which the property is already devoted. But those cases, we think, can have no application to this case, for the reason that it is proposed to take the land from the library and devote it to a use that will prohibit the library hereafter from any use of or control over it.

Appellant argues that taking 10 feet of land will not destroy the library; that it will still have sufficient ground for carrying out the purposes for which it was established. The case must be controlled by legal principles, and not by considering the practical effect of allowing the taking of the land in this particular case. If it is held appellant has authority to take part of the property, it would necessarily require holding that all of the property could be taken by virtue of the same authority, if that were sought to be done. Our conclusion upon this branch of the case is that no authority exists in appellant to take the property of the library for the purpose of devoting it to a public street.

Appellant contends no one could be heard to object, except owners of or parties having some interest in the land sought to be taken; that the title to the property of the Moline Public Library is in the board of directors; and that they alone are authorized to object to the taking of its land. On this ground it is urged that the county court erred in overruling the appellant's motion to strike the objections from the files, and that the judgment should be reversed for that reason, even though it be held that the appellant had no authority to condemn the land. Section 20 of the local improvement act requires that every person named in the commissioners' report as an owner of property to be taken or damaged, and every person who shall be named in the report as an occupant of any such parcel of land, shall be made defendant to the proceeding; also "all other persons having or claiming interests in any of said premises shall be described and designated as 'all whom it may concern,' and by that description shall be made defendants." The act further provides for notice to defendants and an opportunity for them to be heard. The object of the legislature clearly was to provide for notice to every owner and party interested in the land to be taken of the proceeding, and to afford them an opportunity to be heard. The legal title to the library property is in the library board, but it is held by them in trust for the inhabitants of the city; the use of the library and property to be forever free to said inhabitants. The inhabitants of the city are the real parties in interest, for whose benefit the title is held in trust by the board of directors. It has been repeatedly held that any taxpayer of a city may enjoin the incurring of illegal indebtedness or the misapplication of public money. McCord v. Pike, 121 Ill. 288, 2 Am. St. Rep. 85, 12 N. E. 259; Wright v. Bishop, 88 Ill. 302; Chestnutwood v. Hood, 68 Ill. 132; Jackson v. Norris, 72 Ill. 364; Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626. If the appellant has no right to condemn the property of the library for the purpose for which it is here sought to be condemned, and if appellees, as taxpayers and two of the cestuis que trustent for whose benefit the property is held, would have the right, by injunction, to prevent the illegal appropriation of the property, it would seem illogical to hold that they have no such interest as would entitle them to be heard in the proceeding to take the property, but would be entitled to a hearing in another and different forum upon the same question and for the same purpose. In other words, if appellees might have enjoined the taking of the land by application to a court of equity, we see no valid reason for holding that to be their only remedy, when the same result might be accomplished by objections in the county court. As inhabitants and taxpayers of the city, for whose use and benefit the library was established and the title to it held in trust, they were interested and concerned in the preservation of the property for the purposes to which it was devoted. In our opinion, the court did not err in entertaining the objections and overruling appellant's motion to strike them.

It is also urged that the court erred in dismissing the petition. The appellant contends that, even if the ordinance was void and the proceeding unauthorized, in so far as the taking of the library property was concerned, that did not justify dismissing the petition as to the whole improvement, but it should have been dismissed only as to the library property. The principle sought to be applied by appellant is that, if a provision of an ordinance relating to one subject be void and as to another it be valid, unless the two are necessarily and inseparably connected, the valid provision of the ordinance may be enforced, and the invalid provision disregarded. We do not think that principle applicable to this case. The taking of the library property was an essential part of the contemplated improvement by widening the street for a distance of three blocks. Whether the city might, by an ordinance and proceedings thereunder, have widened the street from Fifteenth street to Eighteenth street, except where the street abutted upon the library property, if the ordinance has so provided, is not the question to be decided. The ordinance was for improving the street by widening it from Fifteenth street to Eighteenth street. This required taking a strip of land belonging to the library abutting upon the street a distance of 160 feet. If this could not be taken, then the contemplated improvement by widening the street from Fifteenth street to Eighteenth street must fail. This conclusion is not based upon the ground that it would not be a public benefit to widen the street a part of the distance and leave it its present width a part of the distance,—for that is probably not a judicial question,—but it is based upon the ground that widening the street where it abuts upon the library property is an essential and material part of the improvement, and 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) its omission necessarily destroys the proposed improvement. Chicago v. Hill, 251 Ill. 502, 96 N. E. 223.

The judgment of the County Court is affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

J. B. CRAMER

JAMES R. McCANN et al., Appts.

(83 Kan. 719, 112 Pac. 832.)

Descent and distribution — inheritance of cousins.

1. Cousins do not inherit immediately from each other, but only mediately through the parents of each, and children cannot inherit immediately from a cousin of their parent.

Same — inheritance through aliens.

2. Under the provisions of the alien land act (Laws of 1891, chap. 3), resident citizens of the United States could not inherit lands in this state through the operation of the statute of descents and distributions, when they must trace their descent through a cousin of their parent, who was an alien at the time of his death.

Appeal — suit to quiet title — claim of defendant.

3. In an appeal from a judgment quieting title to lands, where there was sufficient evidence to sustain a judgment in favor of the plaintiff finding that when the action was brought he was in the peaceable, quiet possession of the real estate, claiming title, the first inquiry must necessarily be as to what title the defendant has; for, if he have no title, he cannot question that of the plaintiff.

Same — sufficiency of evidence.

4. The evidence in this case examined, and held to be sufficient to warrant a finding that when the action was brought, the plaintiff was in the peaceable, quiet possession of the real estate, claiming title, and, it appearing that the defendants never acquired any title themselves, the judgment is affirmed.

Note. — Descent and distribution: tracing descent through alien.

At common law no descent could be traced through an alien ancestor (1 Laws of England [Halsbury] 307, citing Co. Litt. 8a; Rittson v. Stordy, 2 Jur. N. S. 410, 4 Week. Rep. 438); although the rule has been partially abrogated in England since 1700 by statute (11 & 12 Wm. III. chap. 6, as explained by 25 Geo. II. chap. 39) by grace of which all natural-born subjects may inherit as heirs, and may trace their descent

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Barber County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Eldon M. Votaw and Harris F. Williams, with Mr. Samuel Griffin, for appellants.

Messrs. A. L. Noble and J. N. Tincher for appellee.

Messrs. A. A. Godard and H. E. Valentine, amici curiæ.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee brought this action to quiet his title to certain real estate in the city of Kiowa, of which he was in possession and to which he claimed title by a conveyance from the heirs at law and next of kin of Kate Craven, who died intestate April 30, 1900, while seised of the title. At the time of her death, Mrs. Craven was a widow and left no parent or children or descendants of children living. Her next of kin were brothers and sisters and descendants of brothers and sisters, all of whom were nonresident aliens living in Ireland. The common ancestor of Mrs. Craven and the appellants was her grandfather and their great-grandfather, who lived and died a nonresident alien, as did also his two sons, the father of Mrs. Craven and the grandfather of the appellants, respectively. Richard St. Lawrence, father of three of the appellants, was a cousin of Mrs. Craven. He was born in Ireland and came to from any of their ancestors, lineal or collateral, although such ancestors were born out of the allegiance of the Crown (Ibid.).

This rule, as is shown by a note to Easton v. Huott, 31 L.R.A. 177, on "Alien's right to inherit," has been generally adopted in the United States, except in Connecticut. See Campbell's Appeal, 64 Conn. 277, 24 L.R.A. 667, 29 Atl. 494. See also to the same effect, 2 Cyc. 95, note 49.

The common-law rule that one citizen cannot inherit from another where kinship must be traced through a nonresident alien cannot be rejected as repugnant or inapplicable to our institutions or the condition of things in this country, under a statutory adoption of the general principles of the common law so far as applicable. Beavan v. Went, 155 Ill. 592, 31 L.R.A. 85, 41 N. E. 91.

In many states the common-law rule that descent cannot be traced through an alien ancestor is varied by enabling acts of various sorts. The earlier cases as to the construction and effect of such statutes may be found in a note to De Wolf v. Middleton, 31 L.R.A. 146.

But this rule does not so operate as to prevent inheritance between brothers, or between a brother and sister, it having been settled in the leading case of Collingwood v. Pace, 1 Vent. 413, 1 Lev. 59, 1 Keble, 671, that the descent in such case being immediate, the alienage of the father does not impede the descent between children. The father is medium differens sanguinis, but not medium differens hereditatis. See to this effect Luhrs v. Eimer, 80 N. Y. 179; Smith v. Mulligan, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 438; Bradley v. Dwight, 62 How. Pr. 300; Banks v. Walker, 3 Barb. Ch. 446; Jackson ex dem. Doran v. Green, 7 Wend. 333; McGregor v. Comstock, 3 N. Y. 409; Renner v. Müller, 57 How. Pr. 229; Campbell v. Campbell, 58 N. C. (5 Jones, Eq.) 246.

The rule which enables brothers, sons of an alien father, to inherit of each other for the reason that the descent between them is immediate, applies between one of the brothers and the representatives of the other, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) and also between the representatives of both. Renner v. Müller, 12 Jones & S. 535.

But it is otherwise in the case of a descent from cousin to cousin. Jackson ex dem. Doran v. Green, 7 Wend. 333. And see also Meier v. Lee and Smith v. Lynch, infra.

This rule was held in Renner v. Müller, 12 Jones & S. 535, not to be changed by the New York statute of 1786, which changed the order of descent so as to allow brothers and sisters to take where there is no father living, or, if living, he is incapable of taking by reason of alienage, not, however, through the father, but immediate from the decedent as at common law.

Where property passes from brother to brother under a statute of descents providing for inheritance by parents, and that, if both parents be dead, the portion which would have fallen to their share shall be disposed of in the same manner as if they had outlived the intestate and died in the possession and ownership of the property, the inheritance is direct, and does not depend on the fact of the parents at the time of their decease being capacitated to take. Wilcke v. Wilcke, 102 Iowa, 173, 71 N. W. 201.

But a statute providing that in certain contingencies the estate of an illegitimate person shall descend to and vest in the next of kin to the mother of such person does not render the descent immediate, so as to preclude the application of the rule that one cannot take by inheritance where compelled to trace kinship through alien ancestors. Meadowcroft v. Winnebago County, 181 Ill. 504, 54 N. E. 949.

Nor does a statutory provision that an estate shall descend in equal parts to next of kin make the descent to collateral kindred immediate, so as to avoid the effect of alienage of ancestors through whom kinship is traced. Beavan v. Went, 155 Ill. 592, 31 L.R.A. 85, 41 N. E. 91.

A statute providing that under certain contingencies parents shall inherit, and that if they are both dead the portion which would have fallen to their share shall be the United States in 1862, and at the time of his death, which preceded that of Mrs. Craven, he was a resident and citizen of this country. He had four children, Patrick R. St. Lawrence, Mary A. Doherty, James J. St. Lawrence, and Richard T. St. Lawrence. These children are all living and reside in Chicago, Illinois. They were all citizens of the United States at the time of the death of Mrs. Craven. One of them, Richard T. St. Lawrence, has conveyed any interest he had in the real estate in controversy to James R. McCann, who is the other appellant. In June, 1900, after Mrs. Craven's death, James J. St. Lawrence, one of the appellants, who is a lawyer residing in Chicago, procured from the next of kin in Ireland, who are the same persons through whom the appellee claims, a power of attorney as "next of kin and heir at law of Kate Craven, deceased," which gave him full power and authority to represent them as their attorney in fact as to the real and personal property of the deceased. On October 16, 1900, Mr. St. Lawrence went to Kiowa and took possession of the real estate in controversy, which consists of a hotel and a number of lots appurtenant thereto. He had the property insured in his name as "attorney for the heirs of Kate Craven, deceased." His power of attorney was filed for record in Barber county, August 4, 1902. On his first visit to Kiowa he was there several weeks. Before leaving for his home, he found a tenant for the hotel and arranged with an agent in Kiowa to collect the rents. This agent collected the rents and remitted the same to him until some time in June, 1906, when he declined to have anything more to do with procuring tenants or looking after the property, but agreed to continue to remit to Mr. St. Lawrence the rents which were afterwards collected by J. B. Cramer & Company, real estate agents. This firm, of which appellee was a member, acted as the agents of Mr. St. Lawrence in procuring tenants. They collected rents, charged a commission, and paid the balance to the former agent at Kiowa, who remitted to Mr. St. Lawrence. This arrangement continued until July 1, 1907. In April, 1907, the alien next of kin living in Ireland executed a new power of attorney to John W. Ellis, of Chicago, Illinois, in which they revoked the former power of attorney executed to James J. St. Lawrence, and authorized John W. Ellis to represent them in all matters connected with the estate of Kate Craven, deceased, and to sell and convey by warranty deed all their right, title, and interest in the real estate. On April 22, 1907, John W. Ellis, acting under his power of attorney, notified the local agent disposed of in the same manner as if they had outlived the intestate and died in possession and ownership of the property, does not render the descent between cousins immediate; so that where their common ancestor, if alive, would be incapacitated by alienage from taking, one cousin cannot inherit from another. Meier v. Lee, 106 Iowa, 303, 76 N. W. 712; Smith v. Lynch, 61 Kan. 609, 60 Pac. 329.

Because of the prohibition of the statute providing that a nonresident alien shall not be capable of acquiring title, or taking or holding any lands or real estate by descent, devise, purchase, or otherwise, the lands of a deceased citizen dying intestate cannot be acquired under the statute of descents, by a collateral kinsman, although a resident citizen, when the ancestor through whom the claim of inheritance is made was at the time of his death a nonresident alien. Smith v. Lynch, supra.

Under a statute providing that a person capable of inheriting otherwise shall not be precluded from such inheritance by reason of alienism of an ancestor, second cousins who are citizens can inherit, irrespective of the alienage of the common ancestor. Douglass v. Douglass, 70 Misc. 412, 128 N. Y. Supp. 912.

A statute providing that no person shall be deprived of his right to take title to real estate as heir at law by descent from any deceased person because he may be compelled to trace his relationship to such deceased person through one or more aliens is inapplicable to a case in which the property has escheated prior to its taking effect. Meadowcroft v. Winnebago County, 181 Ill. 504, 54 N. E. 949.

It is immaterial whether the death of the alien ancestor through whom descent is traced takes place before or after the passage of a statute incapacitating nonresident aliens from acquiring title to lands by descent, devise, or purchase, the rights of the inheritors not being fixed as of the date of the death of the one through whom they immediately claim, but as of the date of the death of the intestate whose property they claim. Smith v. Lynch, 61 Kan. 609, 60 Pac. 329.

But the alienage of a son, which would prevent his inheritance, at the time of the death of testator, who made an executory devise to his heirs at law according to the statute of descents, will not exclude a descendant of the son from this class, where a statute passed before the time of determining the heirs has removed the disability of alienage. De Wolf v. Middleton, 18 R. I. 814, 31 L.R.A. 146, 26 Atl. 44, 31 Atl. 271.

As to the effect of state Constitutions and statutes upon the question of inheritance by or from an alien, see note to Beavan v. Went, 31 L.R.A. 85.

at Kiowa, who had been remitting rents to James J. St. Lawrence, that he represented the next of kin and heirs of Kate Craven, and procured from the agent a statement in writing recognizing him as the lawful agent of the heirs. On May 7, 1907, John W. Ellis, as attorney in fact for the Irish heirs, sold and conveyed the real estate in question to Harry A. Lewis, of Cook county Illinois, and on July 1, 1907, Lewis conveyed the same by warranty deed to J. B. Cramer. From that date Cramer retained the rents. The same tenant continued to occupy the hotel. Afterwards, on September 5, 1907, Cramer brought this action to quiet his title. The appellants filed their answer and cross petition, each claiming to own an undivided one-fourth interest in the property in controversy. It was alleged that the appellants were all resident citizens of Chicago, Illinois, at the time of the death of Kate Craven, and that the persons through whom the appellee claims were not her true and lawful heirs. The answer and cross petition further expressly denied that J. B. Cramer was in the possession of the real estate when the action was commenced, and alleged that whatever possession he held was obtained by fraud and collusion and without their knowledge, and that in truth and fact his possession was theirs, inasmuch as he had secured the same while acting as their agent for the purpose of collecting the rents. They asked for affirmative relief, quieting their title as against him. Issues were joined and the cause tried to the court. The court found for the plaintiff, and rendered judgment quieting and confirming his title to the real estate as against the appellants. This is the judgment which is sought to be reversed.

The controversy is between the appellee, who is the grantee of the Irish heirs of Kate Craven, who were her brothers and sisters and children of deceased brothers and sisters, all of whom were aliens at the time of Kate Craven's death, and the Chicago heirs, whose father was Kate Craven's cousin, and who were citizens and residents of the United States at the time of her death. The family tree showing the next of kin of Kate Craven, both citizens and aliens, appears in the accompanying diagram, [see next page] the names of citizens being in bold-faced type:

As the Constitution was originally adopted in 1859, § 99 thereof, which is § 17 of the Bill of Rights, read as follows: "No distinction shall ever be made between citizens and aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property." In 1888 the Constitution was amended and this section made to read: "No distinction shall ever be made between citizens of the state of Kansas and the citizens of other states and territories of the United States in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property. The rights of aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property may be regulated by law." Pursuant to this amendment, the legislature of 1891 adopted what is known as the alien land act, which is chapter 3 of the Laws of 1891. Kate Craven died on April 30, 1900. At that time the alien land law was in full force and effect, although it was afterwards repealed. Chapter 1, Laws 1901. The act itself is entitled "An Act in Regard to Aliens, and to Restrict their Rights to Acquire and Hold Real Estate, and to Provide for the Disposition of the Lands now Owned by Nonresident Aliens." It has frequently been before the court and was construed in the following cases: Wuester v. Folin, 60 Kan. 334, 56 Pac. 490; Smith v. Lynch, 61 Kan. 609, 60 Pac. 329; Omnium Invest. Co. v. North American Trust Co. 65 Kan. 50, 68 Pac. 1089; Madden v. State, 68 Kan. 658, 75 Pac. 1023; State v. Ellis, 72 Kan. 285, 83 Pac. 1045.

It is one of the contentions of the appellants that, under the alien land act as construed by these decisions, the appellee acquired no title whatever to the land in controversy by virtue of the conveyance from the Irish heirs, who were all nonresident aliens at the time of her death. This was an action to quiet title, and the judgment in favor of the appellee is in effect a finding that, when the action was brought, he was in possession of the property, claiming title. As there was evidence sufficient to sustain this judgment, the first inquiry must necessarily be with respect to the title of the appellants themselves; for, if they have no title, they cannot question that of the appellee. Being in the peaceable possession of real estate, claiming the title thereof, he has such an interest therein, although his title be ever so defective, that he may maintain this action to quiet his title and possession as against the appellants, who have no title at all. Giltinan v. Lemert, 13 Kan. 476; Brenner v. Bigelow, 8 Kan. 496; Waller v. Julius, 68 Kan. 314, 74 Pac. 157. The appellants are children of a cousin of Kate Craven, and, in order to inherit as next of kin, they must trace their descent through their father up to their grandfather, who was always a nonresident alien. That they cannot do this is settled by the doctrine in Smith v. Lynch, supra. They do not take as brothers and sisters of Kate Craven immediately, and therefore they acquired no title to the real estate because they must claim through their grandfather, who, by reason of his alienship, could not inherit by descent. The precise question here, whether a cousin can inherit immediately from a cousin, or whether children can inherit immediately from the cousin of their parent, was not decided in Smith v. Lynch, supra, but the principle involved in both cases is the same. That was a case where nephews and nieces sought to inherit immediately from an uncle without tracing the descent through their deceased alien father. It was said in the opinion: "The effect of the alien land law is not only to exclude living aliens from acquiring title to lands in this state by descent, but is also to prevent the transmission of title through them under the operation of the act concerning descents and distributions before quoted. The disqualification is not alone of the living, but it is, as it were, of the dead as well." It was held that the effect of the alien land law was to exclude the nephews and nieces from inheriting. One of the cases relied upon in Smith v. Lynch, supra, is Meier v. Lee, 106 Iowa, 303, 76 N. W. 712, holding that a cousin does not inherit immediately from a cousin, but only mediately through the parents of each. Other authorities in point are Jackson ex dem. Doran v. Green, 7 Wend. 333; Levy v. McCartee, 6 Pet. 102, 8 L. ed. 334; M'Gregor v. Comstock, 3 N. Y. 408; Willeke v. Willeke, 102 Iowa, 173, 71 N. W. 201. See also State v. Ellis, 72 Kan. 285, 83 Pac. 1045.

ST. LAWRENCE FAMILY TREE

NOTE: Those now living on this side of the house gave power of atty. to John W. Ellis, who conveyed this partner, Harry A. Lewis, who in turn conveyed to plaintiff and appellee, J. R. Cramer.

There is considerable discussion in the briefs as to whether the evidence shows that Kate Craven was an alien or a citizen at the time of her death. In our view of the case, this question is not material. The grantors of the appellee had a claim of title based on the contention that their intestate died an alien. Since none of the appellants acquired any interest in the property, they are not in a position to contest this claim, and, as said in Omnium Invest. Co. v. North American Trust Co. 65 Kan. 50, 68 Pac. 1089: "The state is competent to care for itself and protect its own interests." The state not being a party to this action, the ultimate rights of the appellee as against the state are not involved, and it becomes unnecessary to consider or determine whether or not the grantors of the appellee acquired any interest in the property. Nor is it necessary to consider a question raised by the appellee as to the constitutionality of the alien land law.

But one question remains, and it is in respect to the character of the appellee's possession. The judgment is a finding that he had peaceable, quiet possession. It is not disputed that the real estate firm of which the appellee was a member were the agents of James J. St. Lawrence and represented him in renting the hotel property and collecting the rents. At the time St. Lawrence took possession of the real estate, he held a power of attorney from the Irish heirs, authorizing him to represent their interests in the property. He took possession of the real estate under it, had the property insured in his name as agent for the heirs at law of Kate Craven, deceased, and placed his power of attorney on record. He testified at the trial that about the time the power of attorney was being executed, he learned through some correspondence with Mr. Noble, who is now one of the attorneys for the appellee, that there was some question as to whether the Irish heirs could inherit the land on account of being aliens. He testified that from that time on it was a problem in his mind as to whether he represented the Irish heirs by virtue of his power of attorney, or whether he represented himself and his brothers and sister; but that at the time he first learned of this action having been brought, he believed he represented the interests of his brothers and sister, not, however, as their attorney or agent, but simply as the adviser of the family. He testified further as follows: "I was always adviser of the family and looked after the matter in a general way, and in a manner I had possession of the real estate for them. . . . I held in common for them as well as for myself. I never accounted for one cent to my brothers and sister, and never settled with them for any rents that I received, because my expenses had to come out of the estate." Again, he testified: "I really do not know whether I was attorney for the heirs in Great Britain, or attorney for the heirs in Chicago. That was the predicament I was in, and consequently I cannot answer the question intelligently. The point is that I did not know who the heirs were." There can be no question under the evidence that he was acting as the attorney for the foreign heirs and no one else. He had a duly executed power of attorney from all of them authorizing him to represent them. He had no authority to represent his brothers and sister. Besides, neither he nor his brothers and sister ever had or could acquire by the laws of descent any interest in the property. The next of kin competent to take by the laws of descent were the Irish heirs, unless they were prohibited from taking by virtue of the alien land law. We think the evidence warranted a finding that he took possession of the property as the attorney in fact of the Irish heirs. When they revoked his power of attorney and authorized another person to act for them, his authority ceased. So far as J. B. Cramer & Company, or the appellee, acted for him, they acted as the agents of his principals. The revocation of the power of attorney under which he had acted restored to the Irish heirs whatever rights in the property they possessed, including the right to the possession as against him and any agents he had appointed.

The appellants can only prevail upon their cross petition upon the strength of their own title, and not upon the weakness of their adversary's.

Never having acquired any title to the real estate themselves, they were not entitled to affirmative relief, and, the appellee having been in the peaceable possession of the property under a claim of title when the action was brought, the judgment, so far as any rights of the appellants are concerned, is affirmed.

Habeas corpus — to review errors.

1. Irregularities occurring at the trial, and errors of the trial court in its procedure in a criminal action, are not reviewable on habeas corpus.

Same — tender of fine — sufficiency.

2. The petition of the relators alleges as one ground for their release, that they tendered the sheriff who held them in custody under a commitment from the police court of the city of Bismarck, the sum of $50 in payment of the fine imposed by such court. The sheriff's return, containing commitment and judgment, discloses that the fine was $50 each, and that no tender was made other than $50 to release both defendant petitioners. Held, that the return of the sheriff was a complete answer to the petition on that point.

Religious liberty — Sunday labor.

3. Section 4 of the Constitution of this state provides that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall be forever guaranteed in this state, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness or juror on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace and safety of this state." Held that, in general, laws prohibiting the doing of certain acts and the performance of certain kinds of labor upon the first day of the week, commonly called "Sunday," are not in violation of this provision, as they in no way work an establishment of a religion, provide for compulsory support, by taxation or otherwise, of religious institutions, make attendance upon religious worship compulsory, work a restriction upon the exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, or impose restrictions upon the expressions of religious belief.

Statute — prohibition of Sunday shows — validity.

4. Chapter 285, Laws 12th Leg. Assem., making it unlawful to keep open, or run, or permit to be run, any theater, show, moving picture show, or theatrical performance, upon the first day of the week, commonly called the Sabbath, and prescribing penalties for violation thereof, is not special legislation, as, if the legislative interpretation of the former law was correct, and it did not include theatrical performances in its provisions, chapter 285, supra, is in the nature of an addition to former prohibitions of the statute, making it more general and more universal in its application than it was previous to the enactment of said chapter; and in any event, if said chapter stood alone, it would constitute a valid enactment.

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioners from the custody of the sheriff of Burleigh county to which they had been committed for running a moving picture show and theatrical performance on Sunday in violation of law. Writ quashed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Niles & Koffel for relators.

Mr. W. L. Smith opposed.

Spalding, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Chapter 285 of the Laws of the Twelfth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, introduced as House Bill No. 328, omitting title, reads as follows:

"Sec. 1. Theaters Open on Sunday Unlawful.—It shall be unlawful to keep open, or to run or permit the running of, any theater, show, moving picture show, or theatrical performance, upon the first day of the week, commonly called the Sabbath.

"Sec. 2. Penalty.—Any person, firm or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 or more than $50.

"Sec. 3. Emergency.—Whereas, there is no express provision of law prohibiting the keeping open, or running, or permitting the running, of any theater, show, moving picture show or theatrical performance, upon the first day of the week, commonly called the Sabbath, an emergency exists, and this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval."

It took effect March 3, 1911. On the 22d day of April, 1911, the relators were convicted in the police court of the city of Bismarck of violating the above law, and on the verdict rendered the police magistrate entered judgment against them imposing a fine of $50 each, and adjudging that, on failure to pay such fine, they each be imprisoned in the Burleigh county jail for a period of twenty-five days or until the fine be paid. Bail was fixed on appeal in the sum of $250. The specific charge was that of running a moving picture show and theatrical performance upon Sunday, the 16th day of April, 1911, in said city of Bismarck. They refused to pay the fine imposed, and were duly committed to the county jail in accordance with the judgment. They subsequently applied to the judge of the sixth judicial district for a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied. The writ was issued by this court, and the sheriff directed to have the bodies of the said relators before this court on a date specified, "to do and receive what shall then and there be concerning the said C. W. Temple and Clara Wright." Upon the day specified the sheriff made return to the effect that he detained the petitioners in jail as sheriff and by virtue of a certain commitment issued to him out of the office of the police magistrate of the city, which commitment was set forth in his return and included a copy of the judgment. He also averred that neither of said petitioners had paid or offered to pay the fine of $50 so assessed against each of them, and that the period of twenty-five days, as commanded in the judgment and commitment, had not expired.

1. On the hearing a great number of reasons were assigned by the petitioners why they should be discharged from the custody of the sheriff. Most of such reasons relate solely to alleged irregularities occurring on the trial, or to errors of the trial court in its procedure, and are not reviewable on habeas corpus. State ex rel. Mears v. Barnes, 5 N. D. 350, 65 N. W. 688; State ex rel. Peterson v. Barnes, 3 N. D. 131, 54 N. W. 541.

2. It is alleged as a ground for the discharge of the petitioners that they tendered to the respondent sheriff the sum of $50 in release of the restraint imposed, and that the same was refused. This allegation is supported by the affidavit of counsel, which is to the effect that on behalf of the relators he tendered the sum of $50 to the sheriff in satisfaction of the fine and in payment of the release of the petitioners named, and in accordance with the commitment under which said sheriff holds said petitioners, and that said tender was refused on the ground that it was insufficient. A sufficient answer to this objection is that the commitment as set out in the petition of the relators does not conform to the commitment under which the sheriff returns he was restraining them; that such commitment, in fact, recited that each of the relators was sentenced to pay a fine of $50. No claim is presented that any tender was made except of the sum of $50 for the release of both defendants, and this was insufficient to satisfy the judgment.

3. It is urged that the law in question conflicts with the state Constitution, article 1, § 4, of which provides: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall be forever guaranteed in this state, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness or juror on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state." Whatever the effect of the provisions of the Penal Code with reference to abstaining from labor on the Sabbath or first day of the week may be, we have little doubt that they, as well as all such statutes, were enacted with the purpose of protecting that part of the public which consists of a large majority, in the exercise of their varying and different methods of religious worship, and in recognition of the sacredness of the Christian Sabbath. A number of the courts of the different states have passed upon this question, and have held that this is a Christian nation, and that laws enacted to prevent the desecration of the Sabbath are valid for that reason, notwithstanding constitutional provisions similar to § 4, supra, and others peculiar to different states. The courts of practically all other states have sustained such statutes as a legitimate exercise of the police power intended to promote the welfare, morals, and sanitary condition of the people. Many of these courts appear to have avoided determining its relation to the question of religion. We do not deem it necessary to pass upon that question; but, in view of this being the first time the law has been questioned in this court, a brief reference to the history of legislation on the subject may not be inappropriate, and a similar reference to a few of the decisions of other jurisdictions will throw some light upon the general subject.

The early Christians substituted the first day of the week, or Sunday, for the Jewish Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, and it has since been observed as a day of rest and worship in Christian lands, and, we think, generally by civilized peoples. Legislation on the subject was first had in Rome, about A. D. 321, when Constantine the Great commanded all judges and inhabitants of cities to rest on the venerable day of the Sun. Under Theodosius II. 425, games and theatrical exhibitions were prohibited, and about a century later all labor was prohibited on that day. In England laws of this kind were in force in the reign of Athelstan, 925 to 940 A. D. The statute of 29 Chas. II., passed in 1678, seems to have laid the foundation for laws on the subject in England and in many states of this country. It provided that no craftsman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever should do or exercise any worldly labor, business, or work of their ordinary callings upon the Lord's Day or any part thereof (works of necessity and charity excepted), and placed prohibitions upon public sales on the Lord's Day. Fairs were prohibited in the reign of Henry VI., and amusements in the first year of Charles I. On the immigration from England to America, the act of 1678 was taken as a model in most of the colonies, its terms, however, being varied somewhat; but a Sunday law was enacted in each of the colonies, and such a law is found in the statutes of every state in the Union. It has been attacked in nearly every state, and almost as often sustained. Where not sustained, courts have based their decisions on some peculiar or special feature not applicable here. Without quoting at great length from authorities explaining and sustaining such statutes, in some degree or wholly, from a religious standpoint, we mention Charleston v. Benjamin, 2 Strobb. L. 508, 49 Am. Dec. 608; Lindenmuller v. People, 33 Barb. 548; Shover v. State, 10 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ark. 259; State v. Amba, 20 Mo. 215; 2 Bl. Com. 63. Mr. Freeman, in his note, 49 Am. Dec. 617, says: "In the earliest contested cases, the constitutionality of acts for the observance of the Lord's Day was defended on the ground of the assumed right of a free Christian people, looking to the conservation of the public order, peace, and morality, and the promotion, within well-guarded limits, of the religious ideas immemorially pervading their history and indelibly stamped upon the character of their laws and institutions, to set apart the Lord's Day as a recurring period of ceremonial rest and voluntary worship. That ground seems to have been abandoned in later times, to a great extent, but it has never yet been conclusively settled that it was not well taken." Judge Story asserts that the Christian religion is the religion of liberty, and may well be regarded as the true basis of our popular form of government, and that, at the adoption of the Constitution, and the Amendment to it which provides that Congress shall pass no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, it was probably the universal sentiment in America that Christianity should receive the support of the state, so far as was consistent with the general freedom of conscience and religious worship. The real object of the Amendment respecting religion was to prevent the establishment of a hierarchy which would control the exclusive patronage of the government; and it may well be conceived that a proper recognition of the prevailing faith, supported by no compulsory acceptance of its doctrines or attendance upon its rites, would still be within constitutional limits, as the Amendment to the Federal Constitution embodies the idea embraced in the Constitutions of the states. Story, Const. §§ 1873, 1874, 1877.

In New York and some other states it has been held that Christianity is a part of the common law of the state and entitled to recognition and protection by the temporal courts. People v. Ruggless, 8 Johns. 291, 5 Am. Dec. 335; Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. 198, 11 L. ed. 234; Shover v. State, 10 Ark. 259; Sedgwick's Statutory Constitutional L. 14. Judge Cooley was of the opinion that, while the religious freedom of the people is protected and defended by the American Constitution, there is no prohibition against the solemn recognition by the authorities of a superintending Providence in public transactions and exercises; and no principle of constitutional law is violated when thanksgiving days or fast days are appointed, when chaplains are designated for the army and navy, and legislative sessions are opened with prayer, or by the general exemption of houses of religious worship from taxation. In State v. Ambs, 20 Mo. 215, the court said: We must regard the character and condition of the people for whom our organic law was made. It appears to have been made by Christian men, and shows on its face that the Christian religion was the religion of its framers. The convention that adopted it sat under a Sunday law, adjourning in obedience to it, and in the conclusion of the instrument it is solemnly affirmed by its authors that their signatures were attached thereto A. D. 1820, a form adopted by all Christian nations in solemn public acts. And Lindenmuller v. People, supra, was a case sustaining a conviction for a violation of a city ordinance prohibiting theatrical performances on Sunday, and holding it valid on the ground that Christianity was the basis of our free institutions, the conservator of the peace, order, morality, and social welfare of the commonwealth, and that the compulsory observance of the Lord's Day was not only compatible with the constitutional provisions prohibiting the enactment of any law interfering with religion or restricting the free exercise thereof, but conducive to every need of good government; that the act was passed in deference to a prevailing sentiment that could not be ignored; and that, as no religious test was set up, and no religious rite or ceremony exacted, it was well within the restrictions of the state Constitution. Lindenmuller v. People was approved in Neuendorff v. Duryea, 69 N. Y. 557, 25 Am. Rep. 235, People v. Moses, 140 N. Y. 214, 35 N. E. 499, and in People v. Havnor, 149 N. Y. 195, 31 L.R.A. 689, 52 Am. St. Rep. 707, 43 N. E. 541, and perhaps in later cases, by the New York courts, and is a leading case on the subject.

It is in the light of these considerations that such laws must be construed. Chapter 4 of the Penal Code of this state (Rev. Codes 1905, §§ 8559-8584) is the first chapter of that Code in the order of chapters classifying crimes, and is entitled, "Crimes Against Religion and Conscience," and includes definitions of the crimes of blasphemy, profane swearing, obscene language, and Sabbath breaking. If we may judge of the sentiments of the legislature enacting our Penal Code, by the order of precedence given the different classes of offenses treated therein, it would seem that they considered this among the most important. They began with crimes against religion and conscience, and followed in the order named with crimes against the elective franchise, against the executive power of the state, against the legislative power, er, against public justice, etc. Our Penal Code was enacted by the territorial legislature on the 11th day of January, 1865, and the title of this chapter has remained unchanged, and no material alterations have been made in its text. When our Constitution was adopted in 1889, article 4, supra, was taken literally from the Constitution of California of 1879, and Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6, 43 Am. Rep. 231, shows the construction of the highest court of California of its provisions prior to its adoption into our Constitution. It sustains the validity of a law of that state punishing the transaction of business upon Sunday. In the opinion in that case previous decisions of that court were reviewed and commented upon by the learned chief justice. He also reviewed, at considerable length, other authorities. See also Ex parte Koser, 60 Cal. 177. The first Constitution of the state of New York, adopted in 1777, contained the following provision: "(38) And whereas, we are required, by the benevolent principles of rational liberty, not only to expel civil tyranny, but also to guard against that spiritual oppression and intolerance wherewith the bigotry and ambition of weak and wicked priests and princes have scourged mankind, this convention does further, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this state, ordain, determine, and declare that the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this state, to all mankind; provided that the liberty of conscience hereby granted shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state." And the Constitution of 1821 of New York (§ 3, art. 7) reads: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, or justify practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state." This section was copied literally in § 3 of article 1 of the Constitution of 1846 of New York, except that there was interpolated the provision now found in the Constitution of this state, that no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief. It thus appears that in all material respects California adopted its provisions regarding religion from New York, in which state, by a long line of authorities, only a few of which are cited in this opinion, laws prohibiting labor, amusements, etc., have been sustained, both on religious grounds and as being within the police power of the state. While, as we have said, we have no doubt that the intent of the framers of the different Constitutions and laws was to protect Sunday as a sacred day set apart for religious observance and rest, yet, for the purposes of this case, it is immaterial what their purpose was. If the provisions are clear, we need not consider the motives which prompted the lawmakers; and they are clear. The law here in question in no manner interferes with the religious convictions or scruples of any inhabitant of the state. It neither prescribes for nor compels the petitioners or others to observe any form of religious worship. It creates no establishment of religion. The wills and consciences of all the people are left free in this respect. In the language of Chancellor Kent, "the constitutional provision is fully satisfied by a free and universal toleration." People are at liberty to attend the church of their choice, or to continuously remain away from church. They are not required by it to contribute by taxation or otherwise to the maintenance of any form of religious practice or worship. They are at liberty to ignore, so far as their individual conduct is affected by the statute, the existence of churches and of religion. The legislative assembly has, however, said that in doing so they must not interfere with the purpose of the day, as viewed in the light of the history of the times when our Constitutions were framed, and the purpose of the founders. In fact, it may be maintained that the only effect of Sunday laws like our own is to secure peace and quiet in the observance of the religious ceremonies and worship of an overwhelming majority of our people. The fact that they happen to be adherents of the Christian faith may in no manner affect the principle. The legislature has reached the conclusion that the performance of ordinary labor and certain other acts are infringements upon the right of a great majority of the people to worship and to observe the day as set apart for that purpose, and as a day of rest. It is not for the courts to split hairs in an attempt to determine whether the judgment of the legislature has been exercised to the last degree of refinement so as to include nothing which may in any manner relate to such rights. In the exercise of the police power, the question as to what provisions are needful or appropriate is primarily for the legislature to determine, and, when it does not appear clearly that a statute thought to be within that power has no real or substantial relation thereto and the rights of the citizen, the judgment of the legislative assembly is conclusive. The preamble to the Constitution recites that "the people of North Dakota, grateful to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, do ordain and establish this Constitution." Elsewhere, Sunday is expressly recognized by excluding it from the time required for the return of bills by the governor during the sessions of the legislature. Const. § 79. Officers are required to take an oath on entering upon the performance of the duties of their office. The same requirement is made of witnesses before testifying, with certain exceptions. The Constitution is witnessed by the signature of the President and Secretary, as well as the members of the convention which framed it, "in the year of our Lord, 1889." All these things show that the character of our institutions was recognized by the delegates who framed the Constitution, and by the people who voted for its adoption; so when we find it provided, in the same section that guarantees the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, that the legislature may enact laws to prevent practices inconsistent with the peace or safety of this state, we have a very strong intimation that the supreme authority regards laws of the nature of the one complained of as necessary to secure the peace and safety of the state, and, if so, unless clearly without relation to that subject, they are valid. It also seems almost incredible that the power of the legislature to enact such laws should be questioned at this day, when the tendency throughout the American nation is towards a more general observance of all laws protecting people in the observance of the first day of the week. It is plain to us that this statute, if invalid, must accomplish one of five things: First, it must work an establishment of a religion; second, provide for compulsory support, by taxation or otherwise, of religious instruction; third, make attendance upon religious worship compulsory; fourth, work a restriction upon the exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience; or fifth, impose restrictions upon the expression of religious belief. The statute complained of does neither of these things, and therefore, as against the objection which we have considered, it is valid. Such laws have been so universally sustained that we cite only a few of the authorities bearing on the subject, in addition to those to which reference has already been made. Charleston v. Benjamin, 2 Strobb. L. 508, 49 Am. Dec. 608; Specht v. Com. 8 Pa. 312, 49 Am. Dec. 518; Allen v. Deming, 14 N. H. 133, 40 Am. Dec. 179; Shover v. State, 10 Ark. 259; Tucker

4. It is urged that even though Sunday laws may, as a general proposition, be found unobnoxious to the provision of the Constitution to which reference has been made, and that if the act complained of were a part of the general Sunday law, and as such constitutional, that, having been passed as a separate and independent measure, it is in contravention of the terms of §§ 11 and 20 of the Constitution. In other words, that it is special legislation. We need not take the trouble to define special legislation, nor to determine whether this might not be such if it were the only law on the subject. The only answer necessary to be made to this contention is that, as evidenced by the terms of the emergency clause attached to this law, the legislative assembly considered the general Sunday law as not prohibiting the maintaining and running of theaters and similar shows on Sunday, and that until the enactment of this statute, it was legal to maintain such shows upon that day. Without determining whether the legislative interpretation of the old law was correct, but assuming it to be so, it is quite evident that, instead of this being a special law, it is in the nature of an addition to the old statute on the subject, making it more general in its terms and more universal in its application than it was before the new enactment took effect. It enlarges the scope and application of the statute by enumerating theaters and shows among the prohibited avocations, and is not subject to the objection made. However, if it did stand alone, the books are replete with authorities passing upon the constitutionality of similar statutes, and almost without exception holding them valid as against these identical, and similar objections. The statute in question is not vulnerable to the attacks made upon it, and we hold that its terms bring it within the proper exercise of the legislative power. The writ heretofore allowed is quashed. The petitioners are remanded to the custody of the sheriff, with directions that on payment of the fines imposed, or, in lieu thereof, imprisonment as adjudged, they be discharged.

Note. — Rights of seller of chattel, retaining title thereto or a lien thereon, as against existing mortgagees of the realty to which it is affixed by the owner.

As is illustrated by TIPPETT v. BARHAM and Blanchard v. Eureka Planing Mill Co. post, —, there is a difference of opinion as to the right of a prior mortgagee of realty to claim property as a fixture as against the seller thereof, who claims it as personalty. Although the preponderance of opinbedded in it, cannot, by contract to which the mortgagee is not a party, reserve a right to remove it in case of failure to pay the purchase price, as against rights under a mortgage covering after-acquired property of the water company, and which embraces its entire working plant, including franchises.

ion favors the equitable rule that unless the property sold has become an integral part of the realty, or (what is practically the same thing) unless its removal would seriously injure the premises, the seller thereof, retaining title thereto, or taking back a chattel mortgage thereon, may assert his lien as against a mortgagee of the realty whose lien was in existence at the time of the annexation, there are some jurisdictions which, adhering to the opinion which determines the rights of the parties from a purely legal standpoint independently of any equitable considerations, have adopted the so-called Massachusetts rule, that the rights of the mortgagee cannot be affected by any agreement to which he is not a party, and therefore that such rights are superior to those of the seller of the fixture.

This want of harmony is attributable not only to the movement toward an equitable tempering of the rigor of the maxim, Quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit, but also to the conflict between the conception of the mortgagee as being the owner of the land, and the modern idea that he is to be considered merely as a lienor, whose rights are equitable rather than legal in character.

The decisions arriving at the conclusion that the right of a prior mortgagee of the realty is not superior to the lien retained by the seller of the so-called "fixture" are based upon two different kinds of reasoning. One, which may be termed the legal doctrine, and of which the New York cases are an instance, is that the intention of the parties to the sale that the chattel shall retain the character of personality will keep it from becoming a fixture. The other, which may be termed the equitable doctrine, and of which the New Jersey cases may be cited as an instance, is that where the security of the mortgagee of the realty is not diminished, the rights of the seller of the fixture will be recognized.

Before proceeding to the discussion of the cases, it is proper to state that the note includes only those falling strictly within its scope, without attempting to present even cases so closely analogous as those in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Statement by Keller, District Judge:

The question at issue upon this appeal arises between the holders of bonds of the Peninsula Pure Water Company, issued under and secured by a mortgage to the Knickerbocker Trust Company, and Tippet & Wood, the appellants.

By deed bearing date February 1, 1906, and recorded in the clerk's office of Elizabeth City county, Virginia, February 16, 1906, the Peninsula Pure Water Company conveyed to the Knickerbocker Trust Company of New York City all of its property rights, and franchises to secure an issue of $300,000 of first-mortgage bonds. This deed contains what is generally known as the "after-acquired property clause," the language being: "Does grant, bargain, sell, volving the rights of a creditor taking a chattel mortgage upon personality prior to its annexation. While such cases may depend upon much the same considerations as those herein discussed, the two are not exactly parallel, as in one case the seller is usually aware of the contemplated annexation, while one taking a chattel mortgage on personality as such may often reasonably suppose that it is to continue of that character. For a discussion of the specific point stated, see note in 15 L.R.A. 56, on "Efficacy of a chattel mortgage on fixtures."

And see also, in connection with this note, a note in 19 L.R.A. 441, on "Effect of agreement to prevent fixtures from becoming a part of realty."

It should also be stated that the present note, as indicated by its title, does not assume to include cases where the personality has been annexed by its purchaser to realty in which he has no interest, as, for instance, where property sold to a contractor for the erection of a building has been installed by him as a fixture therein.

Where seller retains title.

As above stated, the preponderance of authority is to the effect that where the removal of the fixture will not materially injure the premises, a seller thereof retaining title thereto may assert his right as against a prior mortgagee of the realty. Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 326, 46 Am. St. Rep. 56, 13 So. 948; Warren v. Liddell, 110 Ala. 232, 20 So. 89; J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Middle States Loan, Bldg. & Constr. Co. 17 App. D. and convey . . . all other property—real, personal, or mixed—of whatsoever kind or description, and wheresoever situated, now owned or possessed by it, or which may hereafter be acquired by it, the said Peninsula Pure Water Company; also all corporate and other franchises, privileges, rights, benefits, immunities, and exemptions . . . either by legislative grant or contract, or otherwise.” By deed bearing date March 18, 1906, and recorded March 29, 1906, Thomas Harmond and wife conveyed to the Peninsula Pure Water Company a certain tract of land located in the town of Hampton, in the county of Elizabeth City. And by a contract bearing date March 9, 1906, but which was actually executed some time after that date, Tip-pett & Wood, the intervening petitioners, entered into an agreement with the Peninsula Pure Water Company and Whetstone & Company by which they agreed to erect for the use of the Peninsula Pure Water Company a certain standpipe for the price of $8,148, and according to plans and specifications referred to in said contract, said contract being under the corporate seal of all parties. This standpipe was subsequently erected on the tract of land purchased of Thomas Harmond et ux., and was completed according to plans and specifications, although the water company was placed in the hands of the receivers before there was a formal acceptance of the standpipe by it. The water company prepared a concrete foundation upon which the

Rep. 588, under heading, “English and Canadian doctrine,” infra.

So, also, in Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107, it was held that one who leased an engine and boiler for the period of two months, with privilege of purchasing it for $1 at the expiration of the term, to a person who had possession of land under a contract, knowing that it was to be affixed by the latter to the land, but not knowing that the land contract provided that everything put upon the land should belong to it, was entitled to hold the articles as personalty as against the vendor of the land.

In General Electric Co. v. Transit Equipment Co. 57 N. J. Eq. 460, 42 Atl. 101, it was said that where the contract for the sale of the affixed property contained not only a reservation of the title, but also a right to remove the property from the premises, the conditional vendor could not be considered as having consented that the property should become a part of the freehold, and therefore subject to a prior mortgage thereon.

In Cochran v. Flint, 57 N. H. 514, it was held that, in order to pass title to machinery to the holder of a real-estate mortgage on the property to which it was affixed, as against the vendor retaining title thereto until the purchase price should be fully paid, the latter must have had actual or constructive notice that the property was to be put upon mortgaged land; of which fact the mere existence of a real-estate mortgage on record, covering the property to which the machine was actually affixed, is not sufficient, if the owner of the machinery was not aware that it was to be placed on such land; but that he had a right to assume that the machinery would be placed on property free from mortgage, and should not be deemed to have consented to any annexation which would jeopardize his rights. Compare Larue v. American Diesel Engine Co. — Ind. —, 96 N. E. 722, and Bullock Electric Mfg. Co. v. Lehigh Valley Traction Co. 231 Pa. 129, 80 Atl. 568, infra, under heading, “Effect of after-acquired-property clause.”

The fact that a conditional vendor is aware of the purchaser's intention to annex the property purchased as permanent additions to the realty, or as a substitution for other fixtures, will not give a prior mortgagee of the realty a superior right thereto, —at least, where the value of his security is not thereby impaired or diminished. Cox v. New Bern Lighting & Fuel Co. 151 N. C. 62, 134 Am. St. Rep. 966, 65 S. E. 648, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 936.

In Blanchard v. Eureka Planing Mill Co. post, —, it is held that an agreement as between the purchaser and seller of machinery, that the title thereto should remain in the seller until payment of the purchase price, was valid as against a prior mortgagee of the realty to which it was affixed, the court saying that the rule in all such cases is that, to preclude the vendor from claiming the chattel under such an agreement, the owner of the realty must have been the purchaser thereof for value, subsequent to the annexation of the fixture, without notice that the vendor retained the title.

Similarly, the rights of a seller of fixtures, retaining title thereto until paid for, will prevail against the lien of the vendor of the realty to which they have been annexed (Harris v. Hackley, 127 Mich. 46, 86 N. W. 389; Palmateer v. Robinson, 60 N. J. L. 433, 38 Atl. 957; Davis v. Bliss, 187 N. Y. 77, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 458, 79 N. E. 851, reversing 105 App. Div. 636, 93 N. Y.

standpipe was constructed, and to which it was attached by bolts and taps. This contract, which was never recorded, contained the following clauses: "No right or title to said standpipe, or to the material of which the same is composed, shall pass to Whetstone & Company or Peninsula Pure Water Company, or to any other persons or companies until all the payments above mentioned shall be fully made; and if, in any case, all the payments are not made, Tippet & Wood may enter upon the property and remove the material or standpipe as furnished by them." "If said Whetstone & Company and Peninsula Pure Water Company shall keep and perform all the terms of this agreement, and make no default in any of said payments as they become due, and in that case said Tippet & Wood will make, execute, and deliver to Whetstone & Company or Peninsula Pure Water Company a good and sufficient bill of sale for said standpipe." Said standpipe was built and completed according to plans and specifications prior to receivership proceedings; but default was made in the payments provided for, leaving a balance unpaid of $2,548, with interest from February 1, 1907, and $97.78, with interest from March 1, 1907 (this latter sum was for repairs and labor caused by the alleged delay of the water company to make proper tests after completion of the work), whereupon Tippet & Wood filed its petition, setting up its contract, and praying leave of court to enter Supp. 1127), except where the fixture is not removable without considerable damage to the freehold. Andrews v. Powers, 86 App. Div. 216, 72 N. Y. Supp. 597. But it has been held in Cockshutt Plow Co. v. McLoughry, 2 Sask. L. R. 259, in accordance with the general English doctrine, that the conditional vendor may not reclaim his property as against the vendor of the land in possession.

But equitable considerations may preclude the successful assertion of a right which would otherwise be recognized.

Thus, in Larue v. American Diesel Engine Co. — Ind. —, 96 N. E. 772, where it appeared that the vendor's agent had procured the sale of an electric lighting plant to a third party, representing to the owners that he wished to install therein an engine for purposes of demonstration, and that he had one bought and paid for, and the owners took back a purchase-money mortgage which by its terms included all machinery, apparatus, and appliances that might thereafter be placed upon the premises; and that the real estate would be seriously damaged by the removal of the engine,—it was held that the vendor of the engine could not assert any right under its contract of conditional sale as against the mortgagees of the realty.

And in East New York Refrigerator & Woodworking Co. v. Halpern, 140 App. Div. 201, 125 N. Y. Supp. 111, the lien of a building loan mortgage on which advances had been made by the mortgagee without knowledge of the existence of any contract of conditional sale, and prior to its filing, was held superior to that of the conditional vendor of mantelpieces affixed to the property.

Where seller takes chattel mortgage.

The doctrine that where the fixture may be removed without material injury, the seller may enforce his lien as against the prior mortgagee of the realty, is applicable where the seller of the fixtures has taken a chattel mortgage thereon. Anderson v. Creamery Package Mfg. Co. 8

Idaho, 200, 56 L.R.A. 554, 101 Am. St. Rep. 188, 67 Pac. 493; Andrews v. Chandler, 27 Ill. App. 103; Ellison v. Salem Coal & Min. Co. 43 Ill. App. 120; Binkley v. Forkner, 117 Ind. 176, 3 L.R.A. 33, 19 N. E. 753; First Nat. Bank v. Elmore, 52 Iowa, 541, 3 N. W. 547; Crippen v. Morrison, 13 Mich. 23; Hudson Trust & Sav. Inst. v. Carr-Curran Paper Mills Co. 58 N. J. Eq. 59, 43 Atl. 418; Tift v. Horton, 53 N. Y. 377, 13 Am. Rep. 537; Hine v. Morris, 7 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 482; Hurxthal v. Hurxthal, 45 W. Va. 584, 32 S. E. 237.

In Binkley v. Forkner, 117 Ind. 176, 3 L.R.A. 33, 19 N. E. 753, it is said that whether a chattel mortgage given to secure the purchase price of property annexed to real estate shall be postponed to a prior mortgage on the realty "must depend upon the inquiry whether or not the preservation of the rights of the holder of the chattel mortgage will impair or diminish the security of the real-estate mortgagee as it was when he took it. If it will not, then it would be inequitable that the latter should defeat or destroy the security of the former. If it will, then it was the folly or misfortune of the holder of the chattel mortgage that he permitted the property to be annexed to a freehold from which it cannot be removed without diminishing or impairing an existing mortgage thereon."

In Campbell v. Roddy, 44 N. J. Eq. 244, 6 Am. St. Rep. 889, 14 Atl. 279, which reversed Roddy v. Brick, 42 N. J. Eq. 218, 6 Atl. 806, the mortgagor of real estate subsequently purchased machinery under an arrangement with the seller which was construed to be practically the equivalent of a chattel mortgage thereon to secure the purchase price, and then affixed it to the realty. The court, after discussing the various rules which might be applied to the case, concluded that the equitable way of dealing with the property was to reserve the right of the prior real-estate mortgagee to the same degree of security which he would have enjoyed had the property remained as when mortgaged; saying, that as long as he has secured the full amount of indemnity which upon the premises and remove the said standpipe according to the terms of its contract.

The decree for sale of the water companies' properties included the standpipe in question, the court reserving "to all persons claiming a lien or liens against any of the assets or property herein authorized to be sold the same liens, rights, or claim against the money derived from the said sale as such person or persons may have, or could set up and establish, against the said assets or properties as if no sale had been had hereunder," Tippet & Wood consenting, without prejudice, that its claim be paid either in money or by removing the standpipe. The properties of the water companies, including the standpipe in question, claimed by Tippet & Wood, were subsequently sold as a whole, and the said sale duly confirmed.

The report of the special master, filed on September 29, 1909, allowed the claim of Tippet & Wood as an unsecured debt, and disallowed the priority of the same over the first-mortgage bonds. Tippet & Wood, by counsel, filed exceptions to said report of the special master, which exceptions were overruled by the court.

Argued before Goff, Circuit Judge, and Keller, District Judge.

Mr. William C. L. Talliaferro, for appellant:

A mortgage intended to cover after-acquired personal property can only attach

he took, he has no ground for complaint; and that the real-estate mortgagee is entitled to any annexation made by his mortgagor of his own property, but is not entitled to the property of others. This decision proceeds not only upon the theory that the chattel character of the property was preserved, but upon the theory of an equitable preservation of the vendor's lien upon the chattels after they have been transmuted into realty.

In Henry v. Von Brandenstein, 12 Daly, 430, it was held that where, nearly five years after judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage of real estate, but before a sale, the owner of the land placed machinery thereon, at the same time giving a chattel mortgage on it, the machinery could not be claimed as fixtures, as against the chattel mortgagee.

In Fibbets v. Moore, 23 Cal. 208, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 348, it was held that a chattel mortgage executed to secure the purchase price of a boiler and engine, which were subsequently placed in a quartz mill, so that they became a part of the realty, took precedence of a prior chattel mortgage on the mill, the court saying that while ordinarily the lien in such case would be construed to relate back to the date of the mortgage on the mill, this doctrine of relation will not be so applied as to defeat or divest intermediate rights and liens lawfully acquired.

Fixtures installed by a lessee and sold by him to the lessor do not inure to the benefit of an existing mortgagee of the realty where, as part of the same transaction, the seller takes security thereon for the purchase price. Belvin v. Raleigh Paper Co. 123 N. C. 138, 31 S. E. 665.

Notice to the prior mortgagee of the realty of the annexation of chattels covered by a chattel mortgage or conditional sale agreement is not essential to preserving the rights of the chattel vendor or mortgagee. Cox v. New Bern Lighting & Fuel Co. 151 N. C. 62, 134 Am. St. Rep. 966, 65 S. E. 648. 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 936.

It has likewise been held that the rights of a seller of fixtures taking back a chattel mortgage thereon will prevail against the lien of a vendor of realty to which they have been annexed. Miller v. Wilson, 71 Iowa, 610, 33 N. W. 128; Alberson v. Elk Creek Min. Co. 39 Or. 552, 65 Pac. 978; Willis v. Munger Improved Cotton Mach. Mfg. Co. 13 Tex. Civ. App. 607, 36 S. W. 1010.

An opposite result, which, however, appears to be warranted by the peculiar state of facts involved, was reached in McCrillis v. Cole, 25 R. I. 156, 105 Am. St. Rep. 875, 55 Atl. 196. The complainant had entered into a contract by which he was to build a mill for one Smith, and to sell him the land and mill at an agreed price, Smith to make certain payments from time to time, and to pay as rental, until the purchase was completed, interest on the price of the land and the money expended by the complainant in erecting the mill. Smith also agreed to furnish a part of the material for the mill, and to furnish an engine and boiler, with shafting and pulleys, "to be considered a part of the real estate." Thereafter Smith bought an engine under an agreement by which it was to remain the property of the seller until paid for. Each of these agreements was unknown to the other. It was held that the complainant stood, as to Smith, equitably as a mortgagee; that upon equitable ground his claim to the engine was stronger than that of the seller, whose duty it was to make inquiry as to the ownership of the realty to which the engine was to be affixed; that the complainant having invested money on the agreement by Smith to furnish the engine and boilers, his claim was equally as strong as if he had advanced money after the annexation of the engine.

As against purchaser on foreclosure.

It has also been held that a conditional vendor (Brand v. McMahon, 60 Hun, 582, 38 N. Y. S. R. 576, 15 N. Y. Supp. 39; Atlantic Safe Deposit & T. Co. v. Atlantic City Laundry Co. 64 N. J. Eq. 140, 53 Atl. 212) or a chattel mortgagee (Eaves v. Es- to such interest as may come into the mortgagor's hands; if that property is already subject to mortgage or other liens, the general mortgage does not displace them, though they may be junior to it in point of time.

When the parties immediately concerned, by an agreement between themselves, manifest their purpose that the property, although it is annexed to the soil, shall retain its character as personalty, then, except as against persons who occupy the relation of innocent purchasers without notice, the intention of the parties will prevail, unless the property be of such nature that it necessarily becomes incorporated into and a part of the realty by the act and manner of annexation.

The execution of a chattel mortgage by tes, 10 Kan. 314, 15 Am. Rep. 345) may assert his rights as against a purchaser on the foreclosure of a prior real-estate mortgage. But compare Richardson v. Copeland, infra.

See also, in this connection, Deal v. Smart, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 610, in which machinery installed on trial in a flouring mill under a conditional-sale agreement was held not to pass to the purchaser on foreclosure of the lien of the vendor of the realty.

Since the statute providing that no sale of goods and chattels, where possession is delivered to the vendee, shall be subject to any condition whatever as against creditors of the vendee, or subsequent purchasers from such vendee, in good faith, unless such condition shall be evidenced by writing and duly recorded, must be construed, in view of its manifest purpose, as protecting subsequent creditors only, a conditional sale of machinery annexed by the purchaser to realty subject to a prior deed of trust is nevertheless good against the purchaser upon foreclosure of such trust deed. Defiance Mach. Works v. Trisler, 21 Mo. App. 69.

But the conditional vendor of gas ranges installed in an apartment house, whose contract is not duly filed, as provided by the lien law, cannot, in view of the provision of such law that every contract for the conditional sale of any goods and chattels attached or to be attached to a building shall be void as against subsequent bona fide purchasers or encumbrancers of the premises on which said building stands, unless such contract shall have been duly and properly filed on or about the date of delivery of such goods or chattels at such building, assert his right to the ranges against a bona fide purchaser on foreclosure of a prior mortgage of the realty. Central Union Gas Co. v. Browning, 131 N. Y. Supp. 464.

Effect of after-acquired property clause.

The fact that a prior mortgage of real estate contains a provision that it shall cover additions thereto does not give the mortgagee a superior claim to chattels annexed thereto, as against the vendor by conditional-sale contract, since the after-acquired property clause in a mortgage attaches only to such interest as the mortgagor acquires. Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 326, 46 Am. St. Rep. 56, 13 So. 948; J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Middle States Loan, Bldg. & Constr. Co. 17 App. D. C. 584; Cox v. New Bern Lighting & Fuel Co. 151 N. C. 62, 134 Am. St. Rep. 966, 65 S. E. 648, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 936. Contra, Union Trust Co. v. Southern Sawmills & Lumber Co. and Re Williamsburg Knitting Mill, infra, and TIPPETT v. BARHAM. And see also Larue v. American Diesel Engine Co. and Bullock Electric Mfg. Co. v. Lehigh Valley Traction Co. infra.

In this view of the rights accruing to the mortgagee under an after-acquired property clause, a delay or failure to register the contract of conditional sale is immaterial where the mortgagee has parted with nothing of value upon the faith of his security, and is in no way prejudiced thereby. Cox v. New Bern Lighting & Fuel Co. 151 N. C. 62, 134 Am. St. Rep. 966, 65 S. E. 648, 18 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 936.

And in Defiance Mach. Works v. Trisler, supra, it was held that where title to a machine was retained as security for the payment of the purchase price, the lien of a deed of trust which, by its terms, covered any machinery, tools, and fixtures which might thereafter be acquired by the grantor therein, and placed on the premises, nevertheless did not attach to the machine, because the title to it never vested in the purchaser; and that therefore the trustee under the deed of trust could pass no title to a purchaser at a foreclosure sale, although he had no notice of the terms of the sale of the machine.

So, also, in Davis v. Bliss, 187 N. Y. 77, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, 79 N. E. 851, reversing 105 App. Div. 636, 93 N. Y. Supp. 1127, it was held that an agreement between a conditional vendor of real estate, and the vendee, that any machinery placed upon the the owner of the land, upon machinery which he afterwards places in a building thereon, is regarded as an unequivocal declaration of his intention that the act of annexation shall not change or take away the character of the machinery as personalty until the debt secured by the mortgage has been fully paid.

premises should become a part of the realty, could not affect the rights of the seller of machinery, reserving title thereto until the price should be paid.

No rights can be asserted on behalf of holders of bonds who purchase them with notice of the reservation of title by the conditional vendor of ice-manufacturing machinery installed on the premises, under a provision of a prior mortgage of the realty that all machinery affixed shall be treated as real estate. Central Trust Co. v. Arctic Ice Mach. Mfg. Co. 77 Md. 202, 28 Atl. 493.

But in Union Trust Co. v. Southern Sawmills & Lumber Co. 92 C. C. A. 101, 166 Fed. 193, machinery and fixtures attached to, used in, and which became a part of, the sawmill plant, and in Re Williamsburg Knitting Mill, 190 Fed. 871, an automatic sprinkler system, were held to have become subject to mortgages containing an after-acquired property clause, notwithstanding a reservation of title on the part of the vendor under a contract which had not been registered. These decisions, although apparently emphasizing the fact of the existence of the after-acquired property clause, seem to have been made with the idea of following the Massachusetts rule hereinafter discussed, under which rule the same result would follow regardless of the presence or absence of an after-acquired property clause, or of the registration of the contract of conditional sale.

In Larue v. American Diesel Engine Co. — Ind. —, 96 N. E. 772, the fact that the conditional vendor had, through a record of a real-estate mortgage which, by its terms, covered property to be put in the plant, constructive notice thereof, was referred to as important and controlling.

And in Bullock Electric Mfg. Co. v. Lehigh Valley Traction Co. 231 Pa. 129, 80 Atl. 568, in which generators installed in an electric power house, which replaced others removed, were permanently built into the plant, and were an essential part of the construction for which the plant was erected, were held to become subject to a prior real-estate mortgage thereon, stress was laid on the fact that, at the time the agreement for 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the sale of the generators was concluded, the contracting parties had record notice of the terms of the mortgage, one of which was that all generators that might thereafter be acquired should be subject to its lien.

Compare with the two cases last preceding, Cochran v. Flint, 57 N. H. 514, supra, under heading, "Where seller retains title," with which, however, they are entirely consistent.

Where new fixture replaces old.

There is a difference of opinion as to the effect upon the rights of the parties of the circumstance that the machinery to which the seller reserves title takes the place of old machinery removed from the premises.

In Page v. Edwards, 64 Vt. 124, 23 Atl. 917, it is held that machinery sold under a contract of conditional sale will retain the character of personalty against the holder of an existing mortgage on the realty, notwithstanding that machinery in place when the real-estate mortgage was taken has been removed to make room for the machinery in question.

And compare Davis v. Bliss, 187 N. Y. 77, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 458, 73 N. E. 851, where such circumstance was held to give a conditional vendor of the realty no greater rights than he would otherwise possess, in the absence of anything to show that he assented to the removal of the old machinery in reliance upon its being replaced by new.

And see also Hill v. Sewald, 53 Pa. 271, 91 Am. Dec. 209, in which it was held that boilers hired for use in a mill, which could be removed without other injury than taking down the boiler wall, did not become subject to an existing mortgage on the realty, though they replaced others which had become worn out.

On the other hand, in Bass Foundry & Mach. Works v. Gallentine, 99 Ind. 525, machinery for a mill, sold under an agreement that the title should not pass until it was paid for, and which took the place of old machinery, was held subject to an existing real-estate mortgage on the premises, the court saying: "The old machinery was subject to the mortgage; the mortgagor

The Massachusetts rule.

In opposition to the doctrine of the foregoing cases are those which support the so-called Massachusetts rule, which, taking the view that the rights of the mortgagee cannot be affected by an agreement to which he is not a party, hold such rights to be superior to those of the seller of the fixture, retaining title thereto (Watertown Steam Engine Co. v. Davis, 5 Houst. [Del.] 192; Hawkins v. Hersey, 86 Me. 394, 30 Atl. 14; Clary v. Owen, 15 Gray, 522; Hunt v. Bay State Iron Co. 97 Mass. 279; Lorain Steel Co. v. Norfolk & B. Street R. BARHAM; and see also in this connection, Union Trust Co. v. Southern Sawmills & Lumber Co. 92 C. C. A. 101, 166 Fed. 193, and Re Williamsburg Knitting Mill, 190 Fed. 871, above set forth); or taking back a chattel mortgage thereon (Maguire v. Park, 140 Mass. 21, 1 N. E. 750; Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484; Frankland v. Moulton, 5 Wis. 1). And see also the cases following.

In Watertown Steam Engine Co. v. Davis, 5 Houst. (Del.) 192, it was held that machinery which the seller thereof knew would become a fixture became subject to the lien of a prior mortgage on the realty, in the absence of fraudulent conduct on the part of the mortgagee, or a valid agreement on his part that it should not be bound by the mortgage, notwithstanding the retention of the title by the seller, the theory of the court apparently being that where the seller contemplates annexation, he takes the risk of all legal consequences resulting from that act.

279, it was held that an agreement that railroad rails laid in a track should be subject to removal and remain personal property until they were paid for, although valid as to the parties, was not valid as to a prior real-estate mortgagee, the court saying that a mortgagor in possession is not competent to bind existing mortgagees by any arrangement to treat as personalty annexations to the freehold.

In Richardson v. Copeland, 6 Gray, 536, 66 Am. Dec. 424, it was held that where an engine and boiler had been affixed to real estate by the owner of the freehold in such a manner as to make them a part thereof, notwithstanding that, at the time of their purchase, the purchaser agreed to treat them as personalty, and gave a chattel mortgage on them for the purchase price, such mortgage was inoperative and void as against a subsequent purchaser of the real estate at an assignee's sale, upon the petition of prior mortgagees of the realty, though he had notice of the mortgage.

In Clary v. Owen, 15 Gray, 522, it was held that one who constructs fixtures on mortgaged property under a contract with the mortgagor that the fixtures shall remain the property of the builder until paid for is not entitled to them as against an assignee of the mortgage with notice of the contract, taking possession of the premises for breach of condition before completion of the fixtures, and who afterward purchased the equity of redemption, the court saying that, although the mortgagor, for some purposes, and as to all persons except the mortgagee, may be regarded as the absolute owner of the land, yet the title of the mortgagee is in all respects to be treated as paramount, and that it is not in the power of the mortgagor, by any agreement made with a third person after the execution of the mortgage, to give to such person the right to hold anything to be attached to the freehold, which, as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, would become a part of the realty.

tel affixed thereto after execution of the mortgage, as against the conditional vendor thereof, is limited in Cochran v. Flint, 57 N. H. 514, upon the ground that the annexation was made by the conditional vendor of the machinery.

In Sinker v. Comparet, 62 Tex. 470, where the vendors of certain realty had sold it, taking back a mortgage, the purchaser agreeing as part of the consideration to erect a mill thereon, it was held that the lien of the mortgagees of the realty upon machinery which had been installed in the mill under a contract of conditional sale was protected by a statutory provision that where any reservation or limitation shall be pretended to have been made by way of condition, reversion, remainder, or otherwise, in goods and chattels the possession whereof shall have remained in another, the same shall be taken, as to the creditors or purchasers of the person so remaining in possession, to be fraudulent.

In Hamilton v. Huntley, 78 Ind. 521, 41 Am. Rep. 593, it was held that where machinery was put into a flouring mill upon trial, and permitted to remain there long after the time allowed for trial had expired, and long after the possession of the occupant had ended, and after the premises had been rented by another person, and the mill and machinery delivered up to him, the machinery became subject to a mortgage on the realty; the court saying that the doctrine that the legal rule as to fixtures may be modified by the contract of the parties applies only when the contract is made by the party who, without such contract, would be entitled to the personal property as part of the real estate.

A ground for distinction between cases which hold that a chattel which becomes attached to realty becomes subject to a prior mortgage thereon, notwithstanding an agreement between the owner or occupant of the realty and the seller of the fixture that the title thereto shall not pass until payment of the purchase price, or notwithstanding the giving of a chattel mortgage as security therefor, and the decisions which hold that such arrangements are effectual to preserve the chattel character of the fixtures as against such prior mortgagees of the realty, is discussed in Crippen v. Morrison, 13 Mich. 23, in which it is said that while, under the English rule, which gives the mortgagee an immediate right of possession, the mortgagor cannot give others a right he does not possess himself to remove improvements from the premises, yet, in view of changes effected in the rights of the parties by statutory provisions, he is, until actual foreclosure, to be regarded as in possession by right, and not by sufferance, and may make such arrangements for the use of the property as any other person during his term.

Where the consent of the mortgagee of the realty to the arrangement is obtained, the rights of a seller retaining title to the fixture, until payment of the purchase price, may be enforced. Hawkins v. Hersey, 86 Me. 394, 30 Atl. 14; Bartholomew v. Hamilton, 105 Mass. 239; and see also Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484; Fuller-Warren Co. v. Harter, 110 Wis. 80, 53 L.R.A. 603, 84 Am. St. Rep. 867, 85 N. W. 698.

And where such consenting mortgagee while in possession made no claim to the property, and did not object to its removal, it cannot be reclaimed by a subsequent assignee of the mortgage. Bartholomew v. Hamilton, 105 Mass. 239.

In Crippen v. Morrison, supra, it was held that where it was expressly agreed that a steam engine and its appurtenances should continue to be the property of the seller until he should receive a chattel mortgage thereon and a mortgage upon the land, an assignee of a prior mortgage on the realty, with notice of the chattel mortgage on the engine, took subject thereto.

English and Canadian doctrine.

The effect of the English and Canadian decisions on the question (other than those made under the civil law) appears to be that, in the absence of some stipulation in the mortgage negating such implication, such as a covenant not to remove any of the fixtures without the mortgagee's consent, a mortgagor in possession has an implied authority to unfix chattels annexed to the premises during the existence of the mortgage, and therefore that he may give the seller of chattels such right; but that any implied license arising from the mortgagee's leaving the mortgagor in possession is determined by the mortgagee's entering and taking possession.

In Cumberland Union Bkg. Co. v. Maryport Hematite Iron & Steel Co. [1892] 1 Ch. 415, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 227, 66 L. T. N. S. 108, 40 Week. Rep. 280, it was held that where the lessees of a colliery entered contract between appellants, Whetstone & Company (the general subcontractors) and Peninsula Pure Water Company, became a fixture, so as to become annexed to the freehold, it would pass under the lien of the mortgage by virtue of the "after-acquired property" clause; but it was strenuously insisted that by the terms of the contract it is apparent that no such annexation was contemplated by the parties to that contract. We do not so understand this contract that the subject of it was never to become annexed to the freehold, but rather that there was an attempt to so preserve the status of the subject of the contract as that, in the event of necessity, it might be reclaimed as personal property the title whereof had not been parted with by the appellants. The standpipe was to into an agreement for the erection of a trade fixture, it being stipulated that, until the purchase price should be fully paid, it should remain the property of the vendors, such vendors were, upon a receiver's (appointed in an action to foreclose a prior mortgage) desiring to give up possession of the colliery, entitled to remove the machine. This decision appears to proceed upon the theory that the claim of the mortgagee was not based so much on the annexation of the fixture to the realty, as on a provision in the mortgage that not only the existing machinery and chattels, but also all the machinery and chattels to be thereafter brought upon the premises, should be included in the security. North, J., referring to such provision, said: "That, in my opinion, was a perfectly good bargain as between the parties to it. But I think it was not in the power of the mortgagors to confer on their mortgagees a better title than they themselves had to the property which they agreed to mortgage to them." The passage quoted appears to have given rise to some difficulty; but, taken in connection with the facts involved in the case, is not at variance with the decisions which hold that upon a mortgage in fee of the land, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, the mortgagee is entitled to all fixtures which may be upon the land, whether placed there before or after the mortgage. See Hobson v. Gorringe [1897] 1 Ch. 182, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 114, 75 L. T. N. S. 610, 45 Week. Rep. 356, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 208; also Gough v. Wood [1894] 1 Q. B. 713, 63 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 564, 9 Reports, 509, 70 L. T. N. S. 297, 42 Week. Rep. 469, and Huddersfield Bkg. Co. v. Henry Lister & Son [1895] 2 Ch. 273, 64 L. J. Ch. N. S. 523, 12 Reports, 331, 72 L. T. N. S. 703, 43 Week. Rep. 567, where it was said that the Maryport Case turned on the view that there was an implied authority given by the mortgagees to unfix chattels annexed to the premises.

In Gough v. Wood [1894] 1 Q. B. 713, 63 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 564, 9 Reports, 509, 70 L. T. N. S. 297, 42 Week. Rep. 469, a be erected "for the use of the Peninsula Pure Water Company," and when erected in accordance with specifications attached to and made a part of the agreement, was to be "accepted by Whetstone & Company, and Peninsula Pure Water Company."

The special master found: That the standpipe in question was erected upon a foundation which is supposed to be 25 feet in diameter and 10 feet in depth, and is attached to this foundation by anchor bolts 10 feet in length and 2 inches in diameter. These anchor bolts are imbedded in the foundation. The standpipe is 18 feet in diameter and 140 feet high above the top of the foundation. That the standpipe is a part of the original construction work of the system of waterworks intended to be constructed, and an indispensable part of such system, as without such a standpipe it would have been impossible for the water company to have furnished its consumers with water. That it is one of the integral parts of the property which, as a whole, was to constitute the security of the mortgage creditors.

As between the parties to the contract, doubtless the rights reserved to Tippet & Wood would be binding; but as the question here is between the appellants, on the tenant under a ninety-nine-year lease contracted for heating apparatus, consisting of a boiler and piping, for the carrying on of his business of nurseryman, under a hire-purchase agreement containing a stipulation that, in case of default in payment, the seller might enter and carry away the apparatus. This agreement, not being under seal, did not amount to a grant of land, or an easement, to which any subsequent mortgage would be subject. He thereafter, and before the installation of the apparatus, mortgaged his interest in the property to one who had no notice of the agreement. Shortly afterwards the seller, who had no notice of the mortgage, installed the apparatus; subsequently, there being a default, he entered and retook it, the mortgagor still being in possession. It was held that the mortgagee could not recover damages for the removal. Lindley, L. J., said: "By leaving the mortgagor in possession, the mortgagee impliedly authorized him to carry on his business and to sell and remove the plants, trees, and shrubs which, though fixed to the soil, constituted his stock in trade. This implied authority can hardly be confined to such things, but may fairly be regarded, and I think ought to be regarded, as authorizing the mortgagor whilst in possession to hire and bring and fix other fixtures necessary for his business, and to agree with their owner that he shall be at liberty to remove them at the end of the time for which they are hired. Unless this be so, persons dealing bona fide with mortgagors in possession will be exposed to very unreasonable risks; and honest business with them will be seriously impeded. This implied authority and the fact that the hot-water apparatus was not the property of the mortgagor are the important features of this case, and are, in my opinion, sufficient to protect the defendants from the claim of the plaintiff." Kay, L. J., expressing himself to the same effect, said: "As the boiler and pipes were removed while the mortgagor was in possession and was carrying on, with the assent of the mortgagee, a business for the purposes of which they were fixed, I think his license may be held to extend so far as to permit the removal while that business was being carried on by the mortgagor, and before the mortgagee put an end to it by taking possession." The questions whether the vendor could have removed the apparatus if it had been put before the mortgage of the realty, or if the mortgagee had taken possession before removal, were expressly left undecided.

The foregoing case is distinguished in Ellis v. Glover & Hobson [1908] 1 K. B. 388, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 251, 98 L. T. N. S. 110, in which the mortgagor's covenant not to remove any of the fixtures without the written consent of the mortgagee was held to preclude the implication of a permission to fix and unfix trade fixtures while the mortgagor retained possession; and that therefore in such a case trade fixtures installed under a hire-purchase agreement became subject to a prior mortgage of the realty.

Any implied license to remove a fixture, arising from the mortgagee's leaving the mortgagor in possession, is determined by the mortgagee's entering and taking possession of the land. Hobson v. Gorrington [1897] 1 Ch. 182, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 114, 75 L. T. N. S. 610, 45 Week. Rep. 358, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 208; Reynolds v. Ashby [1904] A. C. 468, 1 B. R. C. 653, 73 L. J. K. B. N. In Thomas v. Inglis, 7 Ont. Rep. 588, it was held that a conditional vendor of an engine and boiler which had become annexed to realty might enforce his rights against the objection of a prior mortgagee of the realty, and this even though the engine and boiler replaced old ones; but it was found that the security of the mortgage was ample without resorting to the machinery.

In Oates v. Cameron, 7 U. C. Q. B. 228, it was held that the seller of an engine so attached to the realty as to become a fixture, retaining a lien thereon for the payment of the price, could not reclaim it as against an existing mortgagee of the realty, in possession.

In connection with the subject under discussion reference may be made to Seeley v. Caldwell, 18 Ont. L. Rep. 472, in which it was held that the lessor of machinery which had become so annexed to realty subject to one side, and the trustee under the mortgage and the bondholders, on the other, it is pertinent to inquire whether there is any reason or principle upon which the interests of these latter parties who were not parties to this contract can be affected by it. There is a line of cases which, with more or less unanimity, holds that where a mortgage exists on real estate, and an accession is subsequently made of property agreed between the vendor and the mortgagor to be treated as personalty, and a reservation of title until paid for agreed upon between vendor and mortgagor-purchaser, such accession, if it can be severed from the realty without injury to the latter or to the value of the security for the mortgage debt as it stood before the improvement was made, will be impressed with the same character as between the vendor and the mortgagee as between the vendor and mortgagor; in other words, that it does not become real estate, and may be removed without invading the rights of the mortgagee. Of this class are Campbell v. Roddy, 44 N. J. Eq. 244, 6 Am. St. Rep. 889, 14 Atl. 279; Binkley v. Forkner, 117 Ind. 185, 3 L.R.A. 33, 19 N. E. 753; German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Weber, 16 Wash. 95, 38 L.R.A. 267, 47 Pac.

a previous mortgage as prima facie to constitute it, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, a fixture, was not entitled to recover it from the mortgagee in possession.

And see also Cockshutt Plow Co. v. McLoughry, 2 Sask. L. R. 259, which holds that a windmill, pump, tank, piping, and a sawmill for the operation of which shafting was attached to the windmill, purchased under a contract of conditional sale by one in possession of the premises under a land contract, and affixed thereto by him as a permanent improvement, could not be reclaimed by the seller as against the vendor of the land, who, under a provision contained in the agreement of sale in that behalf, had canceled such sale and resumed possession.

Under the civil law.

Although, it is not intended in this note to go into the question as to when property ordinarily of a personal character becomes a fixture upon annexation to the realty, the question under discussion being as to the rights of the parties in regard to property which has concededly, as between the owner of the realty and a purchaser or encumbrancer thereof, become a fixture, the absence of a strict analogy between the common law of "fixtures" and the civil law of "immovables by destination" appears to warrant the inclusion of a number of decisions upon the question whether immobilization by destination takes place where the seller of the chattel retains title thereto until the purchase price shall be fully paid, or resorts to any other of the variant forms of what may be generically characterized as conditional sales or hire-purchase agreements.

Before taking up those cases it may be stated that it has been established by a decision of the supreme court in Ontario Car & Foundry Co. v. Farwell, 18 Can. S. C. 1, that although the immobilization of a movable does not operate against its unpaid vendor, the rule applies only between the vendor and the vendee as long as the vendee is in possession of the thing sold, but does not operate against a third party who comes into possession of an immovable to which are attached movable things which, by law, are immovable par destination, nor against a mortgage creditor, even though the buyer remains in possession. This conclusion is based upon certain French decisions and opinions expressed by commentators upon the civil law.

Although the rights of an unpaid vendor have thus become clearly defined where the property has indubitably become immobilized, it has been a much controverted question whether immobilization by destination can take place where the owner of the immovable is not at the same time the owner of the movable.

In La Banque d'Hochelaga v. Waterous Engine Works Co. 27 Can. S. C. 406, it was held by two justices that, as between one subrogated to the hypothec and privilege of the vendor in the land, and the conditional vendor of sawmill machinery annexed to the land, such machinery did not become immobilized by destination, upon the ground that, under the provisions of the Quebec Civil Code, movable property does not become immovable by destination unless there is a common ownership of the movable and of the real property with which it is incorporated. Two justices concurred in the result reached, while the fifth, in an extensive dissenting opinion, maintained that the statutory provision in question merely requires that the incorporation be made by the proprietor of the realty; and that the incorporation having been made by the proprietor of the realty with the express consent of the proprietor of the chattels, the effect is the same as where the incorporation is made by the proprietor of both.

In Leonard v. Willard, Rap. Jud. Quebec 23 C. S. 482, Lynch, J., although personally of the opinion that movable property, the title to which was reserved by the vendor under a suspensive conditional sale, nevertheless became an immovable by the simple fact of the incorporation made by the proprietor of the immovable, considered himself bound by the judgment in the foregoing case to hold that the property might, even after a sheriff's sale of the immovable, be revendicated by the vendor. E. S. O.

224, and Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. George, 77 Minn. 319, 79 N. W. 1028, 1064, and these cases and some others support this doctrine more or less completely.

Upon the other hand, there are many cases (some of which will be hereinafter referred to) which hold that personal property incorporated into or affixed to real estate in such manner that it would be subject to the lien of an existing mortgage thereon as between the mortgagor and mortgagee will be so subject to the lien of the mortgage, notwithstanding the existence of an agreement between the vendor and the mortgagor that it shall retain its character as personal property, unless the mortgagee be also a party to such agreement. This is what is generally known as the Massachusetts rule, and it has been affirmed by many other courts of last resort, and particularly by the Supreme Court of the United States in several cases hereinafter separately referred to.

We think this latter doctrine announces the correct principle; especially where the application is, as in the present case, confined to a case wherein the mortgage (containing an after-acquired property clause) has been drawn for the purpose of embracing the entire working plant of the corporation, including its franchises, as in such cases it is usually true that the mortgage is given at a time when the real estate is but very insufficient security for the debt, and the subsequent accessions are very generally made by the expenditure of the funds derived by reason of the negotiation of the bonds secured by such a mortgage, and the mortgage is made and received in contemplation of such accessions. In such cases the equities of the beneficiaries under the mortgage should and must attach to such accessions as, under the description contained in the mortgage, are included within it, unless some higher equity or a legal title intervenes. In this case the mortgage to the Knickerbocker Trust Company was executed February 1, 1906, and recorded February 16, 1906. The deed from Thomas Harmond and wife to the Peninsula Pure Water Company for the land upon which the standpipe was erected was executed on March 8, 1906, and recorded on March 29, 1906. The contract between appellants, Whetstone & Company, and the Peninsula Pure Water Company, was dated March 9, 1906, but was not really executed until some time after its date, and was not recorded.

Under an after-acquired property clause such as that contained in the mortgage executed to secure the bondholders in the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case at bar, any property acquired by the mortgagor subsequent to the date of execution and delivery of the mortgage, and which is within the general description contained therein, will become as fully subject to the lien of the mortgage in equity as if such property had been owned by the mortgagor at the date of the execution and delivery of the mortgage. Penock v. Coe, 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 436; Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. 459, 20 L. ed. 199; Branch v. Jeaup, 106 U. S. 478, 27 L. ed. 279, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 495; Thompson v. White Water Valley R. Co. 132 U. S. 68, 33 L. ed. 256, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 29. As a matter of course, such subsequently acquired real estate comes under the lien of the mortgage subject to such limitations as are imposed upon it when acquired by the mortgagor,—in other words, only such interest passes as passed to the mortgagor,—and hence, had the property conveyed by Thomas Harmond and wife to the Peninsula Pure Water Company been subject to a lien (for purchase money or otherwise) on March 8, 1906, when it was acquired, such lien would have been preserved as against any claims of bondholders or trustee. Of this nature were the facts in the cases of Wood v. Holly Mfg. Co. 100 Ala. 326, 46 Am. St. Rep. 65, 13 So. 948, and Holly Mfg. Co. v. New Chester Water Co. (C. C.) 48 Fed. 879, cited by appellants. So also if personal property which is not and never becomes a part of the freehold mortgaged is acquired by the mortgagor after the execution and delivery of the mortgage, the interest of the mortgagor may pass under the after-acquired property clause of the mortgage if the general description in that clause will cover it, but it must pass burdened by whatever restrictions were imposed upon it in respect to the mortgagor, because only such title can pass to the trustee as was vested in the mortgagor through whom it passed. This was the situation in United States v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. (New Orleans & O. R. Co. v. Mellen) 12 Wall. 362, 20 L. ed. 434, Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 339, and Meyer v. Western Car Co. 102 U. S. 1, 26 L. ed. 59, cited by the appellants, and the situation is readily distinguishable from that existing in the case at bar. In the case at bar the structure in issue, having become affixed to a part of the freehold which, at the time it was so affixed, was subject to the lien of the mortgage in equity, thereby became (except as to parties to the contract) a part of the real estate, and, by operation of law, became subject to the mortgage without regard to any agreement between the mortgagor and the person furnishing or erecting such property or structure.

In United States v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. (New Orleans & O. R. Co. v. Mellen) 12 Wall. 363, 364, 20 L. ed. 434, 436, cited by appellants, the court draws a clear distinction between the character of the personal property in that case (rolling stock) which never became affixed to the freehold, and property of the character of that in the case at bar, and held that, if the property had been rails or other material which became affixed to and a part of the principal thing mortgaged, the existing mortgage on the real estate would have had priority of lien over any lien reserved for purchase money.

In Porter v. Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Co. 122 U. S. 282, 30 L. ed. 1211, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1206, where the contract between the bridge company and the railway company provided that the bridges erected by it should remain the property of the bridge company until they had been fully paid for, and that, in default of payment, the bridge company should have the right to remove the bridges and bridge material, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The bridges became a part of the permanent structure of the railroad, as much so as the rails laid upon the bridges or upon the railroad outside of the bridges. Whatever is the rule applicable to locomotives and cars, and loose property susceptible of separate ownership and of separate liens, and to real estate not used for railroad purposes, as to their being unaffected by a prior mortgage given by a railroad company, covering after-acquired property, it is well settled in the decisions of this court that rails and other articles which become affixed to and a part of a railroad covered by a prior mortgage will be held by the lien of such mortgage in favor of bona fide creditors as against any contract between the furnisher of the property and the railroad company, containing stipulations like those in the contracts in the present case. Dunham v. Cincinnati, C. & P. R. Co. 1 Wall. 254, 17 L. ed. 584; Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. 459, 480, 482, 20 L. ed. 199, 206, 207; United States v. New Orleans & O. R. Co. (New Orleans & O. R. Co. v. Mellen) 12 Wall. 362, 365, 20 L. ed. 434, 436; Dillon v. Barnard, 21 Wall. 430, 440, 22 L. ed. 673, 677; Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 251, 25 L. ed. 339, 342."

To the same effect, see Clary v. Owen, 15 Gray, 522; Hunt v. Bay State Iron Co. 97 Mass. 283; Thompson v. Vinton, 121 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Co.* 8 Idaho, 200, 56 L.R.A. 554, 101 Am. St. Rep. 188, 67 Pac. 493; Watertown Steam Engine Co. v. Davis, Houst. (Del.) 192. In Clary v. Owen, supra, what we have called the Massachusetts doctrine is thus tersely expressed: "We think it is not in the power of the mortgagor by any agreement made with a third person after the execution of the mortgage, to give to such person the right to hold anything to be attached to the freehold, which, as between mortgagor and mortgagee, would become a part of the realty."

In Hunt v. Bay State Iron Co. 97 Mass. 283, the court expressed the same view, saying: "Nor do we suppose that a mortgagor in possession is competent to bind existing mortgagees by any arrangement to treat as personalty annexations to the freehold. The legal character of the rails when once laid down is determined by the law to be that of real estate. Mortgagees as well as all other parties in interest are entitled to the benefit of this rule of law, which can be taken from them only by their own waiver."

In Meagher v. Hayes, 152 Mass. 228, 23 Am. St. Rep. 819, 25 N. E. 105, the same court held that a building put on mortgaged land, and annexed to it in the usual way, notwithstanding an agreement between the owner of the building and the mortgagor that it should remain personal property, with the right of the owner to remove it, became a part of the mortgage security, the mortgagee not being a party to such agreement, and that the purchaser of the land at foreclosure sale became the owner of such building, though he bought with notice of such agreement.

We think the rule as enunciated by all these cases is applicable to the case at bar, and that there was no error in the decree entered by the Circuit Court on the 27th day of January, 1910, overruling the exceptions of the appellants to the report of the special master, filed on the 29th day of September, 1909, and the same is accordingly affirmed, with costs.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

DEAN BLANCHARD, Resp., v.EUREKA PLANING MILL COMPANY and COLUMBIA RIVER DOOR COMPANY et al., Appts.

(58 Or. 37, 113 Pac. 55.)

Fixture — conditional sale — existing mortgage.

The agreement between a seller and purchaser of machinery to be affixed to the realty, that the title shall remain in the seller until the price is paid, is binding on the existing mortgagee of the realty, although the contract is not recorded so as to be effective against subsequent purchasers without notice.

(February 7, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendants Columbia River Door Company et al. from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Columbia County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin defendants from removing certain machinery claimed by plaintiff to be a fixture and subject to his real estate mortgage. Reversed.

Statement by Eakin, Ch. J.:

On November 7, 1906, the defendant Eureka Planing Mill Company executed and delivered to plaintiff, as security for the repayment of a $2,500 loan, with interest, a mortgage on the following described property: "Commencing at a point where a line running parallel with and along the north side of Water street, in the town of Rainier would intersect the east boundary line of a certain piece of tide land sold and deeded by Dean Blanchard to F. C. Winchester; thence running northerly along the east boundary line of said piece of tide land to the Columbia river; thence easterly up the Columbia river 60 feet; thence southerly parallel with said northerly line to a point on line with the north side of Water street; thence westerly 60 feet to the place of beginning." Thereafter, in a proceeding to foreclose the mortgage, the usual decree was rendered by the circuit court for Columbia county on July 7, 1908. For the purpose of satisfying the decree, the sheriff of such county duly advertised the premises for sale on August 15, 1908. On November 3, 1906, the defendant Columbia River Door Company entered into a contract in writing with the Eureka Planing Mill Company, by which the former delivered to the latter certain machinery to be used in connection with the planing mill and to be placed in a building situated upon the property described in the above mortgage, namely, two molders, a surfacer, matcher, and mortiser, together with heads, knives, bits, bolts, etc., for the consideration of $925, payable in instalments, for which promissory notes were executed. The contract contained the following clause: "Title to the property shall continue to vest in the first party until fully paid for as above provided. In case of default, the first party or its agents may enter upon the premises, and retake the property without process of law, sell the same and apply the proceeds on said notes as a credit thereon." On or about the 10th day of November, 1906, the personal property mentioned in the agreement was delivered to the Eureka Planing Mill Company, and placed in the building, and used therein in connection with the operation of the mill. After the decree of foreclosure, but prior to the sale of the property upon the decree, namely, about August 1, 1908, the defendant Columbia River Door Company entered upon the premises for the purpose of retaking all of the property mentioned in the contract, as therein provided, and removed the same from the building and placed it without the building, awaiting an opportunity to ship it. Defendant Tatum & Bowen, on December 14, 1906, entered into an agreement in writing with the Eureka Planing Mill Company, by which they were to deliver to the mill company one Hoyt planer and mortiser, and one set of matcher heads with ship lap attachments, in furtherance of the mill company's plan to equip the building to be used as a planing mill on the real estate above mentioned. Tatum & Bowen agreed to "deliver to the second party, subject hereto, and upon the full performance hereof, will sell and transfer to the second party, the following personal property: . . . This is to be located by the second party, and to remain until the full performance hereof, in Columbia county, state of Oregon, unless the first party's written consent to removal be first obtained. . . . Title to the property shall continue to vest in the first party until fully paid for, as above provided,"—the price being $870, payable in instalments. The machinery was established in such building. About August 1, 1908, Tatum & Bowen removed it from the building to the platform outside preparatory to shipping it to Portland. On August 10, 1908, plaintiff brought a suit against the Columbia River Door Company and also one against Tatum & Bowen, to enjoin them from removing the machinery from the premises, contending that it became a fixture and a part of the real estate covered by the mortgage. Defendants contend that by these contracts the property was intended to and did remain personal property, and the title thereto continued in the vendors, a portion of the purchase price thereof being still unpaid. For the purpose of the trial, the two suits were consolidated under the above title. Plaintiff, by his reply to the answer of the Columbia River Door Company, alleged that the money so loaned by him was to be used in purchasing machinery, among which was that in question here; that the same was to be placed in the mill and made a part thereof, so as to become subject to plaintiff's mortgage; and that he did not at any time have knowledge that the machinery had not been paid for in full, or that defendants claimed to have retained the title thereto. In his reply to the answer of Tatum & Bowen, he alleges that the building was on the premises at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and thereafter the machinery was placed in it, firmly fastened and affixed, namely, bolted, to the building, so as to become a part thereof, and that he had no knowledge of defendants' claim thereto. Upon the trial the lower court made findings in favor of plaintiff, and rendered a decree adjudging that the machinery became a fixture, subject to the mortgage, and enjoined its removal. The defendants Columbia River Door Company and Tatum & Bowen appeal.

Messrs. R. C. Wright and Coovert & Stapleton, for appellants:

Where title is retained until fully paid for, with power to remove on default, such property is impressed with the character of a chattel as between the parties, notwithstanding it is affixed to real property.

Helm v. Gilroy, 20 Or. 522, 26 Pac. 851; Landigan v. Mayer, 32 Or. 245, 67 Am. St. Rep. 521, 51 Pac. 649; Schneider v. Lee, 33 Or. 578, 17 Pac. 269; Henkle v. Dillon, 15 Or. 613, 17 Pac. 148.

A real estate mortgage does not take precedence over a subsequent conditional bill of sale of personal property that may be attached to said real estate subsequent to the mortgage, where, under the terms of the conditional bill of sale, title remained in the seller until fully paid for, with power of removal upon default of payment, even though the mortgagee was without knowledge that such transfer of the personality was conditional.

Mr. L. S. Thomas for respondent.

Ekain, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The rule that whatever is affixed to the soil becomes a part of the realty has been much relaxed in accordance with trade and modern business requirements. In many instances the personal quality of the chattel is retained, even though there is an appreciable annexation. Whether it shall remain a chattel after it is affixed to the realty depends upon three conditions, annexation, real or constructive, adaptability to the use or purpose of the realty to which it is attached, and the intention of the parties making the annexation to make it a permanent accession to the freehold.

2. As between the vendor and vendee of such personalty, it may, by agreement, be made to retain its personal character, even though affixed to the realty in a manner in which it cannot be removed without injury to the building. Therefore in this case, as between the defendant Eureka Planing Mill Company and defendants Columbia River Door Company and Tatum & Bowen, the title to the property remained in the vendors until full payment of the purchase price, according to the terms of this agreement. Helm v. Gilroy, 20 Or. 517, 26 Pac. 851; Muir v. Jones, 23 Or. 332, 79 L.R.A. 441, 31 Pac. 646; Arberson v. Elk Creek Min. Co. 39 Or. 552, 65 Pac. 978; Washburn v. In- ter-Mountain Min. Co. 56 Or. 578, 109 Pac. 382.

3. But when the chattel is affixed to the realty, the situation is changed as to the rights of a purchaser or an encumbrancer without notice of the terms of the agreement. The condition of the agreement, being unrecorded, is in the nature of a secret lien, which is contrary to the policy of the law, and where the machinery was sold for that purpose and was affixed, it became a fixture. This question is fully discussed and decided in the cases above cited. The query arises here as to plaintiff's rights under the facts disclosed. It appears from the pleadings that this machinery was installed in the building subsequent to the execution of the mortgage. Plaintiff therefore is not a subsequent purchaser for value, and cannot complain of the terms of the sale of the chattel by which the title is retained by the vendor. By the act of 1909 (Laws 1909, p. 237; L. O. L. § 7414), it is now necessary to file notice of sale, but is not applicable to this case.

This question was discussed in Alberson v. Elk Creek Min. Co. supra, where the lessee under a contract to purchase had placed fixtures upon the property of the lessor subject to a chattel mortgage. It was there contended that after forfeiture of the lessee's right to purchase, the fixtures became the property of the original owner of the mine, and the court say: "Now, going back to the election to purchase, when that was done, the property became a part of the freehold in the status it had then assumed, the owners paid nothing of value for it, and it is difficult to see how a forfeiture could give them the standing of a purchaser in good faith. We are satisfied that it could have no such effect." The rule in all such cases is that, to preclude the vendor from claiming the chattel under such an agreement, the owner of the realty must have been a purchaser thereof for value subsequent to the annexation of the fixture, and without notice that the vendor retained the title. Landigan v. Mayer, 32 Or. 245, 67 Am. St. Rep. 521, 51 Pac. 649, Union Bank & T. Co. v. Fred W. Wolf Co. 114 Tenn. 255, 108 Am. St. Rep. 903, 86 S. W. 310, to which case there is an exhaustive note in 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1073, where the rule is stated: "That, in the absence of notice, a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the land is not bound by an agreement between the owner of the land and one from whom he purchases chattels, that such chattels, though annexed to the realty, shall retain their character as personalty, and that the title to them shall remain in the seller until he has been paid for them." In Bos-

Safe-Deposit & T. Co. v. Bankers' & M. Teleg. Co. (C. C.) 36 Fed. 297, referring to telegraph wires stretched upon poles on the railroad right of way, which was subject to mortgage, it is said: "With respect to this class of property, the parties in interest may agree that it shall remain personalty, subject to be removed; and such an agreement determines the real character as against an existing mortgage." To the same effect are Brand v. McMahon, 38 N. Y. S. R. 576, 15 N. Y. Supp. 39; Padgett v. Cleveland, 33 S. C. 339, 11 S. E. 1069; Tift v. Horton, 53 N. Y. 377, 13 Am. Rep. 537.

In this case plaintiff is not a purchaser for value, or mortgagee of the property subsequent to the annexation of the fixtures, and the title of the defendants thereto is unaffected by the mortgage.

The decree of the lower court will be reversed, and the suit dismissed.

McBride, J., took no part in the decision of this case.

MISSOURI PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(86 Neb. 642, 126 N. W. 289.)

Railroad — pedestrian at crossing — duty to look at most advantageous point.

1. It is the duty of a pedestrian upon a highway, in approaching a railway crossing, to look and listen for moving trains before attempting to cross the railway; but if he does so, he is not necessarily negligent because he did not look at the most advantageous point, and where, if he had taken heed, he probably would have seen an oncoming train, and avoided injury.

I. Care required in selecting place for observation.

While ordinary care is all that is required in the selection of the time and place for making observations before going upon a railroad crossing (Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Rosborough, 40 Ind. App. 14, 80 N. E. 869; Grand Trunk Western R. Co. v. Reynolds, — Ind. App. —, 90 N. E. 94; Defrieze v. Illinois C. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 94 N. W. 505; Moberly v. Kansas City, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 98 Mo. 183, 11 S. W. 569; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Younger, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 40 S. W. 423), the place selected must be such that the observation will be reasonably effective (Fitzhugh v. Boston & M. R. Co. 195 Mass. 202, 80 N. E. 792; McCanna v. New England R. Co. 20 R. I. 439, 39 Atl. 891; Washington Southern R. Co. v. Lacey, 94 Va. 460, 26 S. E. 834; Stokes v. Southern R. Co. 104 Va. 817, 52 S. E. 855; Bates v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. — Utah, —, 114 Pac. 527).

Thus, in Wojochoski v. Central R. Co. 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 469, it was held to be negligence for a driver after stopping at a place where he could not see, to pass without looking a point with which he was familiar, where he could have seen.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Jenkins, 79 Kan. 17, 98 Pac. 208, where plaintiff stood in the rear of his wagon, where he could not see the train until his horses were on the track, when by standing in the front of the wagon he could have seen it in time, it was held that he assumed the additional duty of stopping to look, and was negligent in failing to do so.

In Turner v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 74 Mo. 602, a traveler was held to be guilty of contributory negligence where the only place he looked was 20 yards from the track, where there was an obstruction, there being plenty of opportunity for seeing the train before that.

And it was held to be negligence as matter of law for a driver, after looking from a point where he could see but 300 feet of the track, to hurry his team across without again looking, when he could have taken a position giving him a view for half a mile. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Booth, 53 Ill. App. 303.

But whether plaintiff, who stopped and listened 79 feet from the track, where the view was obstructed, was negligent in not looking through an opening in the trees 199 feet from the track, was held in Nash v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 23 N. Y. Week. Dig. 572, 1 N. Y. Supp. 269, to be a question for the jury.

And ordinarily it is for the jury to de-

Messrs. McCoy & Olmsted, for appellee:

It is not negligence per se, for a traveler to fail to look and listen, but such fact is some evidence, like other evidence, to go to the jury, to enable it to determine, in terminate whether the traveler selected a proper place for making observation, and otherwise exercised ordinary care for his own safety, in approaching a crossing. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Pollock, 195 Ill. 156, 62 N. E. 831, affirmed in 93 Ill. App. 483; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Anthony, 12 Ind. App. 126, 38 N. E. 831; Nosler v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 268, 34 N. W. 850; Case v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 147 Iowa, 747, 126 N. W. 1037; Greany v. Long Island R. Co. 101 N. Y. 419, 5 N. E. 425; Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Parker, 29 Ohio C. C. 1; McNeal v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. 131 Pa. 184, 18 Atl. 1020; Bare v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 135 Pa. 95, 19 Atl. 835; Ellis v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 138 Pa. 506, 21 Am. St. Rep. 914, 21 Atl. 140; Urias v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 152 Pa. 326, 25 Atl. 566; McGill v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. 152 Pa. 331, 25 Atl. 540; Whitman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 156 Pa. 175, 27 Atl. 240; Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. v. Huff, 6 Sadler (Pa.) 60, 8 Atl. 789; Lehigh & W. Coal Co. v. Lear, 6 Sadler (Pa.) 272, 9 Atl. 267.

II. Distance.

It is not ordinarily possible to affirm the precise number of feet from the crossing at which a traveler must look and listen, the best being ordinary care in selecting the place. Antonian v. Southern P. Co. 9 Cal. App. 718, 100 Pac. 877; Malott v. Hawkins, 159 Ind. 127, 63 N. E. 308; Chicago, L. & L. R. Co. v. Turner, 33 Ind. App. 264, 69 N. E. 484.

Thus, it was held not to be negligence per se, where plaintiff stopped, looked, and listened at a point from 4 to 6 rods from the track, and then drove on, looking from right to left, although he might have been able to see the train had he stopped at a nearer point. Renwick v. New York C. & R. Co. 36 N. Y. 132.

In Lynch v. Northern P. R. Co. 16 C. C. A. 151, 29 U. S. App. 664, 69 Fed. 86, affirmed without opinion in 176 U. S. 701, 43 L. ed. 1185, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 878, where plaintiff looked when 36 feet from the track, 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

it was held to be for the jury to say if he was negligent in not looking sooner, there being a good view at any point within 200 feet of the track.

In Sprague v. Northern P. R. Co. 40 Mont. 481, 107 Pac. 412, it was held to be for the jury to determine whether plaintiff was negligent, where he stopped and listened from 100 to 300 feet from the crossing, there being an obstruction of view till within 10 or 20 feet from the track, and made every effort to avoid the train as soon as it could be discovered.

But the fact that one does not look for trains at the instant of stepping on the track is held not conclusive of a want of due care, in Plummer v. Eastern R. Co. 73 Me. 591.

In Burns v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 136 Ala. 522, 33 So. 891, it was held to be negligence for a pedestrian to stop so near the track, after passing obstructing cars, that he was struck by the pilot beam of an engine before having time to look in both directions.

However, the traveler must bear in mind that trains move much faster than horses, and not rest content with an observation made at a considerable distance from the crossing. Day v. Boston & M. R. Co. 96 Me. 207, 90 Am. St. Rep. 335, 52 Atl. 771.

Thus, in New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kistler, 66 Ohio St. 326, 64 N. E. 130, the court says: "The looking should usually be just before going upon the crossing, or so near as to enable the person to get across in safety at the speed he is going before a train within the range of his view of the track, going at the usual speed of fast trains, would reach the crossing. There should be such looking before going upon the track, even though there was a looking farther away when no train was seen approaching."

And in some cases it is held to be contributory negligence to look only at so great a distance that a train could cover the track observable before the traveler could cross. Central R. Co. v. Foshee, 125 Ala. 212, 27 So. 1006; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Calvert,

Nilson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 84 Neb. 594, 121 N. W. 1128; Henry v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 236 Ill. 219, 86 N. E. 231; Winn v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 239 Ill. 132, 87 N. E. 954.

A traveler is not obliged to be constantly looking and listening up to the moment of crossing, as that would require the traveler to assume that the company might be negligent, and require him to look out for and avoid the company's possible negligence, and would exact of the traveler more than reasonable or ordinary care, and in fact make him an insurer of his own safety.

Campbell v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 108

— Ala. —, 55 So. 812; Winter v. New York & L. B. R. Co. 66 N. J. L. 677, 50 Atl. 339.

III. Looking at the customary place.

A traveler cannot be declared negligent as matter of law in the selection of a place to look for trains at crossings, where the place selected is the one customarily used by the public for that purpose, as such use is an indication that it is a place which would be selected by a person of ordinary care. Cookson v. Pittsburg & W. R. Co. 179 Pa. 184, 36 Atl. 194; Muckinhaupt v. Erie R. Co. 196 Pa. 213, 46 Atl. 364; Newman v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 203 Pa. 530, 53 Atl. 546; Messinger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 215 Pa. 497, 114 Am. St. Rep. 970, 64 Atl. 682; Calhoun v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 223 Pa. 298, 72 Atl. 556; Toban v. Lehigh & W. Coal Co. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 475; Fry v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 147; Erie R. Co. v. Hanna, 103 C. C. A. 227, 179 Fed. 669; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Coppock, 103 C. C. A. 86, 179 Fed. 682, affirming 174 Fed. 264.

IV. At a place dangerous in itself.

It is not a traveler's duty to stop, look, and listen at a point so near the track as to be dangerous in itself. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Steele, 29 C. C. A. 81, 54 U. S. App. 550, 84 Fed. 93; Cookson v. Pittsburg & W. R. Co. 179 Pa. 184, 36 Atl. 194.

Thus, in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hitt, 76 Ark. 227, 88 S. W. 908, 990, it was held that it was not negligence as matter of law for a traveler to fail to look and listen after passing an obstruction, where the team would be on the track before the driver passed the obstruction sufficiently for him to see the train.

And, conversely, it was held in Killian v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 86 Mo. App. 473, where plaintiff drove out on the first track, and then stopped to look and listen for trains, when he was injured by his horse becoming frightened by an engine run in front of it without signals, that he was 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Minn. 104, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 346, 133 Am. St. Rep. 417, 121 N. W. 429; Bonnell v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 39 N. J. L. 189.

The law does not fix any specific point or place from which the traveler must look. Elliott, Railroads, § 1166 (a).

Looking negatives the idea of negligence, and it is therefore for the jury to determine whether the looking was from a reasonable distance and place.

Calhoun v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 223 Pa. 298, 72 Atl. 556; Antonian v. Southern P. R. Co. 9 Cal. App. 718, 100 Pac. 877.

Where the plaintiff, when within a reasonable distance from the track, and having a view for a reasonable distance both ways of the track, both looks and listens for a train, but, because of a curve in the negligent in not stopping and listening before going upon the first track.

V. Duty to look more than once.

a. In general.

It may be stated as a general rule that the duty to look before crossing a railway track is not discharged by looking only once, but that it is a continuing duty. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Calvert, — Ala. —, 55 So. 812; Moberly v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 98 Mo. 183, 11 S. W. 569; Kelsay v. Missouri P. R. Co. 129 Mo. 362, 30 S. W. 339; Gangawer v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 168 Pa. 265, 32 Atl. 21; Muckinhaupt v. Erie R. Co. 196 Pa. 213, 46 Atl. 364; Walsh v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 222 Pa. 162, 70 Atl. 1088; Southern R. Co. v. Jones, 106 Va. 412, 56 S. E. 155; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Hall, 109 Va. 296, 63 S. E. 1007.

And this duty must be observed until danger is past (St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Crabtree, 69 Ark. 134, 62 S. W. 64; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 74 Ark. 372, 86 S. W. 282; Griffie v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 80 Ark. 186, 96 S. W. 750; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Batsel, — Ark. —, 140 S. W. 726), unless there are exculpatory circumstances (St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hitt, 76 Ark. 224, 88 S. W. 911; Stevens v. Missouri P. R. Co. 67 Mo. App. 356).

But in Defrieze v. Illinois C. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 94 N. W. 505, it is held that a traveler on the highway is not required to keep a constant lookout for trains.

In Winey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 92 Iowa, 622, 61 N. W. 218, an instruction that it is his duty to look and listen at all points in his passage is held to be erroneous and ground for reversal.

And in Kain v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 20 N. Y. S. R. 891, 3 N. Y. Supp. 311, it was held that the court could not say as matter of law that a driver was negligent in failing to see a train which could have been seen at 200 feet until it was within 100 feet, it requiring but three seconds for it to travel the intervening distance.

track or other obstructions, neither sees nor hears one, the train being out of sight and hearing, and, believing and judging it safe to go on across the track, proceeds to do so, still listening, but using his eyes in walking to keep from stumbling or falling, and the train suddenly at high and unlawful speed comes around the curve or from behind the obstructions, unknown to him, and, without blowing the whistle or ringing the bell or checking its speed, approaches the crossing and runs him down, the question of contributory negligence is for the jury.

In the following cases it was held to be contributory negligence to fail to look again where the only observation made by the traveler was at a point:

—about 12 feet from the track, after which he gave his attention to a switch engine for a minute or two. Pyle v. Clark, 75 Fed. 644, affirmed in 25 C. C. A. 190, 49 U. S. App. 260, 79 Fed. 744;

—where the view was partially obstructed, plaintiff being on foot and there being an unobstructed view 7 feet from the track. Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. Smith, 73 C. C. A. 164, 141 Fed. 930;

—15 feet from the track, after which he walked diagonally across it. Horan v. Boston & M. R. Co. 106 C. C. A. 105, 183 Fed. 559;

—125 paces from the track, where observation just before going on the track would have been effective. Central R. Co. v. Barnett, 151 Ala. 407, 44 So. 392;

—30 feet from the track, where he had a view for 800 feet, he being on foot. Green v. Los Angeles Terminal R. Co. 143 Cal. 31, 101 Am. St. Rep. 68, 76 Pac. 724, reversing on rehearing, — Cal. —, 69 Pac. 694;

—100 feet from the crossing, the view along the track increasing as he approached it, although he relied on the absence of the flagman as an indication of safety. Smith v. Wabash R. Co. 141 Ind. 92, 40 N. E. 270;

—before passing an intervening obstruction on foot. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lynn, 171 Ind. 589, 85 N. E. 999, 86 N. E. 1017;

—270 feet and again at 60 feet from the track, where the view was obstructed, when at 25 feet a view of the track for 700 feet could have been had. Aurelius v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 19 Ind. App. 584, 49 N. E. 857;

—200 feet from the track. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 33 Ind. App. 219, 71 N. E. 250;

—300 feet from the track, where the view was obstructed, and a good view could have been obtained at 80 feet. Schaefer v. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—111 feet from the track, when, by looking at any point within 100 feet of the track, she could have seen the train. Atchison, T. & S. R. Co. v. Holland, 60 Kan. 209, 56 Pac. 6; —35 feet from the track, where he had a view of 465 feet, though his view thereafter was not obstructed for 500 to 1,000 feet. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Wheelbarger, 75 Kan. 811, 88 Pac. 531; —about 130 feet from the crossing, where he could see but 250 feet of the track, and after the regular car passed he drove on without again looking, and was struck by an extra car. Hatcher v. McDermott, 103 Md. 78, 63 Atl. 214;

—100 feet from the track, after which she drove past an obstruction without again looking, though an opportunity was afforded 20 feet from the track. Shufelt v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 96 Mich. 327, 55 N. W. 1013;

—50 to 100 feet from the crossing, except such as was made by a companion through the small glass in the back of the buggy top from which he could see but a few rods of the track. Proper v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 136 Mich. 352, 99 N. W. 283;

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for personal injuries caused by the defendant's alleged negligence. The plaintiff prevailed, and the defendant appeals.

1. The defendant introduced no evidence, but insists that the testimony conclusively establishes plaintiff's contributory negligence. The plaintiff was injured by one of the defendant's locomotives at the intersection of its railway and Thirtieth street in a sparsely settled neighborhood in the outskirts of the city of Omaha. The street upon which the accident occurred is paved, runs north and south, and is frequently used by the public. The railway approaches the street on a curve from the southwest, and is about 18 inches above the surface of the street at said intersection. South of the track, and west of the street, earth has been taken from the defendant's right of way to construct an embankment, so that the railway grade is elevated from 6 to 10 feet above the bottom of the borrow pits a short distance west of the street, and thence southwest several hundred feet. At the time the plaintiff was injured, August 14, 1905, there were weeds from 6 to 9 feet in height in the borrow pits, and smaller weeds upon the sides of the fill

a. In general.

Where obstructions prevented a view of the track by a traveler until near the track, it was held to be negligence for him to fail to look after passing them, under the following circumstances:

—where there was a space of 50 feet between the cars obstructing the view and the track on which a driver was struck. Hines v. Texas & P. R. Co. 55 C. C. A. 654, 119 Fed. 157;

—when a good view was afforded 20 to 25 feet from the track. Colorado & S. R. Co. v. Thomas, 33 Colo. 517, 70 L.R.A. 681, 81 Pac. 801, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 700;

—where the obstruction was 17 feet from the track. Haines v. Illinois C. R. Co. 41 Iowa, 227; —where a pedestrian went upon the track after looking at an obstructed point, without looking after passing the obstruction. Hinken v. Iowa C. R. Co. 97 Iowa, 603, 66 N. W. 882;

—where a view of the track was obstructed for a considerable distance. Beech v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 85 Kan. 90, 116 Pac. 213;

—though he had stopped to look and listen at a point where the view was obstructed, when a sufficient view was obtainable nearer the track. Brehm v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. 114 Md. 302, 79 Atl. 592;

—though he could have seen the train at a point 40 feet from the track. Lundergan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 203 Mass. 460, 89 N. E. 625;

—where the obstruction was 6 feet from the track, he being on foot. Clark v. Northern P. R. Co. 47 Minn. 380, 50 N. W. 365; Daily v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 106 N. C. 301, 11 S. E. 320;

—where the obstruction was 22 feet from the track, and plaintiff was driving a team that would stand beside trains without fright. Weyl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 40 Minn. 350, 42 N. W. 24; 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

—where deceased could have seen the train after passing obstructions in time to avoid it. Hayden v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 124 Mo. 566, 28 S. W. 74;

—where the obstructions were 8 feet from the track, plaintiff being on foot. Rodrian v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 526, 26 N. E. 741;

—where the obstruction was 60 feet from the track. Conkling v. Erie R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 338, 43 Atl. 666;

—where a pedestrian passed between cars obstructing his view of the next track. Kippleman v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 190 Pa. 333, 42 Atl. 697.

And in Boston & M. R. Co. v. McGrath, 102 C. C. A. 507, 179 Fed. 323, it is held that the presence of a freight car on a side track, obstructing the view of a pedestrian, is an admonition to him of the necessity for looking after passing it, rather than an excuse for failure to do so.

However, the circumstances may be such that failure to look after passing obstructions will not be held to be negligence as matter of law, and the question of contributory negligence where the traveler failed so to look was left to the jury in the following cases:

—White v. Southern P. Co. 122 Cal. 305, 54 Pac. 956, where plaintiff failed to look and listen after passing obstructing cars on one side of the track, another driver having crossed from the other way just before him;

—Mackay v. New York C. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 75, where plaintiff's view was obstructed till the horses were on the track, and he drove carefully to that point, and then did all he could to avoid the collision;

—Meddaugh v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 67 N. Y. S. R. 540, 33 N. Y. Supp. 793, affirmed in 153 N. Y. 659, 47 N. E. 1105, where intestate was sitting on the rear end of his wagon, and drove onto the crossing, where obstructions prevented him from seeing the train until the horses were on the track;

—Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 105 Mo. 270, 15 S. W. 983, 16 S. W. 837, where plaintiff stopped twice within 120 feet, and to within 4 feet of the railway, but this vegetation could in no manner obscure a pedestrian's view of a train approaching from the southwest. There are trees within the defendant's right of way west of the highway, so that 50 feet south of the railway an oncoming train may be seen a distance of only 200 feet southwest of the crossing; 36 feet south of the south rail a train is visible 400 feet distant, and 7 feet south of the track a train may be noticed 575 feet to the southwest. The railway grade is about 1 per cent, and declines towards the east and northeast. On the west side of the street a wooden sidewalk 82 feet in length extends to within 16 feet of defendant's main line, and the intervening footway is a cinder walk. At the time the plaintiff was injured she weighed 218 pounds, enjoyed good eyesight and hearing, and was in no manner distracted or confused. The train with which she collided consisted of a locomotive and from seven to fourteen freight cars. It was coasting downgrade at an estimated speed of from 35 to 50 miles an hour, and no warning by way of sounding a whistle, ringing a bell, or otherwise, was given of its approach.

The sixth instruction given by the court on its own motion reflects the testimony concerning plaintiff's conduct, and will advise the reader concerning the law of the case upon this phase of the suit: "You are instructed that the plaintiff has alleged in her petition, and has given evidence tending to show, that on the morning of the listened, the view being obstructed till within a few feet of the track;

—Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Oslin, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 370, 63 S. W. 1039, where pedestrians looked and listened near the track, but either failed to look after their view was unobstructed, or looked only so far as a train running at a proper speed would be likely to reach the crossing before they could pass.

In the following cases, it was held to be negligence for a traveler after waiting for a train to pass on the near track, to start across behind it without waiting until it had passed far enough to enable him to see a train approaching from the opposite direction on another track. Stowell v. Erie R. Co. 39 C. C. A. 145, 98 Fed. 520; Delaware & H. Co. v. Flannely, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 97 C. C. A. 112, 172 Fed. 328; Fletcher v. Fitchburg R. Co. 149 Mass. 127, 3 L.R.A. 743, 21 N. E. 302; Marty v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 38 Minn. 108, 35 N. W. 670; Purdy v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 Hun, 97, 33 N. Y. Supp. 952; Hamm v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 18 Jones & S. 78; Morrow v. North Carolina R. Co. 146 N. C. 14, 59 S. E. 158; Kraus v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 139 Pa. 272, 20 Atl. 993; Hughes v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 176 Pa. 254, 35 Atl. 190.

Or for him to go behind a passing train without looking for danger on another track. Gumm v. Kansas City Belt R. Co. 141 Mo. App. 306, 125 S. W. 796; Daniels v. Staten Island Rapid Transit Co. 125 N. Y. 407, 26 N. E. 466.

Such action is not ordinary care, especially where trains were to be expected at any moment. Benson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 41 Ill. App. 227.

And it was held to be negligence as matter of law for a bicyclist to circle to avoid getting off, and then start across immediately behind the passing train, there being a space of 7 feet in which he could have seen the coming train, in Robertson v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 180 Pa. 43, 57 Am. St. Rep. 620, 36 Atl. 403.

But it is not necessary to wait long enough for the passing train to get far enough so that it no longer obstructs the view. Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 72 Vt. 89, 47 Atl. 409.

And under the following circumstances, the question of contributory negligence was held to be for the jury:

—where a pedestrian, after looking along the track 1,300 feet, waited for a train to pass on the far track, and, after looking along the near track, which he could see for only 100 feet because of the passing train being on a sharp curve, started to cross, when he was struck by a train coming from that direction at an unlawful speed. Farrell v. Erie R. Co. 70 C. C. A. 396, 138 Fed. 28;

—where plaintiff started across a side track behind a train which had just passed on the main track, without looking along the side track. Bryson v. Southern R. Co. 3 Ga. App. 407, 59 S. E. 1124; —where a pedestrian passed behind a train, and was struck by one coming from the opposite direction at an unlawful speed. Wabash R. Co. v. Smith, 162 Ill. 583, 44 N. E. 856;

—where plaintiff looked along the tracks, where he could see 1,200 feet, as he was waiting for a train to pass on a nearer track, and then crossed behind it and was struck by a train backing from the opposite direction. Newbacher v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 134 Ind. 25, 33 N. E. 798;

—where plaintiff waited till the train had passed 266 feet from the crossing. Puff v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 71 Hun, 577, 24 N. Y. Supp. 1068;

—where deceased started to drive across, it not appearing definitely how far the train had passed, and there being no flagman in view, though there had been one there previously when deceased had crossed. Wilbur v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 85 Hun, 155, 32 N. Y. Supp. 479;

—where plaintiff waited and looked till she could see about 300 feet along the farther track, she being delayed by tripping and falling on the track. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Carr, 99 Pa. 505; accident in question, and just prior to its occurrence, she was walking north on the sidewalk on the west side of Thirtieth street, proceeding in the direction of the railway in question; that at a point on said sidewalk from 35 to 37 feet south of the center of defendant's track on said crossing, she looked and listened for approaching trains on defendant's road, but neither saw nor heard any. You are likewise instructed that the undisputed evidence, as well as the admissions of counsel for both parties in open court, establishes conclusively the following facts: (a) That at the point last above stated, where plaintiff claims she looked and listened for approaching trains, the same being from 35 to 37 feet south of the center of defendant's track, plaintiff had a clear, unobstructed view of defendant's track to the southwestward for a distance of 400 feet. (b) That the clear, unobstructed view of defendant's track in the direction named increased in proportion as the plaintiff proceeded northward, and that at a point 3 or 4 feet south of defendant's track, as it entered upon said crossing, there was a clear and unobstructed view of defendant's track to the southwestward 600 feet. (c) That plaintiff did not look again for approaching trains after the occasion above referred to (at a point from 35 to 37 feet south of defendant's track), but proceeded north, until she had stepped upon, or was about to step upon, defendant's track at said crossing, when she collided with, or was —where the driver permitted the train to pass 240 feet or more before starting to cross. Wolfe v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 335; —where pedestrians started across after a freight train cleared the track, and were struck by an engine backing without lights or signals. Iron Mountain R. Co. v. Dies, 98 Tenn. 655, 41 S. W. 860.

c. By smoke from another train.

It is negligence per se to attempt to cross tracks hidden by the smoke from a passing train, without waiting for a clear view. Heaney v. Long Island R. Co. 112 N. Y. 122, 19 N. E. 422; West Jersey R. Co. v. Ewan, 55 N. J. L. 574, 27 Atl. 1064; Lortz v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 83 Hun, 271, 31 N. Y. Supp. 1033; Hovenden v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 180 Pa. 244, 36 Atl. 731.

But where under similar circumstances there was a conflict in the evidence as to the extent to which the view was actually obstructed by the smoke, the question of contributory negligence was held to be for the jury. McNamara v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 136 N. Y. 650, 32 N. E. 765.

d. Duty to go ahead of team to look.

The Pennsylvania courts have promulgated a rule that if the view of the track is obstructed, a traveler should get down from his vehicle and go forward to a point where he can see. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Beale, 73 Pa. 504, 13 Am. Rep. 753; Central R. Co. v. Feller, 84 Pa. 226; Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Brandtmaier, 113 Pa. 610, 6 Atl. 238; Kinter v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 204 Pa. 497, 93 Am. St. Rep. 795, 54 Atl. 276; Manekewicz v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 214 Pa. 386, 63 Atl. 604; Bistider v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 224 Pa. 615, 73 Atl. 940; Keller v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 488.

This rule, however, does not meet with much favor outside of Pennsylvania, it being generally held that no such duty is imposed upon the traveler. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Lee, 92 Ala. 262, 9 So. 230; Louis-37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ville & N. R. Co. v. Bryant, 141 Ala. 292, 37 So. 370; Vance v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 9 Cal. App. 20, 98 Pac. 41; Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Turner, 33 Ind. App. 264, 69 N. E. 484; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Wright, 80 Ind. 236; Kelly v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 88 Mo. 534; Huckshold v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 90 Mo. 548, 2 S. W. 794; Hinkle v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 109 N. C. 472, 26 Am. St. Rep. 581, 13 S. E. 884. Such precaution being extraordinary care, which is not required. Kelly v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 29 Minn. 1, 11 N. W. 67; Davis v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 47 N. Y. 400; Duffy v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 32 Wis. 269.

Even in Pennsylvania the rule is enforced only when a view could not be had in any other way. Ellis v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 138 Pa. 506, 21 Am. St. Rep. 914, 21 Atl. 140.

And so where plaintiff had a view of the track for a short distance at least, the question whether he should have gone ahead was held to be for the jury, in Newton v. Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 18.

And it was also left to the jury where a driver stopped at the usual and ordinary place for observation by persons using the highway, the court saying: "To hold that in every instance and without exception a traveler must leave his team standing, however unprotected, on the highway, and walk ahead of it to look along the track before entering upon it, would be more likely to produce accidents in many instances than to prevent them." Tressler v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 224.

And in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Ackerman, 74 Pa. 265, it was held that the duty to go ahead of the horses did not apply where such a position would in itself have been dangerous, and probably would have resulted in the death of plaintiff as well as his horses.

Some cases in other states than Pennsylvania recognize that the circumstances may be such that ordinary prudence would require a traveler to go ahead of his team to struck by, defendant's engine attached to a freight train coming from the south-westward, and was injured. And it is now for you to say, under these admitted facts and all the other evidence in the case and these instructions, whether or not plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as the same has been above defined to you. To aid you in determining this question, you are also at liberty to take into consideration the situation of the crossing, the general surroundings and conditions in the immediate vicinity of the same and south-westward along and adjacent to defendant's track, as disclosed by the evidence, the manner in and the speed with which the trains of defendant were accustomed to being run or operated at and near that point, if such appears from the evidence, and all other attendant facts and circumstances bearing on the question, as shown by the evidence, including, in your consideration, the knowledge or lack of knowledge of said plaintiff as to these matters. And in this connection you are further instructed that, on the one hand, plaintiff was bound to know that a railroad crossing is a dangerous place, and that she should approach it accordingly, having in view such dangers as a person of ordinary prudence would have reason to apprehend; and that, on the other hand, she was not required to anticipate, in view of the public character of the crossing in question, that an approaching train of the defendant would proceed at an unusual or look for trains, but that whether the conditions demand this precaution is a question for the jury. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Barker, 23 C. C. A. 473, 40 U. S. App. 739, 77 Fed. 810, affirmed without opinion in 172 U. S. 643, 43 L. ed. 1181, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 879; Chicago & B. Q. R. Co. v. Reith, 65 Ill. App. 461; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Terrell, — Ind. —, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 95 N. E. 1109; Dolan v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 71 N. Y. 285; Kelsey v. Staten Island Rapid Transit R. Co. 78 Hun, 208, 28 N. Y. Supp. 974; Bennett v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 7 Ont. App. Rep. 470.

Thus, it may be his duty to go ahead where he could neither see nor hear an approaching train. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Thomas, 155 Ind. 634, 58 N. E. 1040; Lang v. Missouri P. R. Co. 115 Mo. App. 489, 21 S. W. 1012.

But mere inability to hear the ordinary noises of a train is not sufficient to require such precaution, if signals are required or ordinarily given at that place, and could have been heard if given. Alexander v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 112 N. C. 720, 16 S. E. 896; Mitchell v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 122 Mo. App. 50, 97 S. W. 552; Elliott v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 105 Mo. App. 523, 80 S. W. 270; Guggenheim v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 150, 33 N. W. 161.

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Farra, 13 C. C. A. 602, 31 U. S. App. 306, 66 Fed. 496, it is held that while there may be circumstances requiring a driver to go ahead of the team to look, to constitute ordinary care, it was not negligence for plaintiff to fail to do so where the view was obstructed for 400 feet, and she drove carefully, listening for trains, and knew that none were due at that time, and she was encumbered with a sleeping baby and another small child.

In Brehm v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. 114 Md. 302, 79 Atl. 592, where the view at a dangerous crossing was obstructed, the court says that a prudent driver might have suggested that one of those with him get out and look up and down the track, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.)

but does not decide that failure to do so was contributory negligence.

And in Hook v. Missouri P. R. Co. 162 Mo. 569, 63 S. W. 360, the court was divided as to whether the traveler should have left his wagon and gone ahead to look at a crossing where obstructions prevented a view from the seat, before reaching a dangerous position.

VII. When looking would have been useless.

A traveler is not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to look for trains when to look would be useless:

—as where obstructions prevented seeing the train till it was too late. Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Crawford, 24 Ohio St. 631, 15 Am. Rep. 633; Vance v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 9 Cal. App. 20, 98 Pac. 41; Allen v. Boston & M. R. Co. 197 Mass. 298, 83 N. E. 863 (dictum); McGuire v. Hudson River R. Co. 2 Daly, 76; Cranston v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 39 Hun, 308; Leonard v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 10 Jones & S. 225; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Burge, 84 Va. 63, 4 S. E. 21;

—or where the engine striking deceased was being run without lights on a dark night, at a place where it could not be heard. Smedis v. Brooklyn & R. B. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 13;

—or where the engine was backing without light or signal on a dark foggy morning. Pruey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 41 App. Div. 158, 58 N. Y. Supp. 797, affirmed without opinion in 166 N. Y. 616, 59 N. E. 1129;

—or where an engine was backed at night without lights a short distance behind another train going in the same direction on the same track. Fejdowski v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 168 N. Y. 500, 61 N. E. 888;

—or where the train causing the injury was running 60 miles an hour, and came from behind a freight train which prevented its being seen;

—or where it appeared that the train was not within view when plaintiff was at dangerous rate of speed at that point, and that it would not give such warning of its approach by sounding of whistle or ringing of bell as the law required. Having, then, in view of the foregoing conditions and the evidence, probably a fair test to the solution of the point in question is: Estimating the distance at which the track seemed to be clear when plaintiff claimed to have observed the same as above stated, the time it would take a train to travel that distance, proceeding at a reasonable rate of speed, considering the nature of the locality, and the time it would require the plaintiff to cross the track in safety, proceeding northward from the point from which she observed defendant's track as above stated, would a person of ordinary care and prudence, under the same circumstances, have considered it safe to cross, without again looking for approaching trains? In other words, was her act in this respect, in view of all of the conditions, facts, and circumstances in the case, as shown by the evidence, such as ordinarily would have been taken by a prudent person? If it was, then it might fairly be said that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence; but if you should find, from a preponderance of the evidence, that it was not, and that such act directly contributed to the accident in question, then it might fairly be said that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and, in that event, she cannot recover in this action."

the point where it was claimed he should have looked. Hendrickson v. Great Northern R. Co. 52 Minn. 340, 54 N. W. 189.

VIII. Direction for looking.

a. In general.

A large number of cases lay down the general rule, or make a general statement, to the effect that a traveler approaching a railroad crossing is bound to look both ways, or "up and down the track," or "every direction in which the tracks run," examples of which are: St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Crabtree, 69 Ark. 134, 62 S. W. 64; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Goddard, 72 Ill. 567; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Harrington, 131 Ind. 426, 30 N. E. 37; Thornton v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 131 Ind. 492, 31 N. E. 185; Guta v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 81 Mich. 291, 45 N. W. 821; Gorton v. Erie R. Co. 45 N. Y. 660; Haight v. New York C. R. Co. 7 Lans. 11; Kunz v. Oregon R. & N. Co. 51 Or. 191, 93 Pac. 141, 94 Pac. 504. No attempt, however, has been made to include all such cases, for the reason that such statements are mere variants of the general rule that it is the duty of a traveler on a highway to look for trains upon approaching a railway crossing. For other cases of this nature, see 33 Cyc. 1009.

There are cases, however, where because of circumstances, such as facts which it is contended excuse the failure to look in one direction, the question of direction for looking becomes important.

Thus, in Duane v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 72 Wis. 523, 7 Am. St. Rep. 879, 40 N. W. 394, it was held that a driver was not guilty of contributory negligence where he drove onto the track after a train had just passed on the main track, without looking in that direction, and was struck by it as it was reversed and run back over the crossing.

In Weber v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 451, it was held not to be negligence as matter of law for plaintiff to fail to look up in the sky, over cars obstructing his view, and see a lantern in the hands of a man standing upon the approaching train.

In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Patchen, 167 Ill. 204, 613, 47 N. E. 368, 48 N. E. 828, where deceased drove onto the track with a high load of lumber, while walking beside it, so it cut off his view one way, the question of contributory negligence was held to be for the jury.

But in Schwartz v. Mineral Range R. Co. 153 Mich. 40, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1253, 116 N. W. 540, under almost identical facts, the traveler was held to have been guilty of contributory negligence.

In Stackus v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 7 Hun, 559, plaintiff was held to be guilty of contributory negligence where, after looking both ways 20 rods from the crossing, where he could see only 50 rods to the east, he drove onto the track looking only west thereafter.

And in Mann v. Belt R. & Stock Yard Co. 128 Ind. 138, 26 N. E. 819, the same conclusion was reached where plaintiff, who was struck by a train from the east, looked east when 250 feet away, and thereafter looked only west, where there were some obstructions, there being a clear view of the east track for half a mile at a point 100 feet from the crossing.

But where obstructions prevent a view until close to the track, the mere fact that the traveler looks in one direction first, and it is too late to avoid injury when he turns to look the other way, when by looking the other way first he would have avoided the injury, is not sufficient to charge him with contributory negligence, as the direction in which he should look first, and the frequency with which he should change the direction of his observation, depend upon circumstances, and are for the jury to determine. Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Baskins, 78 Ark. 355, 93 S. W. 757; Haupt v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 20 Misc. 291, 45 N. Y. Supp. 666; Lewis v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 1 Silv. Sup. Ct. 393, 5 N. Y. Supp. 313; Young v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 107 N. Y. 500, 14 N. E. 434.

seq. commands a railway company to give notice of the approach of its trains to public crossings by sounding a whistle or ringing a bell commencing at least 80 rods from the highway, and continuing the warning until the train shall have crossed the road or street. Failure to give this warning does not in itself establish the carrier's negligence, but may be evidence tending to prove that fact. The proof in this case justified a finding that defendant was negligent in failing to give the highway warning, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

The next inquiry concerns the plaintiff's negligence. Contributory negligence is but an inference to be deduced from primary facts. Individual minds frequently differ radically in drawing the conclusion of negligence from admitted or established facts, and the judgment of a layman not infrequently is as sound as the logic of a judge upon the subject. The questions of negligence and contributory negligence are therefore as likely to be wisely solved by a jury as by a court, and ordinarily should be committed to the tribunal provided by law for ascertaining litigated facts. In

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Dillard, 78 Ark. 520, 94 S. W. 617, and St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Tomlinson, 78 Ark. 251, 94 S. W. 613, it is held that while it is the duty of a traveler to look both ways, nevertheless where greater danger is reasonably to be expected from one direction than the other, he is justified in paying most attention to that direction.

In Greenawaldt v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 165 Ind. 219, 74 N. E. 1081, where plaintiff, in driving west toward an acute-angle crossing, looked east once for a distance of 1,500 feet, the west-bound track being occupied with a standing train, and then devoted her attention to her frightened horse, and to the westward, where there was danger of an east-bound train, and was struck by a west-bound train running on the east-bound track, contrary to a custom by which trains were run west on the south track, and east on the north track, the question whether she used ordinary prudence was held to be for the jury.

And in Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Clime, 31 Ill. App. 563, reversed on other points in 135 Ill. 41, 25 N. E. 846, where plaintiff looked one way when about 100 yards from the crossing, and then gave his attention to the other direction, from which a train was due, it was held that he was not negligent as matter of law.

However, in Bates v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. — Utah, —, 114 Pac. 527; Nixon v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 84 Iowa. 331, 51 N. W. 157; Hartman v. Harris, 182 Pa. 172, 37 Atl. 942; and Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Duncan, 143 Ind. 524, 42 N. E. 37, it was held that the duty of a traveler to look both ways was not excused by the fact that a train was due from the direction toward which he did look.

In Jones v. Barnard, 63 Mo. App. 501, where plaintiff drove from behind obstructions about 30 feet from the track, and looked only one way, thinking that danger was to be expected from that direction if any, he was held to be guilty of contributory negligence.

held that it was not contributory negligence for a pedestrian to fail to keep a constant lookout in the direction toward which his view was obstructed, as it was his duty to look both ways, although the view the other way was unobstructed.

The fact that a train has just passed seems to be regarded by the courts as some excuse, at least, for a traveler who fails to look in the direction from which it came, for in the following cases it was held to be for the jury to determine if failure to look in both directions under such circumstances was contributory negligence on the part of one who was struck by another train or detached cars following closely after the first on the same track: McGhee v. White, 13 C. C. A. 608, 31 U. S. App. 366, 66 Fed. 502; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Cox, 8 Ind. App. 29, 35 N. E. 183; Baker v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 122 Mo. 533, 26 S. W. 20; Suiter v. New York L. E. & W. R. Co. 7 N. Y. S. R. 687; Fejdowski v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 12 App. Div. 589, 43 N. Y. Supp. 84; Gray v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 172 Pa. 383, 33 Atl. 697; Williamaport & N. B. R. Co. v. Weiss, 2 Walk. (Pa.) 217; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Sein, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 33 S. W. 558; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Knight, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 52 S. W. 640; Ferguson v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 63 Wis. 145, 23 N. W. 123.

However, where a pedestrian started to cross the track some little time after an engine had passed, and the view of detached cars approaching was clear had he looked, he was held to be guilty of contributory negligence, in Schlimgen v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 90 Wis. 186, 62 N. W. 1045, distinguishing Ferguson v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 63 Wis. 145, 23 N. W. 123.

And one who proceeded to cross behind a passing engine without looking in the direction from whence it came, and was killed by cars following, making a flying switch, was held to be guilty of contributory negligence. Ormsbee v. Boston & P. R. Corp. 14 R. I. 102, 51 Am. Rep. 354.

the instant case the primary facts upon the issue of plaintiff's contributory negligence are undisputed, and the rule to be applied is well settled in Nebraska. If, from those facts, different minds may honestly conclude that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to her injury, or that she was free therefrom, the jury, and not the court, should draw the inference and find the secondary fact. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Bailey, 11 Neb. 332, 9 N. W. 50; American Waterworks Co. v. Dougherty, 37 Neb. 373, 55 N. W. 1051; Omaha Street R. Co. v. Loehneisen, 40 Neb. 37, 58 N. W. 535; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Pollard, 53 Neb. 730, 74 N. W. 331; Schwabenfeldt v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 80 Neb. 790, 115 N. W. 285. The defendant argues that the plaintiff had a clear view of the railway track many feet west of the crossing; that if she had looked westward at any time before stepping upon the track, she would have seen the train, and is guilty of contributory negligence because she did not look at a time when her sense of sight would have been an effective means to warn her of her peril. Decisions in point to sustain the proposition have been cited, but they do not appeal to us as sound. The rule seems harsh, and practically compels the individual to insure his own safety.

In Omaha, N. & B. H. R. Co. v. O'Donnell, 22 Neb. 475, 35 N. W. 235, we held that ordinarily the question of contributory negligence in cases like the one at bar is for the jury. In that case, if the injured traveler had looked subsequent to his first and second observations, and while yet in a place of safety, he could have seen the approaching train; but we held that his default did not, as a matter of law, convict him of contributory negligence.

In Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Talbot, 48 Neb. 627, 67 N. W. 509, we held that it is the duty of a traveler upon the public highway to look and listen while advancing towards a railway crossing, and if he fails to do so, he will be guilty of negligence barring a recovery, even though the carrier was negligent in operating the train with which he collided. In that case the man in control of a team drove onto a railway crossing without looking or listening, and had not looked or listened while traveling 40 rods just before coming to said crossing.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Yost, 56 Neb. 439, 76 N. W. 901, the plaintiff, a section hand, had been injured by a locomotive following a gravel train; he stepped off the railway and down an embankment; before returning to work, and while at the foot of the grade, he looked in the direction from whence the passing train had come, but 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

could not see the approaching engine because of an intervening wing fence; thereafter he did not look, although he had been warned by his superior to do so, before stepping onto the track, and we held that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The case is reported on a second appeal in 61 Neb. 530, 85 N. W. 561, and a statement in the first paragraph of the syllabus might, if considered apart from the facts disclosed in the opinion, lead an indifferent observer astray. It must be remembered that Yost had violated a positive order of his employer made to secure the servant's safety. It is competent for a railway company to make a rule of that nature to govern the conduct of its employees, but it has no such control over the public. The power to compel a pedestrian to take so extreme a precaution under all circumstances is vested in the legislature, and it has not spoken upon this subject. The court did not hold, nor intend to hold, in the Yost Case that all pedestrians, without regard to surrounding circumstances, must, just before stepping onto a railway, look for trains, or in default thereof be convicted of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The facts in the Yost Case clearly distinguish it from the case at bar and all other crossing cases reported in this jurisdiction. It does not rule the instant case, and should not be considered as authority in suits between a railway company and persons not in its employ.

At the time the first appeal in the Yost Case was determined, the opinion in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Pollard, 53 Neb. 730, 74 N. W. 331, was on file, and no attempt was made to repudiate the principles of law announced in the Pollard Case. The facts in that case are that Pollard was driving along the highway and over a railway crossing: his attention was challenged by a pillar of smoke to the east, which he thought indicated the presence of a train; turning from a consideration of the smoke just as his wagon was upon the crossing, he observed a train approaching from the opposite direction. It was held that the jury should say whether he was negligent or not. Mr. Chief Justice Harrison, speaking for the court, said: "It was not for the trial court, and is not for this court to determine and say as a matter of law at just what exact point in the plaintiff's approach to the railroad, he should have looked in either direction on the track for a train, or just at what instant he should have looked in either direction for the same purpose. The question was, Did he, under his surroundings and all the circumstances, observe the care which ordinarily would have been taken by a prudent person?"

The plaintiff had crossed defendant's railway at Thirtieth street several times before the accident. She testifies that she was accustomed when traveling from the south to stop about 35 feet from the track and look southwest for trains; that at times she had waited for trains to pass before attempting to cross, and in her judgment an observation made at said point would advise her of an approaching train so that she could protect herself; that on the day she was injured, after looking east and west at her usual point of observation, she heard no sounds to indicate an oncoming train; she thought it was safe to cross, and continued to listen for and to think about the train, but was giving attention to her walking; she was heavy, and it behooved her to notice the path she was traveling. Mrs. Wallenburg insists that she did not hear or see the defendant's train until it collided with her. The evidence is uncontradicted that the defendant's train was being operated at a rapid and an unusual rate of speed, and that the highway warning was not given as it approached the crossing in question. Mrs. Wallenburg had traveled about half way between the southern line of the defendant's right of way and its track, at the time she last looked for a train, and it does not seem to us, as a matter of law, that she should be charged with the duty of anticipating that the defendant would negligently operate its train without warning the public by sounding the locomotive whistle or ringing the bell. The law does not arbitrarily and invariably fix the distance at which the plaintiff should have commenced to look and listen, so long as she did so at a sufficient distance to enable her to discover the approach of a train and avoid injury by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, and whether she did exercise that care under the circumstances of this case is a question for the jury, and not for this court to determine. Schwanenfeldt v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 80 Neb. 790, 115 N. W. 285; Moore v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 102 Iowa, 595, 71 N. W. 569; Nichols v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 44 Colo. 501, 98 Pac. 808; Boyd v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 101 Tex. 411, 108 S. W. 813; Farrell v. Erie R. Co. 70 C. C. A. 396, 138 Fed. 28, 29; Oldenburg v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 124 N. Y. 414, 419, 26 N. E. 1021; Greany v. Long Island R. Co. 101 N. Y. 419, 5 N. E. 425; Bonnell v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 39 N. J. L. 189. While we might not have found the facts as did the jury, the trial court properly submitted the issues to the triers of fact, and in our opinion there is sufficient evidence to uphold the verdict.

2. Instruction numbered 4, requested by defendant, was properly refused. The first proposition of law therein stated will apply to some cases, but not the instant one, and the closing paragraph is a command that the jury shall find for defendant. Instruction numbered 5, requested by defendant, does not correctly state the law. In so far as defendant complains because the jury were not told in so many words that a pedestrian in approaching a railway crossing should look each way for trains, it may be said that the court in the fifth paragraph of its charge said: "It was likewise the duty of the plaintiff before going upon the track of defendant, to look and listen for the approach of an engine or train, and to observe such reasonable precaution before attempting to cross the track as an ordinarily prudent man, under the same or like circumstances, would have observed." There is nothing in the record tending to prove that plaintiff looked to the east, and not to the west, but the proof is that she looked in the direction of the approaching train, so that the failure of the court to use the word "each," or its equivalent, in its instructions, did not prejudice defendant. Instruction numbered 8, requested by defendant, was properly refused; it is not applicable to the evidence. Instruction numbered 11, requested by defendant, may be correct as an abstract principle of law, but, in the light of the evidence adduced, was unnecessary. The evidence does not tend to support the last clear chance doctrine, and the court's instructions did not present any phase of that theory to the jury, hence it was proper to refuse the instruction last referred to. Instruction numbered 13, requested by defendant, purports to state the evidence in some particulars; it is not entirely accurate, is argumentative, and was properly refused. Instruction numbered 16, requested by defendant, states a rule of law in conflict with that announced in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Pollard, supra, and invades the province of the jury. The special findings do not control the general verdict. The situation in this case upon the point considered is very much like the one created in Kafka v. Union Stock Yards Co. 78 Neb. 140, 110 N. W. 872.

3. The recovery is moderate, the nature and extent of plaintiff's injuries being considered. There is no suggestion in the brief that errors were committed in admitting or rejecting evidence, and the charge to the jury is fair and dispassionate.

The judgment of the District Court therefore is affirmed.

Barnes, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the majority opinion in this case, for the reason that, to my mind, the undisputed facts show such gross contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff as should prevent a recovery. The effect of this opinion is to overrule Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Talbot, 48 Neb. 627, 67 N. W. 599; Guthrie v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Neb. 746, 71 N. W. 722; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Pollard, 53 Neb. 730, 74 N. W. 331; Brady v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 59 Neb. 233, 80 N. W. 809; and many other cases. By our judgment we make a railroad company an absolute insurer of the safety of pedestrians at its grade crossings.

I am of opinion that we should hold in this case, that the plaintiff's conduct in not looking or listening for the approach of the defendant's train for the distance of 35 feet while approaching the crossing where the accident occurred, and by deliberately stepping onto the railroad track in front of the oncoming train, and at the instant it reached the crossing, where there was an unobstructed view of the track in the direction from which the train approached of from 400 to 500 feet, should be held to be contributory negligence, as a matter of law.

The judgment of the trial court should be reversed, and the cause dismissed.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(— N. J. —, 81 Atl. 104.)

ing on the west-bound track until the front wheels of his automobile were on the east-bound track, and it appeared that, upon reaching the top of a hill 200 feet distant from the crossing, he turned off power and proceeded by force of gravity, noiselessly, at a speed of 4 miles an hour, constantly looking and listening, but hearing no signals, and it further appeared that there were no transient noises nor temporary obstructions to the view, he was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in not stopping before his view became effective.

Same — mistake of judgment — effect.

2. Where a traveler upon a highway, without any fault on his part, is placed in a position of imminent peril at a railroad crossing, the law will not hold him guilty of such negligence as to defeat his recovery if he does not select the very wisest course, and an honest mistake of judgment in such a sudden emergency will not of itself constitute contributory negligence, although another course might have been better and safer; and this rule is especially applicable where the person is placed in such perilous position by reason of the railroad company's negligence in failing to give proper signals. All that is required of a person in such an emergency is that he act with ordinary care under the circumstances; it being for the jury to determine whether such an emergency existed, and whether the traveler acted with due care.

Trial — contributory negligence — jury.

3. Where the evidence, when the plaintiff rests, leaves the contributory negligence of the plaintiff in doubt, the determination of the question must be submitted to the jury.

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff and for the destruction of his automobile, which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Trenchard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff in the way of injuries to his person and the destruction of his automobile, occasioned by a collision with a locomotive engine operated by the defendant company, at a highway grade crossing at Howells, Orange county, New York. According to the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, no bell, whistle, or other warning was given by the defendant's train, and there was no flagman, gate, or electric bell at the crossing. At the trial, and here, therefore, it seems to have been properly conceded that there was thus presented at least a jury question as to the negligence of the defendant. The trial judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground of his contributory negligence, and the judgment entered thereon is now here for review.

It appeared that the highway upon which the plaintiff was traveling runs north and south, and the railroad east and west. The plaintiff, who was riding in and operating an automobile, was going in a northerly direction. His wife and daughter were riding with him. As the plaintiff approached the crossing, he came to the top of a hill about 200 feet distant from the crossing, and from that point the highway runs slightly downgrade until a point 20 feet from the track is reached. There were three tracks; the first to be crossed was the east-bound; the second, the west-bound, on which the train was coming; and the third was a siding. When the plaintiff reached the top of the hill, he slowed down, and from that point proceeded "very slowly; about as fast as a man would walk, 4 or 5 miles an hour." The power of the automobile was turned off, and it was at "low speed, which acted as a brake." According to the testimony, the automobile then made no noise. As the plaintiff approached, the view to the west was unobstructed. The view to the east, from which direction the train came, was obstructed by a high bank of earth running parallel with the highway for about 500 feet to a point about 26 feet from the tracks. A considerable part of that space was occupied by the defendant's freight shed, and by telegraph poles and other obstructions. The result was, as stated by the trial judge, in dealing with the motion to nonsuit: "It would not be until a person on the highway had cleared the northerly line of the freight shed that he would have a distinct view of the west-bound track to the east for a sufficient distance to make his observation of much practical use. This northerly line of the freight shed is 9 feet 3 inches south from the nearest rail." After referring to the testimony as to the length of the automobile and the position of the plaintiff therein, the trial judge concludes: "It results, I think, from the proofs, that Mr. Dickinson could first get a long unobstructed view to the east at just about the time when his front wheels came on the south rail of the east-bound track." It was clearly open to the jury to have drawn like inferences from the testimony. The plaintiff looked both to the east and west, and listened constantly from the time the crossing could first be seen which was at the top of the hill. When the last obstruction (the freight shed) was passed, the train was suddenly seen approaching at a speed of 40 or 50 miles an hour. Whereupon the plaintiff turned the steering wheel to the west and jumped from the automobile, dragging his wife with him. In jumping he injured his knee. His daughter also jumped, and the automobile continued by force of gravity over the first track, and was struck by the locomotive on the west-bound track. The distance between the south rails of the two tracks was 13 feet. The plaintiff and his family all testify that they alighted upon the east-bound track. The learned trial judge held the view that when he jumped, the plaintiff was in a place of safety, and nonsuited upon the theory that he was guilty of contributory negligence in not stopping the automobile, instead of jumping. We are of opinion that the nonsuit cannot be supported upon the ground taken by the trial judge, nor upon any other ground.

The defendant first contends that the plaintiff "was bound to stop before crossing the tracks." As a general rule, a traveler on a highway approaching a railroad crossing is bound to exercise reasonable care—that is, such care and prudence as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under like circumstances—in looking and listening for approaching trains before going on the crossing; and if he fails to do so, whereby he is injured, he is guilty of contributory negligence barring a recovery, although the railroad company itself is guilty of negligence. Passman v. West Jersey & Seashore R. Co. 68 N. J. L. 719, 61 L.R.A. 609, 96 Am. St. Rep. 573, 54 Atl. 809; Swanson v. Central R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 605, 44 Atl. 852; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Pfuelb, 60 N. J. L. 278, 37 Atl. 1100, affirmed 61 N. J. L. 287, 41 Atl. 1116. Such duty to look and listen before crossing requires, especially where physical conditions interfere with the free use of vision or hearing, that the traveler should exercise care to select a position from which an effective observation can be made, and to use the necessary means within his control to render the act of looking and listening reasonably effective. Conkling v. Erie R. Co. 63 N. J. L. 339, 43 Atl. 666.

Where there are permanent obstructions to sight that would make danger invisible, and a transient noise that would make it inaudible, it is negligence to go forward at once from a place of safety to a place of possible danger, without waiting for hearing to become effective. Central R. Co. v. Smalley, 61 N. J. L. 277, 39 Atl. 695. But the duty to stop before crossing has not been held in this state to arise except where there are transient noises or temporary obstructions to the view. Wise v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. — N. J. —, 80 Atl. 459; Merkle v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 473, 9 Atl. 680; Central R. Co. v. Smalley, 61 N. J. L. 277, 39 Atl. 695; Keyley v. Central R. Co. 64 N. J. L. 355, 45 Atl. 811.

We have pointed out that in the present case it was open to the jury to find that the view of the plaintiff to the east was obstructed, so that he could not see the approaching train until the front wheels of his automobile were on the first or east-bound track. The uncontradicted testimony was that the automobile made no noise as it proceeded downgrade to the crossing, and there was no evidence of other transient noises, nor of temporary obstructions to the view. Under the cases cited, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not stopping before his view became effective. Since the plaintiff was not negligent up to the point where the train came into view, no negligence can thereafter be imputed to him as a matter of law, because, as we have pointed out, it was open to the jury to find that, when he cleared the freight shed so as to enable him to see the approaching train, the

The defendant argues that the plaintiff should have stopped his automobile on the first track, instead of jumping. But clearly his failure to stop and his conduct in jumping cannot be said to be negligence as a matter of law. Where a traveler, without any fault on his part, is placed in a position of imminent peril at a crossing, the law will not hold him guilty of such negligence as to defeat his recovery if he does not select the very wisest course, and an honest mistake of judgment in such a sudden emergency will not of itself constitute contributory negligence, although another course might have been better and safer; and this rule is especially applicable where the person is placed in such perilous position by reason of the railroad company's negligence, as in failing to give the proper signals. All that is required of a person in such an emergency is that he act with ordinary care under the circumstances; it being for the jury to determine whether such an emergency existed, and whether the traveler acted with due care. Weston v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 74 N. J. L. 484, 65 Atl. 1015, and cases there cited. In the case at bar the plaintiff was confronted by a sudden peril, without any fault upon his part, and by reason of the failure of the defendant's servants to give proper signals. It may well have been, as the plaintiff testifies, that he could not determine, in the time at his disposal, on which track the train was coming. He was required to act quickly. He might have applied the brakes, taking the chance of the train being on the first track and the risk that the brakes would fail to work. He might possibly have attempted to escape by resort to some other means. If he had chosen any such other courses, and had been struck by the train, it might have been argued with equal weight that he should have jumped when he had the opportunity.

We are of opinion that the evidence left the contributory negligence of the plaintiff in doubt, and the determination of the question should have been submitted to the jury.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

EDWARD NAVILLE et al., by Guardian
ad Litem, Appts.,
v.

AMERICAN MACHINE COMPANY et al.

(145 Ky. 344, 140 S. W. 559.)

Will — devise to children — estate taken.

A devise to testator's daughter "for herself and her children forever" vests the fee in the daughter.

(November 14, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Chancery Branch, First Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to determine the character of the estate taken by the daughter of Philip Seiler, deceased, under his will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert L. Page for appellants.

Messrs. Wehle & Wehle for appellee German Insurance Bank.

Messrs. M. A. Sachs, D. A. Sachs, J. G. Sachs, W. W. Davies, and Edward G. Hill for other appellees.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By his last will, which was probated in 1887, Philip Seiler devised all of his property, after making some special bequests to churches and church societies, to his daughter. The language used in making this devise is as follows: "The balance of my property, real estate or personal, wheresoever or whatsoever or what nature or kind, I give, devise, and bequeath to my beloved daughter, Anna Maria Naville (née Seiler) for her to enjoy for herself and her children forever."

There passed to Mrs. Naville, under this clause of the will a certain lot, fronting on the south side of Main street, in Louisville, Kentucky, described as follows: "Beginning at a point on the south side of Main street, 180 feet and 9 inches east of Jackson street, running thence east with said south side of Main street 78 feet and 9 inches, thence extending back south, of the same width throughout, between lines parallel to Jackson street 204 feet to an alley, together with improvements thereon," etc. After her father's death, the improvements on this lot were destroyed by fire, and Mrs. Naville and her husband, in April, 1906, sold and conveyed the vacant lot to the American Machine Company for $3,700. The company paid $300 in cash and executed a note for $3,400, payable in one year, and bearing interest from date. It was provided in this deed that as Mrs. Naville's children reached their majority they would each execute a quitclaim deed to the company. Those children who have arrived at age have complied with this provision of the deed by executing the quitclaim deed. There are several children still under age. The machine company owned other property adjoining this property purchased of Mrs. Naville, and, desiring to erect commodious buildings thereon for the conduct of their business, borrowed from the German Insurance Bank $50,000, and executed a mortgage on all their property, including the lot in question. This suit was brought by the American Machine Company to have the court determine the character of estate which Mrs. Naville took under her father's will.

Plaintiff asks that it be declared a fee-simple title; but, in the event the court should hold that less than a fee-simple title passed to her, it asks for a sale of the property, and that Mrs. Naville, her husband, their children, and the German Insurance Bank, be made parties defendants. Mrs. Naville answered, and claimed that under the will of her father she took a fee-simple title, and that she conveyed this to the plaintiff company, and such of her children as had reached their majority had quitclaimed to the plaintiff in compliance with the terms of her agreement with it, as set out in her deed; and she asks for a judgment on her note, with interest, and the enforcement of her vendor's lien. The German Insurance Bank answered, and asserted that Mrs. Naville owned the fee, and asked that its mortgage be adjudged a lien upon the fee, subject only to the vendor's lien for the remainder of the purchase money. A guardian ad litem was appointed for the infant defendants, and for them he pleaded that, under the will of their grandfather, Mrs. Naville took only a life interest in the property, while the remainder was in her children.

On this issue the case was submitted for judgment, and the chancellor was of opinion, and so held, that Mrs. Naville, under this clause of her father's will, took the fee-simple title to the property in question, and her children had no interest whatever in it. From that judgment, the guardian ad litem for the infant children has prosecuted this appeal.

The correctness of this ruling depends upon the meaning of the word "children," preceding the word "forever," as used in the clause of the will disposing of the residue of testator's estate. In construction, the aim of the court is to arrive at the intention of the testator as gathered from the whole instrument. The clause in which the residue of the estate is disposed of is the only clause in which any reference is made by the testator to his daughter, so that no light is thrown upon this question by any other clause of the will. Hence we must look to the language used by the testator, and from this, taken in connection with the fact that the devise is to his daughter, determine what estate the testator intended her to take.

In Moran v. Dillehay, 8 Bush, 434, the court had under consideration the following language: "I give unto my daughter Harriet Givens and her children forever, and if she should die and have no heirs of her body, it is my will that all the land and negroes I have given her should go to my daughter, Eleanor Hocker and her children." It was held that the words, "I give unto my daughter Harriet Givens and her children forever," showed the intention on the part of the testator to give to his daughter a defeasible fee, i. e., a fee, subject to be defeated only by her dying without issue. And in holding that her children had no interest in the property, the court said: "In the present case, we are well satisfied that the deviser, in using the words, 'I give unto my daughter Harriet Givens and her children forever,' meant and intended the words 'children forever' to be words of inheritance only, and used them in the sense of heirs or heirs of the body."

In the later case of Hood v. Dawson, 98 Ky. 285, 33 S. W. 75, the testator devised to his nephew certain property, using the following language: "At the death of my wife, I give to James Willson . . . the farm . . . to him and his children forever, but if . . . [he] shall die leaving no child nor children, . . . I give said farm to my two nephews," etc. It was held that this language invested James Willson, the nephew, with the fee, subject to be defeated only upon his dying without issue. The cases of Moran v. Dillehay, supra, Lachland v. Downing, 11 B. Mon. 34, and Williams v. Duncan, 92 Ky. 125, 17 S. W. 330, were cited with approval as supporting this construction. In holding that the children took nothing under this devise, the court said: "We conclude from the authorities cited that by the language used in this will . . . an estate in fee simple was created in James Willson, to be defeated only in the event that he should die without children; . . . that the further clause 'to him and his children forever' is but descriptive of the estate taken, and not intended to introduce new beneficiaries." Continuing, the court said: "Quite a number of cases cited by appellant arise under wills made by husbands in favor of their wives and children. They are of such frequent occurrence in the court that they may be almost said to make a class by themselves. In such cases the constant and uniform tendency of the court has been, in cases where the language was in substance to the wife and children, . . . or of the wife and the heirs of her body or issue, etc., to hold that the wife takes a life estate only, and that the children take in remainder. The reason assigned by the court for this favorite construction is that otherwise, if the wife was to take a part in fee simple, this part of the estate might pass to some stranger in blood to the husband, a possibility not to be supposed consonant to his wishes and intention. This rule has been also applied to cases where the consideration for the conveyance moves from the husband to the grantor."

The language of the will under consideration is almost identical with that used by the testator in Hood v. Dawson, the one being "for her and her children forever," and the other "to him and his children forever;" and both are very much like the language used by the testator in Moran v. Dillchay. The use by the testator in each of these wills of the word "forever," following the word "children," illustrates the sense in which the word "children" was used; i. e., in the sense of "heirs." In the two cases from which we have quoted the court so held. If the word "children" were not followed by the word "forever," we would incline to the construction given the language under consideration in Kuhn v. Kuhn, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 112, 68 S. W. 16; Mefford v. Dougherty, 89 Ky. 58, 25 Am. St. Rep. 521, 11 S. W. 716; Adams v. Adams, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 655, 47 S. W. 335, and Carr v. Estill, 16 B. Mon. 309, 63 Am. Dec. 548. In each of these cases, the devise was to a blood relation of the testator and his or her children, and the court held that by this language the testator conveyed to the parent a life estate, with remainder in fee to the children, the opinion in these cases being rested upon the declaration that the language was subject to no other construction; there being no other provision in the will indicating a contrary intent on the part of the testator. As stated in Hood v. Dawson, a different construction has invariably been given in that class of cases where a devise is made by a husband to his wife, in which mention is made of the children. In that class of cases, the will has almost invariably been construed to convey to the wife a life estate, with remainder to the children; the court being influenced in reaching this conclusion by the idea that a husband would not want his estate to pass into the hands of those strangers in blood to him, in the event that his wife died leaving no children by him living. In Koenig v. Kraft, 87 Ky. 95, 12 Am. St. Rep. 463, 7 S. W. 622; Frank v. Unz, 91 Ky. 621, 16 S. W. 712; Weaver v. Weaver, 92 Ky. 491, 36 Am. St. Rep. 604, 18 S. W. 228, and Poland v. Chism, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1072, 64 S. W. 833, this court has so held.

From the foregoing, we are enabled to divide the decisions of this court, bearing upon the question under consideration, into three general classes: First, devises by a father or mother to a son, daughter, or blood relation, in which the language "to him and his children forever" is used; second, devises to a blood relation and his children, where the word "forever" is not used following the word "children;" and, third, devises by a husband to his wife and her children. In all those cases falling within the first class, the word "children" has been construed as meaning "heirs," and under this construction it has been held that they took no interest in the property devised. In the second class of cases it has been held that the children took a fee, subject to the life estate of their parent. And in the third class of cases the children have been held to take the fee and the parent the life estate; the opinion in the cases falling within this class being rested, as stated, upon the idea that the testator, while wanting his wife to have the full use, benefit, and enjoyment of his property during her life, would not want it, after her death, to pass to those strangers in blood to him.

Of course, in the multiplicity of suits involving the construction of wills, many cases will be found that are not properly assignable to any of these classes. Other clauses in the will frequently throw some light upon the clause submitted for construction, and in such cases the court can be governed by no fixed rule, but must determine from the language used in the will as a whole the character of estate devised.

In Webb v. Holmes, 3 B. Mon. 404, the devise was to the mother and her children forever; but, because of other language in the will, showing an intent on the part of the testator that the mother should take only a life estate and the children the remainder, the court so decided. But, in the absence of this other language, which exercised a controlling influence in the construction of that will, it would undoubtedly have been held to fall within the first class. Smith v. Smith, 119 Ky. 899, 85

S. W. 169, 1094, and Harkness v. Lisle, 132 Ky. 767, 117 S. W. 264, also illustrate this principle.

Appellant cited and relies upon the cases of Hall v. Wright, 121 Ky. 16, 87 S. W. 1129, Crews v. Glasscock, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 913, 107 S. W. 237, and Baskett v. Sellars, 93 Ky. 3, 19 S. W. 9, in which the court had under consideration the construction of a deed in which the children of the grantee are mentioned as parties, or whose names appear in the granting or habendum clause. An examination of these cases shows that they do not fall within any of the three classes named; but in each that construction was adopted by the court which carried out the intention of the grantor, as appeared from an inspection of the entire instrument.

We are of opinion that by clause 7 of the will of Philip Seiler the testator intended to give to his daughter the fee-simple title to all the property which passed to her under this clause, and that the word "children," as used therein, is a word of inheritance, and not of purchase, being used as equivalent to, or in place of, the word "heirs."

The Chancellor having so held, the judgment is affirmed.

Thus, it is held that a judgment rendered upon a debt which was contracted before the property became impressed with the character of a homestead becomes a lien thereon, when filed according to law, and a subsequent purchaser takes subject thereto. Kimball v. Wilson, 59 Iowa, 638, 13 N. W. 748.

ing a suit by the vendee of homestead property to restrain the levy of execution thereon by a judgment creditor of the vendor, the court declared that the date of contracting the debt, and not that of the rendition of the judgment, was the test as to whether the property was exempt from sale on an execution issued on the judgment; and that since the debt was contracted prior to the acquisition of the homestead, the property was subject to such execution. It appeared in the case that the judgment was upon a note given as the purchase price of property which became the homestead, and which was subsequently exchanged for other property which was also occupied as a homestead, and upon which the levy was made, and the court invoked a statute in relation to exchange of homesteads, providing that the new homestead, to the extent in value of the old, is exempt from execution in all cases where the old or former homestead would have been exempt, but in no other or in any greater degree.

So, it was held in Hale v. Heaslip, 16 Iowa, 451, that a judgment rendered subsequently to the perfection of a homestead, but upon a debt contracted previously thereto, was a lien upon the homestead property which was paramount to a mortgage executed after the rendition of the judgment. It was contended that a party taking a mortgage is not bound to go back of the record of the judgment and inquire the date of the contract upon which the judgment was rendered, but the court said that if, in addition to the right which a mortgage ordinarily gives, the mortgagee claims the benefit of the homestead rights of his mortgagor, he is bound to ascertain when those rights began; and points out that the records of the court in which the judgment was obtained would have disclosed the fact, if examined, that the judgment was founded upon a debt contracted prior to the acquisition of the homestead rights.

And it was held in Phelps v. Finn, 45 Iowa, 447, that, as against an execution purchaser under another judgment, a judgment creditor was entitled to show by proof

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In August, 1905, defendant, for value received, made and delivered to plaintiff his promissory note whereby he promised to pay plaintiff the sum of $3,420.73. At that time defendant was and still is the owner of three certain lots in the city of Brainerd, designated in the record as lots 7, 8, and 9 of block 43. Under the then-aliunde that his judgment was rendered upon a debt contracted before the property became a homestead, so as to entitle him to redeem from such purchaser under a statute providing that any creditor whose demand is a lien upon the real estate may redeem the same. It was, of course, contended in the case that the judgment having been acquired subsequently to the acquisition of the homestead, it was not a lien within the meaning of the act, and could not be made so by proof aliunde, and that, as between the judgment creditor and third persons acquiring an interest in ignorance of the fact, such proof should not be regarded as competent. The court, however, said: "This principle can apply only to persons whose rights would be prejudicially affected by such proof, and who have an equitable right to protection. The plaintiff is not in that position; he made his bid upon the property with full knowledge that other lien creditors would have the right to redeem from him by paying the amount of his bid and interest. If he bid the full value of the property, he is not prejudiced and has no right to complain that he has been repaid this amount with interest. If, upon the other hand, he bid less than the value of the property, believing that there was no lien creditor to redeem, and that he would, if the property was not redeemed by the judgment debtor, get it for much less than its value, and still have the greater part of his debt unsatisfied, he ought not to be heard to complain that he has lost this advantage. The plaintiff is now seeking relief in a court of equity, and he ought not to be permitted to show that his bid was much less than the value of the property, and that his rights will be prejudiced if he is not now permitted to bid more."

It was held in Nowland v. Lanagan, 45 Ark. 108, that since the promise of a debtor to pay a debt discharged in bankruptcy was not to be considered as a distinct and original contract, but as renewing the old obligation, with all its incidents and consequences, a constitutional exemption in force at the time of the promise and of the rendition of the judgment thereon could not existing statutes of the state, lot 9 was exempt to defendant as his homestead; but lots 7 and 8 were subject to and liable for the payment of the indebtedness created by the promissory note just mentioned. The statute then provided for an exemption of a tract of land not exceeding one lot, and as defendant resided upon lot 9, it constituted his homestead. No part of the note was ever paid, except $420.73. In May, 1908, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against defendant, and on June 11, 1908, he was in the due course of procedure duly adjudged a bankrupt. By an amendment to the homestead exemption statute by R. L. 1905, § 3453, the debtor's homestead was enlarged to a tract of land not exceeding one fourth of an acre, and lot 9 and a part of lots 7 and 8 were claimed by defendant in the bankruptcy proceedings as his homestead. Under the amended statute the bankruptcy court set the same aside to him accordingly.

In May, 1908, and before defendant was adjudged a bankrupt, plaintiff commenced an action against him to recover upon the promissory note mentioned. The summons was duly served; but he failed to appear in the action, or to apply for a stay of proceedings therein pending the proceedings in the bankruptcy court, and on August 26, 1908, a default judgment was duly rendered against him in the district court of Crow Wing county for the amount due upon the note, with interest and costs, amounting in all to the sum of $3,218.25. The judgbe asserted by the debtor for the purpose of defeating the execution on the judgment, where the original debt was contracted under a prior Constitution which did not prevent the creditor from reaching the property.

The last case was cited with approval in Cohn v. Hoffman, 45 Ark. 376, involving an action in ejectment by an execution purchaser against a transferee of the judgment debtor, and holding that where a debt was contracted while the earlier Constitution was in force, it was of no consequence that the debtor, after the adoption of the later Constitution, made his note in settlement of the pre-existing debt, since the debt remained the same notwithstanding the evidence of its existence was contained at one time in an account, later in a note, and lastly in a judgment. The court said: "The judgment lien attached to the homestead as well as to all of his other lands in that county. The judgment creditor could not sell the homestead as long as Bray [judgment debtor] resided upon and claimed it in the manner designated by law. But the land could not be alienated to his prejudice. The purchaser would take subject to the encumbrance. If Bray abandoned his residence upon it, it became immediately subject to seizure and sale. And if he died, it was assets for the payment of his debts, subject to certain homestead rights in his widow and minor children, which rights were limited in point of time. So that if the creditor used due diligence in reducing his claim to judgment before Bray had parted with his interest, and in keeping the judgment lien alive, the land must eventually and inevitably be subjected to the payment of the debt."

In Kinder v. Lyons, 38 La. Ann. 713, involving an action by a homesteader to restrain the sale of the homestead property under a judgment against him, and holding that the homestead exemption could not be successfully asserted where it appeared that the declaration of homestead was made after the debt was contracted, but before the judgment became effective, the court merely 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cites as controlling, Thomas v. Guilbeau, 35 La. Ann. 927, which declares in general terms that the judgment does not create the debt, but merely recognizes the rights and obligations which were created by the original contracting of the debt, and applies this doctrine to reach the result that the right to assert homestead exemptions as against a debt contracted during the force of the homestead law is not lost by the fact that the judgment was rendered after a subsequent homestead law came into effect, and that the debtor registered his homestead claim thereunder, and after the seizure of his farm under the judgment.

In holding that a judgment rendered after the adoption of a constitutional provision increasing exemptions is, so far as regards the additional exemptions, subject to a fi. fa. levied thereon, where it was founded upon a debt contracted before the Constitution, the court, in Hiley v. Bridges, 60 Ga. 375, merely cites without discussion Bush v. Lester, 55 Ga. 579, which involved a judgment which was itself rendered before the Constitution.

In reaching a decision as to whether equity had jurisdiction of a suit to subject certain property to debts which were contracted before the property became a homestead, notwithstanding the debtor had been discharged in bankruptcy, the court in Groves v. Osburn, 46 Or. 173, 79 Pac. 500, declares with a briefness which seems to assume rather than to decide the point, that since the debt was contracted before the homestead exemption act was adopted, the creditor would have had, but for the proceedings in bankruptcy, a clear right to enforce a judgment obtained against the property.

And in Linsey v. McGannon, 9 W. Va. 154, involving a suit in equity to enforce a judgment, the court regarded the defense of homestead rights as entirely met by the fact that the debts were contracted before the declaration of exemption was recorded.

A debtor cannot claim exemptions under a statute which expressly applies only to debts contracted after its adoption, as ment so rendered was subsequently duly docketed. Plaintiff thereafter presented the claim represented by the promissory note to the bankruptcy court, and the full amount thereof was allowed as a claim against the estate. Subsequently, however, on a rehearing, the order was modified by allowing the sum of $150 only, the theory of the modification being that a part of the land set aside to defendant as his homestead was subject to the payment of the claim, it having been contracted before the change in the homestead by R. L. 1905, and, since plaintiff had acquired a lien thereon by the entry and docketing of its judgment, resort should be had to that, and not to the general property of the estate; the land so subject to payment of the claim being of the value of $3,000. This order of modification was affirmed on appeal to the Federal district court. Defendant thereafter, in the due course of procedure, received his discharge from the bankruptcy court, as provided for by law.

Defendant then moved the court below for an order vacating the judgment so entered in plaintiff's favor upon the promissory note, and for leave to interpose in defense to the action his discharge in bankruptcy, and, further, for an order perpetually re-against a judgment rendered after such adoption, upon a debt previously contracted. Smith's Appeal, 23 Pa. 310.

The case of Bachman v. Crawford, 3 Humph. 213, 39 Am. Dec. 163, is governed by an express statutory provision that the exemption thereby created should extend only to executions issued upon judgments founded upon contracts entered into after a certain date.

In Douglass v. Gregg, 7 Baxt. 384, involving a suit in equity to subject lands to the satisfaction of a judgment, it was held that since the judgment, although rendered after the enactment of the homestead law, was founded upon a debt contracted previously, it was a lien against the property which would prevail against the judgment debtor, and also against one who took a conveyance from him after the filing of the bill.

On the other hand, as already noted, the California court holds that where a judgment is not founded upon a debt secured by a mortgage or a mechanics', laborers', or vendors' lien, it cannot be enforced against a homestead which was declared before the rendition of the judgment, although there was an attachment levied upon the premises before the filing of such declaration. McCracken v. Harris, 54 Cal. 81. The court pointed out that the Code distinctly provided that, except in cases of mechanics', laborers', or vendors' liens, or mortgages duly made, the homestead could not be subjected to a forced sale upon a judgment unless the judgment imparting a lien on the premises was obtained before the homestead declaration was filed. So, the rule of the case appears to be that the fact of levying an attachment before the declaration of homestead will not prevent the application of the statutory provision. This decision was followed without discussion in Sullivan v. Hendrickson, 54 Cal. 258.

A vendors' lien, within the meaning of this statute, must be adjudicated and declared by a court of equity so as to bring the case within the exception, and to subject the homestead to a lien for a judgment rendered after the declaration of homestead. Thus, it is held in Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 14 Pac. 198, that the lien which the vendor of real property retains for the unpaid purchase money is not a specified and absolute charge upon the land, but a mere equitable right to resort to it upon failure of payment by the vendee; that, in other words, it is in its nature a personal privilege and unassignable, which the vendor can assert only in a suit brought for the purpose of having it decreed and enforced; and that where he, instead of having the lien adjudicated and declared by a court of equity, sues for and obtains a general judgment, he waives the vendor's lien, and cannot enforce the judgment, where it was entered after the declaration of homestead. While not highly important in this connection, it is interesting to note that it was contended in this case that the declaration of homestead was fraudulent because made during the process of litigation which subsequently resulted in the ordinary judgment against the homesteader; but the court points out that the very purpose of the homestead law is to give to one, except as against an indebtedness already merged in a judgment, or as against certain enumerated judgments rendered after the declaration of homestead, the right to preserve and protect the homestead from forced sale; and that the doctrine bearing upon conveyances made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors has no application to the creation of the homestead. The decision as to this latter phase of the case was followed without discussion in Simonson v. Burr, 121 Cal. 582, 54 Pac. 87.

And it is held in California that where a creditor obtains a judgment in personam and a decree foreclosing a mortgage given to secure the debt, execution issued for a balance reported and docketed after a sale of the mortgaged property cannot be levied upon homestead property which was not covered by the mortgage, where the declaration of homestead was filed and recorded before the balance was reported and docketed. Culver v. Rogers, 28 Cal. 520. This, of course, is upon the ground that the deficiency judgment did not become a lien until docketed.

As to the application to existing judgments of statute abolishing or diminishing exemptions, see the note to Laird v. Carton, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 189. L. A. W.

straining the enforcement of the judgment. Plaintiff presented a counter motion, based upon the facts stated, for an order directing the issuance of a special execution for the sale of that part of the lots which was included in the homestead assigned to defendant by the bankruptcy court, but which was not exempt as to plaintiff's claim. The court denied the motion to set the judgment aside, granted plaintiff's motion for a special execution, particularly designating the land to be sold thereunder, but ordered the enforcement of the judgment enjoined, except as to the particular land. Defendant appealed.

It is contended by defendant (1) that his discharge in bankruptcy annulled and discharged plaintiff's judgment, and that its enforcement should be perpetually enjoined; and (2) that the judgment did not create a lien upon the nonexempt land, because at the time of its entry the whole tract was exempt, and that, if plaintiff had a remedy for the enforcement of its claim against the same, it should have been asserted in a proceeding in equity before the discharge in bankruptcy, and, not having so proceeded, plaintiff has no further redress. We are unable to sustain either of these contentions.

1. Whether the judgment was annulled by the discharge in bankruptcy depends entirely upon the question whether it became, when docketed, a valid lien upon that part of the homestead assigned in the bankruptcy proceedings which was subject to the payment of this particular debt. If it so became a valid lien, the discharge in bankruptcy extinguished it only so far as concerned defendant's personal liability. The right to enforce the judgment against the specific property, not a part of the bankrupt estate, was not thereby extinguished or discharged. If no lien was created, then the rule laid down in Cavanaugh v. Fenley, 94 Minn. 505, 110 Am. St. Rep. 382, 103 N. W. 711, would apply. So the first contention of defendant depends upon the existence or nonexistence of a lien, and requires no further mention at present.

2. Whether the judgment became a lien upon the nonexempt land must be determined from our statutes upon the subject, and without reference to the bankruptcy proceedings in the Federal court. Plaintiff brought its action in the state court, as it had the right to do. It was an ordinary action at law for the recovery of money, and though it might have been stayed by proper application pending the bankruptcy proceedings, and plaintiff thus put to an equitable action to reach the nonexempt land, no stay was applied for, and the action proceeded to judgment. It did not, of course, operate upon or become a lien upon any of the property of defendant which passed upon the adjudication in bankruptcy to the bankrupt estate; nor did it create a personal liability against defendant, continuing after his discharge. But that it became a valid lien upon that part of the defendant's land which did not pass to the bankrupt estate because a part of the homestead under the then-existing statutes, that part of the present homestead which was subject to the payment of the debt when created, seems to us quite clear. Section 4272, R. L. 1905, provides that a judgment for the recovery of money from the time of docketing the same shall be a lien upon all real property in the county where docketed then or thereafter owned by the judgment debtor. This court has construed the statute as creating a lien upon every estate, legal or equitable, held or owned by the debtor, at the time of or subsequent to the rendition of the judgment. 2 Dunnell's Dig. 169, and cases cited. This land was subject to the payment of this particular debt. The legal title at the time the same was contracted, and when the judgment was recovered, stood in the name of defendant; and it was not necessary that the judgment affirmatively disclose the right of plaintiff to resort thereto for the collection of the amount due.

The creditor has an election of remedies in situations like that here presented,—that is, where property which is exempt from general debts, but liable for particular obligations, for instance, the purchase price, work, labor, and material furnished in its construction and repair; and he may proceed (1) in equity, setting forth in his complaint all the facts, and demand a lien upon the particular property; (2) he may proceed by attachment; or (3) by an ordinary action for the recovery of money. Langevin v. Bloom, 69 Minn. 22, 65 Am. St. Rep. 546, 71 N. W. 697; Nickerson v. Crawford, 74 Minn. 366, 73 Am. St. Rep. 354, 77 N. W. 292; Hasey v. McMullen, 109 Minn. 332, 123 N. W. 1078; Douglass v. Gregg, 7 Baxt. 384; Durham v. Bostick, 72 N. C. 357; Bills v. Mason, 42 Iowa, 329. The same result follows either remedy; namely, the appropriation of the property charged to the payment of the debt. And it would seem in this state, where all forms and distinctions between law and equity are abolished, to be immaterial which method is pursued.

The lots here involved, and not a part of the original homestead of defendant, are severable from lot 9, his homestead under the former statute. Separate buildings stand upon each tract, though they are, perhaps, joined together. But this latter fact in no way changes the rights of the parties. The nonexempt lots are of the value of $3,000, and it is clear that a statute increasing the homestead right to that extent, if that be the test of the constitutionality of the statute, would necessarily, as a matter of law, prejudice the rights of existing creditors and render the statute so increasing it invalid as to them, whether the rights be expressly protected by the statute changing the law or not. Dunn v. Stevens, 62 Minn. 380, 64 N. W. 924, 65 N. W. 348; Waples, Homestead & Exemptions, 277, 278.

It is not necessary in a case of this character, where the creditor elects to proceed at law by an ordinary action for the recovery of money, that the judgment record disclose the fact that particular property is subject to the payment of the claim. That fact may be established in subsequent proceedings by extrinsic evidence. Nor do we apprehend from this holding any particular difficulty, not now experienced, in the examination of abstracts of title to land. Prima facie a docketed judgment is a lien upon all land standing in the name of the debtor. The homestead, however, is exempt; but what land constitutes the homestead must be ascertained by inquiry. It is not disclosed by the record. When inquiry brings to light the homestead, then further inquiry will disclose whether it is subject to the payment of the particular judgment.

The case of Groves v. Osburn, 46 Or. 173, 79 Pac. 500, cited and relied upon by defendant, is not in point. There was no action or other proceeding in that case looking to the enforcement of the debt for which the homestead was liable until after the discharge of the bankrupt. The discharge extinguished the debt, and there was no basis for the subsequent action to enforce the claim. In the case at bar plaintiff proceeded before the discharge and obtained a lien upon the property. This distinguishes the two cases.

It follows that since plaintiff's judgment became a valid lien upon the property, and the remedy adopted for its enforcement is within the rules of procedure in such cases, the learned trial court properly disposed of the case.

Order affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 2.)

LAURA D. LINDSLEY, Resp't.,
v.

CLINTON L. CALDWELL, Appt.

(234 Mo. 498, 137 S. W. 983.)

Attorney and client — holding property to compel settlement of claim.

1. An attorney in whose name stock is placed under the express agreement that he would indorse and turn it over to his client cannot hold it to compel a settlement of his claim against the client; at least when, to his knowledge, the stock belongs to a stranger.

Contract — to defraud creditors — pari delicto — attorney and client.

2. An attorney in whose name his client has placed property for the purpose of defrauding the creditors of the client cannot refuse to comply with his agreement to return it, on the theory that the parties being in pari delicto, equity will leave them where it finds them.

(May 23, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis in plaintiff's favor in a suit to require defendant to indorse in blank and return to plaintiff's agent a certificate of stock belonging to her and to enjoin him from disposing of said stock. Affirmed.

Statement by Ferriss, J.:

This suit arises upon a bill in equity filed by plaintiff in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis against the defendant. The petition charges that W. H. Stevenson, acting as agent for plaintiff, Mrs. Lindsley, entered into an agreement with defendant to the effect that defendant should receive in his own name the certificate of stock alleged to belong to plaintiff for 60 shares of stock in the Helmbacher Forge & Rolling Mill Company, and indorse same in blank, and immediately transfer it to Stevenson as agent for plaintiff; that the certificate was so issued to defendant, and that defend-

Note. — Right of client to recover property placed in the name of his attorney in order to defraud creditors.

As stated in the leading case of Ford v. Harrington, 16 N. Y. 285, cited as LINDSLEY v. CALDWELL, "the question is, which rule is to govern the case, the one applicable to dealings between attorney and client, or the rule that the court will not lend its aid to either of the parties to an illegal or fraudulent contract?" And upon this question, while the cases are few, they are uniform to the effect that the former rule governs; that is, the parties are not regarded as be-ant refused to comply with the agreement so made; and the court is asked to decree that the said defendant holds said stock as trustee for plaintiff; also that defendant be enjoined from transferring said stock, and for other and further relief. Defendant in his answer alleged that the plaintiff had no title, right, or interest in such certificate; that she had unlawfully confederated with the said Stevenson, who was the real party in interest, to put herself forward in his place and stead as the owner of said stock; that said Stevenson was insolvent; that said Stevenson had owned certain shares of stock in the Bristol Realty Company, together with the participation contract of that company, and that, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, said Stevenson transferred said stock and contract to plaintiff, and that such transfer was made without the knowledge or co-operation of plaintiff, and that the bill of sale for same was not delivered to plaintiff until after this suit was instituted; that said shares of stock and contract were exchanged by Stevenson for other property, a part of which consisted of this 60 shares of stock of the Helmbacher Forge & Rolling Mill Company; that said stock was issued to plaintiff at the request of said Stevenson for the purpose, on the part of Stevenson, of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, and that this claim of ownership by the plaintiff is made in pursuance of the fraudulent plan of said Stevenson to conceal and cover up the proping in pari delicto, and the client is permitted to recover, notwithstanding the illegality of the conveyance, if no rights of innocent purchasers have intervened. 4 Cyc. 962.

As said in Goodenough v. Spencer, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 248: "Where one party, through the means of an unlawful agreement, acquires the property of another, the law regards them as equally in fault, and will do nothing for the redress or protection of either side. But when that advantage is secured by an attorney or counsel from his client, the parties are not considered as being equally in the wrong. The law then regards the client as being drawn into the violation of its provisions through the controlling influence of his attorney and counsel over him, and for that reason intervenes for his protection. . . . But that relief will not be carried so far as to disturb the rights of an innocent third party, who, in good faith, may have been induced to part with his money or his property, relying upon the title the attorney and counsel had the apparent right and power of transferring; the rule in that case being, that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud or misconduct of a third, the loss shall be borne by him who conferred upon the wrongdoer the means of deceiving persons honestly dealing with him."

So, where a client, under the advice and suggestion of his attorney and counsel, has executed and delivered to the latter, without consideration, a bill of sale of certain personal property, for the purpose of having such property held by the attorney for the sole use and enjoyment of the client so long as it is in danger of being seized by the latter's creditors for the payment of their debts, and after that danger has been avoided, restored again to him, the client may have the transfer annulled for his relief if that can be done without injury to an innocent purchaser. Ibid.

And where an attorney, upon the application of a client for advice merely as to whether a certain equitable interest which he has in land can be reached by a creditor for the satisfaction of his debt, suggests and recommends, for the purpose of defrauding the creditor, an assignment to himself of such equitable interest, which he procures from the client for a grossly inadequate consideration, promising to reconvey after an arrangement has been made with the creditor, the attorney will be compelled, at the suit of the heir of the client, to restore what he acquired under the assignment. Ford v. Harrington, supra.

In this case, the court further said: "The parties, although in delicto, did not stand in pari delicto. In the transaction, Conway [the client] was a mere instrument in the hands of the defendant [his attorney]. If an attorney will so far forget or wilfully disregard his duty to the courts, whose license to practise he holds; to his clients, who, in consequence of such license, are induced to seek and act upon his counsel; and to the public, as, for the purpose of gain and profit to himself, to induce by his advice the commission of fraud by those who thus confide in him, he at least should be compelled to restore to his victim the fruits of his iniquity."

And an attorney who suggests to, and obtains from, a client a conveyance of real property, for the purpose of defeating the claims of creditors of the client, cannot, under the rule of equity which denies relief to one party against another when both have been engaged in a fraudulent transaction, retain the property against the grantor, as the parties are not in pari delicto, and "equity will not tolerate the idea that an attorney may make use of his peculiar power over his client to procure a contract which is illegal and contrary to public policy, and then invoke the aid of the law to enable him to retain that which he has obtained through his fraudulent artifices." Herrick v. Lynch, 150 Ill. 283, 37 N. E. 221, affirming 49 Ill. App. 657.

Likewise, an executor who, acting upon the advice and under the direction of his attorney, upon whose counsel and direction he implicitly relied, has transferred to the attorney a mortgage and certain insurance policies, for the purpose of protecting them

erty so as to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors, and that the plaintiff and Stevenson unlawfully conspired for this purpose; that it was the purpose of Stevenson to cause the stock involved in this suit to be transferred to a holding corporation the stock of which was to be issued to the defendant and by him indorsed in blank and delivered to Stevenson. It will be perceived that the defendant does not allege any facts which would give him any interest or ownership in this stock. The case was tried before the court, and it developed in the evidence that the defendant asserted a claim against Stevenson for legal services rendered during a period of four or five years, during which time he was the confidential attorney and adviser of Stevenson in the various financial transactions developed in the evidence, which transactions, defendant claimed, were had on the part of Stevenson for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors. The defendant does not claim any ownership in this stock, but admits that he was holding it to force Stevenson to settle his claim for attorneys' fees. He claimed that Stevenson owed him $15,000, which claim Stevenson denied in toto. Defendant offered to return this stock to Stevenson if the latter would acknowledge in writing that he owed the defendant $15,000 for his services, which Stevenson refused to do. The plaintiff introduced evidence which tended to prove that she was the owner of this stock; that Stevenson was her agent; that all of the transactions, so far as she was concerned, were bona fide; that defendant had no claim against Stevenson for fees, and that he had been paid for all of his services. The pleadings were quite lengthy, and the transcript of the evidence presents a large record. It is unnecessary to go into the testimony in detail. The court found the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and ordered, adjudged, and decreed that defendant indorse to plaintiff and deliver to her or her counsel of record the certificate of stock described in the petition.

Mr. Robert F. Walker, for appellant:

Anyone against whom an action is brought growing out of or based upon an executory contract may plead fraud as a defense. The doctrine of in pari delicto applies to such cases in all of its fullness.

Mitchell v. Henley, 110 Mo. 598, 19 S. W. 993; Larimore v. Tyler, 88 Mo. 661; Fenton v. Ham, 35 Mo. 409; Sell v. West, 125 Mo. 621, 46 Am. St. Rep. 508, 28 S. W. 969.

Mr. Daniel Dillon, for respondent:

Where transfer of property is made from a client to his attorney (especially when made under the advice of the latter), for the purpose of defrauding creditors, parties are not regarded as in pari delicto, but the client will be relieved if it can be done without injury to an innocent purchaser.

Ferriss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. After a thorough consideration of the facts in evidence, we are of the opinion that the finding of the court in favor of the plaintiff is fully justified by the record. The evidence for the plaintiff is clear and satisfactory that she was the owner of this stock; that she had permitted Stevenson to use her property in St. Louis, not for the purpose of hindering and delaying his credagainst the creditors of the husband of the testatrix, may recover from the attorney the proceeds of such mortgage and policies, which the attorney has received, professing to the executor to act in his interest and in the interest of the estate, as the parties were not in pari delicto, and the attorney cannot invoke the rule that where one transfers property to another, for the purpose of cheating his creditors, the courts will not aid him to recover it back. Place v. Hayward, 117 N. Y. 487, 23 N. E. 25.

And in Freeloove v. Cole, 41 Barb. 318, affirmed in 41 N. Y. 619, where a grantee, while not in fact a licensed attorney, conducted cases in justices' courts and acted as the legal and confidential adviser to the grantor, who believed that he was a lawyer, the court said that the case was clearly within the principle of the case of Ford v. Harrington, supra; and it was held that 5 L.R.A.(N.S.)

where such a person, upon being applied to by a man of infirm mind, incompetent to manage and conduct his business with ordinary prudence and discretion, for advice to aid him in the disposition or conveyance of his property, obtains title to a farm, which is conveyed to him at his instance and upon his advice, to hinder and delay the owner's creditors, the grantee, being within the rule applicable to attorneys, cannot retain the property, but must convey it to the grantor's wife, in accordance with his oral agreement.

As to the recovery of nonexempt property conveyed, to avoid a nonexistent or unfounded demand, to one in a confidential relation, who induced the conveyance by false representations, see subdivision of subject note to Carson v. Beliles, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013.

itors, but as a loan to enable him to extricate himself from financial difficulty; and that he had so used the property; that this particular stock was placed in the name of the defendant, who was acting as attorney for plaintiff's agent, with the understanding and agreement that he was to indorse the certificate in blank and turn it over to plaintiff's agent; that defendant, in violation of this agreement, refused to turn over the stock; that he asserted no legal or equitable ownership in same, but held it for the avowed purpose of compelling Stevenson to give him a written acknowledgment that he (Stevenson) owed defendant $15,000 for legal services.

The defendant did not itemize his claim for services. He testified that he had not and could not render a bill. The evidence fails to establish that he had a claim against Stevenson to the amount of $15,000 or any other amount; that is to say, he gave no testimony which, even if true, would afford a satisfactory basis for a judgment in his favor against Stevenson in any amount for services rendered as an attorney. He stated in effect that he had represented Stevenson for four or five years, and that his services were worth $15,000; but it is unnecessary to decide whether defendant had a legal claim against Stevenson for services, because even if he had such claim, he had no right to hold this stock for the sole purpose of forcing a settlement with Stevenson. It was placed in his name as the confidential adviser of Stevenson, under an express agreement that he would immediately indorse and deliver it to Stevenson. Such action on his part is to be condemned if for no other reason than that it is violative of the confidential relation which existed between him and his client. This would be true if the stock in point of fact belonged to Stevenson. It is certainly true when the stock in point of fact belonged to plaintiff; especially where it may be fairly inferred that defendant, because of his knowledge of all of these transactions, knew that the stock belonged to the plaintiff.

2. The defendant, recognizing, no doubt, the weakness of his position so far as his attempt to hold this stock as security for his fees is concerned, defends upon the further ground that the transfer of this stock to him by Stevenson was made for the purpose of hindering and delaying the creditors of Stevenson; and he invokes the rule that where a conveyance is made for such purpose, and an attempt is made by the grantor to regain the property, equity, because of the corrupt purpose which prompted the conveyance, will leave the parties where it finds them. We are of the opinion, however, that this unhappy defense is not available to the defendant. The rule which he invokes does not apply to a case like this, where the grantee is the confidential attorney of the grantor, and receives the conveyance as such. The rule applicable to this case is clearly expressed in 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 338, and is as follows: "Even where the conveyance by the client to his attorney is for the declared purpose of hindering and delaying the creditors of the client, it cannot be sustained as against him by the attorney or his assignee with notice; the parties are not regarded as being in pari delicto, and equity will refuse to sustain such a conveyance." The leading case cited to support the text is Ford v. Harrington, 16 N. Y. 285, which held that, although the object of the assignment was to perpetrate a fraud on the creditors, yet, on account of the relations existing between attorney and client, the attorney must be compelled to restore what he had acquired under the assignment. Therefore, even if the defendant should succeed in establishing as a fact that Stevenson was the real owner of this stock, and that the purpose of the transfer of the stock to defendant was to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Stevenson, still the defendant would have no right to hold the stock as against Stevenson.

This case was very fully tried by the circuit court, and great latitude was allowed the defendant in the introduction of testimony and examination of witnesses. The findings of the court are fully sustained by the evidence, and its judgment and decree are affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

EDWIN ELMER KENDALL et al., Appts.,

v.

OLIVE LILLIAN TAYLOR et al.

(245 Ill. 617, 92 N. E. 562.)

Will — vested remainder — death without issue.

1. Under a devise to testator's two sons, and, in case of the death of either without

Note. — Does contingency of death without issue, children, etc., import their survival of first taker.

For annotation of the question as to the time to which the contingency of the death of a legatee or devisee without child or issue, upon which a gift is conditioned, is referable, see note to Smith v. Smith, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1045.

issue, his share to go to the survivor, and in case of the death of both without issue, or in the lifetime of testator, then the estate to go to another, the words "without issue" mean death without ever having had issue, and not death without issue living at the time thereof, so that the birth of issue and death of testator vests the fee in the sons.

Costs — solicitor's fee — partition — construction of will.

2. The mere fact that the construction of a will is necessary to determine whether or not the relief sought shall be granted in a proceeding to partition real estate is not sufficient to entitle defendant to an allowance of a solicitor's fee as costs, although the relief is denied.

(June 29, 1910.)

This note purposes to present only cases in which the question whether a contingency described as a dying without issue, or children, or some equivalent expression, is defeated by the birth of a child, seems to have been definitely before the court; to which end it has been necessary to exclude cases in which the only question involved was whether a definite or indefinite failure of issue was contemplated, although many of those which hold that the contingency has reference to a definite failure of issue express themselves in the phrase that a dying without issue living at the death of the first taker is meant. Where, however, it is determined that a definite failure of issue is intended, the further question may arise as to the nature of the contingency upon the happening of which the limitation over will take effect; and cases of this sort are, of course, in point in the present inquiry.

Nor has it been deemed proper to extend the scope of the note to include cases in which the question under discussion has been definitely foreclosed by the terms of the contingency, as where the limitation over is in the event of "leaving no issue" or "dying without issue surviving," although there are instances in which the courts have stated that the contingency thus phrased is not defeated by the birth of issue. A case of this sort is Wilkinson v. Boyd, 136 N. C. 46, 48 S. E. 516, where testator devised lands to a daughter in terms which gave her a defeasible fee, with the proviso that if she should die "without leaving lawful heirs begotten of her own body," then it should go to testator's other three children and their heirs, and in which it was held that the condition of the will would be fulfilled only if the devisee should have children living at the time of her death.

It may be stated in passing, however, that although the word "leaving" in a gift over upon death without leaving issue prima facie means leaving issue living at the death, the word "leaving" will in some cases be so construed as not to destroy prior vested interests; as in the instance 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Menard County in defendants' favor in an action brought to partition certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John M. Smoot, with Mr. L. A. Whipp, for appellants.

Mr. Milton McClure for appellees.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill filed in the circuit court of Menard county by the appellants, Edwin Elmer Kendall and Albert Leslie Kendall, for a partition of about 238 acres of land in that county. After issues were joined and a hearing had, the court ordered that the partition be made, but determined the of a gift to A for life, with a gift after his death to his children, so that they take vested interests at birth. See Theobald, Wills, 7th ed. p. 705.

The question being purely one of construction, and the decisions usually containing little discussion of the grounds upon which they are based, it is not possible to deduce any general rules, other than that where the provisions of the will or deed and the accompanying circumstances make it seem more likely that the grantor or testator meant rather to put it in the power of the first taker to provide for his family, if any, than to benefit the persons to whom the property is limited over, the contingency will be held to relate to the birth of issue rather than to their survival of the first taker; and that where there is a gift of the remainder to the issue or children, an additional reason for holding the contingency to be defeated by the birth of a child is found in the preference of the courts for a construction which will not divest a remainder once vested.

The statement made in KENDALL v. TAYLOR, that "it is the settled rule of law that the courts are inclined to construe the words 'die without issue,' or words of similar import, to mean 'die without having had issue,' unless there are expressions or circumstances from which it can be collected that these words are used in a more restricted sense," has no basis in authority except the case of Voris v. Sloan, 68 Ill. 588, and the other Illinois cases decided on the strength of it. Now, the court in Voris v. Sloan based its decision on the language of the master of the rolls in Barlow v. Salter, 17 Ves. Jr. 479, which was regarded as stating a rule of construction controlling the case. This language, however, did not relate to the question whether a contingency described as a dying without issue refers to a dying without having had issue born, or a dying without issue surviving, but to the totally distinct question as to whether the phrase had reference to a definite or indefinite failure of issue; the statement therein made that "it is now settled that, unless there are ex-interests of appellants in the land to be different from that prayed for by them. From this decree they have appealed to this court.

The decision in this case hinges upon the construction to be given to the will of Francis M. Kendall, which, so far as it bears on the issues here, reads as follows: "I give, bequeath, and devise all of my estate, both real and personal, wherever situate, to my two sons, Edwin Elmer Kendall and Albert Leslie Kendall, share and share alike, and in case of the death of either of my said sons without issue, then the estate hereinbefore devised to him shall go to the survivor of them, and in case of the death of both of my said sons without issue, or in case of the death of both of said sons prior to my decease, then in such case, or either of them, I devise all of my estate, of every kind and character, to my sister, Olive Lillian Taylor, and my half-brothers, Orren Kendall and David Miles Kendall, share and share alike, to have and to hold the same forever."

At the time the will was executed, December 15, 1896, the testator was forty-two years old. Edwin Elmer Kendall was then fourteen years old and Albert Leslie Kendall seven years of age. The testator died May 22, 1909, and the will was duly admitted to probate. He left no widow, and appellants herein were his only children and heirs at law. Both sons are still living, Edwin having a daughter, five years of age, and Albert a son about one year of age. The decision in this case hinges upon the construction to be given to the will of Francis M. Kendall, which, so far as it bears on the issues here, reads as follows: "I give, bequeath, and devise all of my estate, both real and personal, wherever situate, to my two sons, Edwin Elmer Kendall and Albert Leslie Kendall, share and share alike, and in case of the death of either of my said sons without issue, then the estate hereinbefore devised to him shall go to the survivor of them, and in case of the death of both of my said sons without issue, or in case of the death of both of said sons expressions or circumstances from which it can be collected that these words are used in a more confined sense, they are to have their legal signification, viz., death without issue generally," meaning only that such phrase presumably refers to an indefinite failure of issue. The rule stated by the Illinois court is, therefore, without force outside that state. This animadversion upon the ground of decision in Voris v. Sloan is not intended to impugn the correctness of the construction given to the deed therein under consideration, which, indeed, accords with the second of the two general rules above stated.

In Isbell v. Maclin, 24 Ala. 315, where testator gave his entire estate to his half-sister "upon the following conditions: should she marry and have lawful issue, the said property is to go to her and her heirs; but in case my said half-sister should die without any lawful issue," then to another, it was held that the estate of the half-sister became absolute upon her marrying and having lawful issue. In English v. McCreary, 157 Ala. 487, 48 So. 113, where a testator, after giving shares in his estate to his daughters in terms which, standing alone, would create a fee tail estate, which by the statute would be converted into a fee simple, further provided, "should any of my youngest children die before having or leaving any heir, then their shares to be divided between the remainder or surviving part of said four younger children," it was held that, conceding, without deciding, that this was intended as a limitation upon the death of the daughter, and not of the testator, and that it was intended as a restriction upon the estate of the daughters, it did no more than postpone the vesting of the fee until the having of a child, as there was no attempt to entail the property except in case the four younger children died before having or leaving a child.

In King v. King, 215 Ill. 100, 74 N. E. 89, where a testator devised realty to his daughter in terms which, standing alone, would give her the fee, and further provided that in case of her death without issue, the property should revert to his lawful heirs, it was held upon the authority of Voris v. Sloan, infra, that the contingency should be construed as meaning without having had issue, and not as without surviving issue.

In Stafford v. Read, 244 Ill. 138, 91 N. E. 91, where a testator, after directing a sum of money to be laid out in land for a grandson "and the brothers and sisters which he had or may hereafter have, all to share equally," provided that if the grandson and his brothers and sisters should die without issue, then the said land should revert to testator's children, it was held that, in view of the intention manifested by the testator to make provision for the grandson and his brothers and sisters, and the children that might be born to them or one or more of them, and the fact that he did not have in contemplation or attempt to provide for the contingency of a death of children born to them before their deaths, the words "shall die without issue," were not intended to mean without issue or children surviving the first takers at the time of their death, but meant if they should die without having had issue or children born to them.

In Essick v. Caple, 131 Ind. 207, 30 N. E. 900, it was held that under a devise of certain lands to a daughter, followed by a provision that in the event that she "should die having no heirs born to her, then the above-described land is to revert back to my estate, and be divided equally among my heirs, and the same is not to be sold or conveyed until after there shall be an heir born to the body of said daughter," the daughter took a conditional fee, subject to termination in the event she should die without living heirs born to her during her life.

In McGennis v. McGennis, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 598, 29 S. W. 333, it was held that under a conveyance to the grantor's daughter "and her body heirs, if any," containing the provision, "in the event she has no children, then the land hereinafter described is to revert back to my estate," the fee taken by the grantee by virtue of a statute age. These two infant grandchildren of the testator, his sister, Olive Lillian Kendall, and his two half-brothers, Orren Kendall and David Miles Kendall (the last named being also executor), were made parties defendant to the bill and are appellees here. The decree found that the will should be so construed that appellants each take a base or determinable fee in the real estate as tenants in common; that the phrase "without issue," as used in the will, means "without leaving issue living at the time of said complainants' decease;" and that, in case of the death of either of said appellants without leaving issue living at the time of his decease, the title to the real estate would vest as a base or determinable fee in the survivor of said two sons; that, in case of the death of both of said sons without either of them leaving issue living at the time of the decease of such sons, then the title to such real estate should vest in the sister and two half-brothers, share and share alike, in fee simple absolute. The decree also provided that "since the principal relief sought in this proceeding is the construction of the will involved herein, and since such construction and determination of the legal effect of said will was necessary to determine the character of partition to be allowed," $250 be fixed as the fee for the solicitor for the defendants and taxed as costs.

The principal contention in this case is as to whether the trial court properly converting estates tail into fees became perfect and absolute upon the birth of children to her, rather than upon the condition that she should die leaving children surviving her.

In Dashiell v. Dashiell, 2 Harr. & G. 127, where a testator bequeathed to his granddaughter certain negroes, adding, "and in case it should please God to take my granddaughter Elizabeth Sarah Ann before she has an issue, then the said negroes devised to be an equal division between the rest of my heirs," it was held that the obvious meaning of the terms used was that, as soon as the granddaughter had a child, the limitation over as an executory disposition of the property was absolutely gone forever.

In Clough v. Clough, 64 N. H. 509, 15 Atl. 127, where a testator devised property to a niece, her heirs and assigns, "if she should have living issue, if she should not have any issue, then to have and use the occupancy of said premises during her natural life," it was held that there being no express condition making a devise of a fee to the niece to depend upon her issue continuing to live as long as she should, and as the will did not show that the testator used the terms "having living issue" in any other than their literal sense, or with an implied qualification that the niece's issue must survive her, the niece took a fee upon giving birth to living issue.

In Sadler v. Wilson, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 296, where a testator devised certain lands and negroes to his children with the proviso, "should any of my children die before they have lawful heirs of their body, the property of my child that may decease shall be equally divided among my children that may survive," it was held that the fee taken by each child was contingent upon the birth of issue, the court saying: "The testator meant, if his children should have issue, that they should have the means of advancing them in their lives, and not that they should be restricted to the power of disposing of the estate, if they should leave issue at their deaths. This not only results from the terms of the limitation over, but from the consideration that it is not confined to the land, but embraces all the property bestowed by the testator on his children; without which they could make no provision for their families."

In Moore v. Feig, 17 Ohio C. C. 27, 9 Ohio C. D. 680, where testator, after devising "the bulk of his property to his son John, provided: "Now if my said son John shall have an heir of his own body, then all title and interest in and to my real estate, with power to convey and sell, shall vest in him. But if said John should die leaving no heir of his own body, then said estate shall pass to my son Thomas, subject to the same requirements, restrictions, and limitations pertaining to John. And in case Thomas should die and leave no heir of his own body, then it is my will that my said real estate pass absolutely to my son James and his heirs forever, with power to sell and convey. But in no case shall John or Thomas sell or dispose of said real estate unless they shall have an heir of their own bodies,"—it was held that upon the birth of a child to him, John became the owner of the realty in fee; such construction being strengthened by the circumstance that John was required by the will to pay a considerable sum of money to other persons as a condition upon which he should hold whatever estate was granted to him in the will, and by the provision that in no case John or Thomas should sell or dispose of said estate unless they should have an heir of their own bodies.

In McCullough v. Johnetta Coal Co. 210 Pa. 222, 59 Atl. 984, where a testatrix, after directing the investment of money in lands for her son, went on to provide that should the son die without issue, the land should be sold and the proceeds divided among her brothers and sisters or other heirs, but should the son have heirs or issue, then the land should be his and his heirs, it was held that, apart from any rule of construction which would operate to the same end by giving the son an estate tail which by statute would become a fee, the manifest intention of the mother was that whenever her son should have issue, the land should become his in fee simple.

strued by its decree the will in question. The decision rests upon whether the words of the will "death without issue" shall be construed to mean "death without having had issue" or "death without issue surviving." The courts are disposed to favor such a construction of the will as to give the absolute fee to the first taker, so as not to tie up the property and prevent its alienation (Bradsby v. Wallace, 202 Ill. 239, 66 N. E. 1088), and a construction is uniformly adopted which favors the heir (Kohtz v. Eldred, 208 Ill. 60, 69 N. E. 900). In Voris v. Sloan, 68 Ill. 588, the words "should die without issue" occurred in a deed of trust, and were construed to mean without having had issue,—not without surviving issue. To the same effect are Smith

v. Kimbell, 153 Ill. 368, 38 N. E. 1029; Field v. Peoples, 180 Ill. 376, 54 N. E. 304; King v. King, 215 Ill. 100, 74 N. E. 89. In Stafford v. Read, 244 Ill. 138, 91 N. E. 91, this court, after discussing the authorities just referred to and several others that are cited and relied on by counsel for appellees in this case, construed the words "shall die without issue" as meaning, "if they should die without having had issue or children born to them."

Counsel for appellees argue that the words "die without issue" are construed by the courts to mean "die without having had issue" only when the first taker is vested with a life estate; but that where the first taker receives the fee and the language of the will makes the title return

In Murrell v. Mathews, 1 Brev. 190, where a testator after devising all his lands to his son "and the lawfully begotten heirs of his body," went on to provide, "but in case he the lawfully begotten heirs should die without a lawfully begotten heir," the property should go to another, it was held that the son took an estate in fee simple conditional at common law, and that by having issue the condition was performed so as to enable him to alien: and that having aliened after such performance, in the lifetime of the issue, the estate as aliened became absolute in the purchaser.

And in Graham v. Moore, 13 S. C. 115, testator devised property to a grandson with the proviso that if the grandson should die not having any male heir, then the land should be the property of his brother, and, after making several similar devises to others of his grandsons, proceeded: "And my will is, and be it well understood, that the before-mentioned lands that is hereby willed to the before-mentioned legatees shall not be alienated or conveyed by them nor their heirs, but shall at each of their deaths descend to each of their oldest male heirs, and so on in regular succession." It was held that, reading the two clauses of the will together, their effect was to create a fee conditional in the grandson, so that an alienation by him after the birth of issue was good, not only to cut off the descent to his male heir per formam doni, but to defeat the reversion to the testator or his heirs upon the failure of such issue, even though such issue may have died before him.

In Pearce v. Pearce, — Tex. —, 134 S. W. 210, where a testator devised lands to his daughter and the heirs of her body to be born, adding that on the death of either of his children without heirs of their body, the property given to them should return to the body of his estate, to be divided between the survivors, it was held that the fee-simple estate created in the daughter became absolute upon the birth of a child. It is difficult to say, however, whether the court in this case actually meant to decide 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) the question, it appearing that the daughter had died leaving issue surviving.

In Chaplin v. Doty, 60 Vt. 712, 50 Atl. 362, where a testator gave the residue of his estate to his granddaughter, "to be for the proper use and benefit of herself and heirs forever," further providing that "if she shall not marry, or, marrying, shall have no issue living," she should take a life interest only, but if she should "die without lawful issue living," then the residue should go to others, it was held that if the granddaughter should marry and have issue living, the first provision in the clause would have effect and govern the gift; so that the words, "shall die without lawful issue living," mean and are to be read as if they ran, "without having had lawful issue living."

In Yocum v. Parker, 130 Fed. 722, reversed on other grounds in 66 C. C. A. 80, 130 Fed. 770, where a testator devised lands to a son absolutely "with the express understanding and restriction, viz., that if my said son dies without legal issue, descendants of his, legitimate issue of his, said lands shall pass to" others, it was held that when a legitimate child was born to the son, the contingency on which the absolute estate was dependent occurred, and thereupon the estate in the son became complete in fee simple.

In Weakley ex dem. Knight v. Rugg, 7 T. R. 322, a testator having three daughters made trifling bequests to two of them and then gave a leasehold estate "to his daughter Ann, but if she should happen to die without having child or children lawfully begotten, then he willed that the said premises should be and remain to his daughter Mary, and after her to such child or children as she should happen to have lawfully begotten." Ann was also the residuary legatee. It was held that both by the fair grammatical construction of the will, and in view of the fact that Ann was the great object of testator's bounty, it must be deemed to have been his general intention that her family should first be provided for; and that her estate therefore upon his dying "without issue," then such first taker only takes a base or qualified fee. No such distinction is made by the authorities in construing the words "die without issue." Their meaning is not controlled by the question whether the first taker has a life estate or a greater or less estate, but rests rather upon the connection in which such words are used and the intention of the testator, as shown by the entire will. It is the settled rule of law that the courts are inclined to construe the words "die without issue," or words of similar import, to mean "die without having had issue," unless there are "expressions or circumstances from which it can be collected that these words are used in a more restricted sense." Voris v. Sloan, supra. And see also Kales, Future Interests, § 199; Fifer v. Allen, 228 Ill. 507, 81 N. E. 1105.

Counsel for the appellees earnestly insists that there are such expressions or circumstances which would require the estate to become absolute upon her giving birth to a child, as otherwise, if she had a child who died in her lifetime, leaving children, such children could not have taken at all, whereas, the prior limitation to Ann being out of the way, the instant Mary had a child the estate would have vested in that child without any regard to such child surviving his mother.

In Wall v. Tomlinson, 16 Ves. Jr. 413, 10 Revised Rep. 212, where a residuary bequest was made to one "forever, in case she should have legitimate children; in failure of which" it was to go to others, it was held that as the testator's object appears to have been, in the event of legatee's having children, to give her the means of making a provision for them, and as it was difficult to give the words "in failure of which" the construction of not leaving children at her death, which would tie the property up during her whole life, the legatee's estate became absolute upon her giving birth to a living child.

In Jeffreys v. Conner, 28 Beav. 328, where a testator, having given certain leasehold and personal property to his son, and certain other property to his daughter, further provided: "And it is my desire that if my son Charles die without having any child or children, then the whole of the houses and property left to him shall become the property of my said daughter Elizabeth Jeffreys and my said niece Elizabeth Knights. . . . And should my son Charles and daughter Eliza die without any child or children, then the whole of the property to become the property of my niece Elizabeth Knights aforesaid,"—it was held that although it was a very capricious disposition on the part of the testator, the only way of solving the difficulty occasioned by the first and second limitations over was to hold that dying "without having any child or children" in the first limitation means, "without having had any child," and that dying "without any child or children" in the second limitation meant dying "without any child or children living at the death," as otherwise it would be a question whether the first clause must be altered to agree with the second, or the second to agree with the first; and therefore, the son having had a child, the gift over did not take effect.

In Re Johnston, 12 Ont. L. Rep. 262, where a testatrix gave to her adopted daughter certain realty "for her sole use and benefit forever," further providing that in the event of the adopted daughter dying without issue, all her interest in the estate should lapse, it was held that there being no gift over, the provision might be regarded as intended to enable the devisee to make provision for her family, so that she would take an absolute estate in fee upon giving birth to a child.

In Turney v. Sparks, 88 Mo. App. 363, where a testator, after giving his daughter his entire estate, subject to the payment of a legacy to a grandson, provided that should the grandson die without bodily heirs the legacy should become the property of the daughter, and that all the property bequeathed to the daughter should belong to the grandson should the daughter die without bodily heirs, it was held to have been testator's intention to give his daughter a life estate in his realty, to ripen into an absolute fee should she give birth to a living child, or should the grandson die without issue during her life.

In Voris v. Sloan, 68 Ill. 588, where a father conveyed property in trust for his daughter, and the heirs of her body forever, during her natural life, with a remainder to the heirs of her body, and in case she should die without issue, then the legal title to revert to the grantor or his heirs, it was held that, as there was nothing in the language of the deed implying any intention to restrict the vesting of title to the heirs the daughter might leave at her death, the remainder vested on the birth of children, thereby defeating the limitation over.

In Field v. Peeples, 180 Ill. 376, 54 N. E. 304, where a testator devised to his daughter certain real estate for life, "and at her death to descend to her children, and in case she dies without issue," then to others, it was held upon the authority of Voris v. Sloan, supra, that the words, "in case she dies without issue," should be construed to mean "without having had issue," not "without surviving issue."

In Williams v. Leech, 28 Pa. 89, where a devise to testator's daughters for life, with remainder to their children and their heirs, was followed by the proviso, "and if either of my children should die without issue, their portion shall be equally divided among the survivors," it was held that the remainder vested in the children's children as soon as born, and the devise over fell entirely. The court said: "It may be thought unreasonable that the devise over should be defeated by the birth of children stances as would lead to the conclusion that these words were not here used with their primary meaning. We cannot assent to this view. The intention of the testator as expressed in the will must be ascertained and given effect if not prohibited by law. Armstrong v. Barber, 239 Ill. 389, 88 N. E. 246, and cases cited. The intention of the testator, gathered from the entire will, manifestly was that, if both of appellants had issue born to them, then the entire estate should vest in said appellants, share and share alike. This conclusion, in our judgment, must necessarily follow under the general rules of law laid down in this and other jurisdictions as to the construction of wills, as well as from the decisions of this court in applying those rules to particular cases. The birth of a child to each of appellants settled any controversy that might arise in regard to the land ever passing to appellees. The chancellor should who may have died within a few months; but we are only following the testator's law of descent, and not making one. Besides, it is quite as reasonable that the mother should succeed in title to her children, as that their aunts should. And these children might have lived to have grandchildren and then died before their mother, and thus nothing would have gone to their descendants, if the vesting of the remainder depended upon the children's surviving the life estate. And to make the vesting depend upon the surviving would be just as uncertain as the other extreme, for the mother might die a day before, or a day after, even her infant children. This land vested in the children on their birth, and descended on their death to their parent, but subject to open again to let in the right of other children, when born, for their shares; and the devise over fell entirely, never to rise again."

In the cases which follow, however, the contingency was held to refer to a dying without leaving issue or children surviving.

In Morgan v. Morgan, 5 Day, 517, where the testator, after devising land to his sons, "their heirs and assigns forever," subsequently provided that if they should either of them die without children, his brothers should have his part in equal proportion, it was held that as in the mind of the testator, had he foreseen the event of the birth and death of a grandson without having had children before the death of his father, the same reason would have existed for designating the person or persons to succeed to the estate as would be on the death of either son without children living at the time of the son's death, the will would not be construed as limiting a son's estate over only in case of his dying, living the others, without having had children; but that the contingency referred to his dying without having children living at the time of his decease.

In Gannon v. Peterson, 193 Ill. 372, 55 L.R.A. 701, 62 N. E. 210, where a testator, after devising certain realty to his three sons, their heirs and assigns forever, continued: "It is my will that upon the death of either of them, the surviving brother or brothers shall take such share, like and like; to have and to hold the same to him or them or his and their heirs forever; and in case all three should die without issue, then it is my will that the above-mentioned property in this bequest go to" certain others, it was held that by the use of the word "issue" the testator meant that children should survive the sons, or some one of them, as a condition upon which the fee should become absolute, and that upon failure of such children, the estate should vest by executory devise in the other persons mentioned.

In Wells v. Offutt, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 931, 53 S. W. 530, where testator, after directing his executors to pay over to a daughter the interest on a sum of money so long as they should have the money on interest, added: "But it is my desire that they should lay it out in some realty for her and lawful heirs of her body, and if she should not have any, it shall be returned to her brothers and sisters, to be divided equally between them," it was held that the phraseology of the provision disclosed an intention that the fee taken by the daughter should not become indefeasible upon her giving birth to a child, but only in the event of her death leaving children surviving her, as this was the only time when the devise over to the brothers and sisters would begin, if at all.

In Calmes v. Jones, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 504, 63 S. W. 583, where a father conveyed land to his daughter by deed containing a condition that in case of her death without children before that of the grantor, the land should revert to him, and that if she should die after the grantor, without issue, then the property should go to others, it was held that as the title could not become indefeasible in the lifetime of the grantor unless at the time of her death the daughter left issue, it was to be presumed that the grantor intended, in the use of the words "dying without children," and "dying without issue," to convey the same idea that he would have conveyed had he used the words "dying without leaving children," and "dying without leaving issue."

In Dorr v. Johnson, 170 Mass. 540, 49 N. E. 919, where a testator gave his entire estate in trust for a granddaughter, further providing that in case of her decease without issue it should be divided in a manner specified, it was held that if the words "without issue" mean a definite failure of issue, the granddaughter took an estate in fee simple, terminable upon her dying without issue then living.

In Perrett v. Bird, 152 N. C. 220, 67 S. E. 507, where a testator, after devising lands to a son and the lawful heirs of his body, lawfully begotten, further provided have entered a decree partitioning the lands in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

Counsel for appellants further insist that the trial court erred in taxing the solicitor's fees of appellees' counsel as costs. It is admitted that the fees are reasonable for the work performed, but it is argued that appellees should personally pay these fees. The general rule is that, when the testator has expressed his intention in his will so ambiguously as to make it necessary to go into a court of chancery to get a construction of the will in order to determine which of two or more adverse claims to the same fund or property is valid, the costs of the litigation should be borne by the fund or property in question. Arnold v. Alden, 173 Ill. 229, 50 N. E. 704; Lombard v. Whitbeck, 173 Ill. 396, 51 N. E. 61; Woman's Union Missionary Soc. v. Mead, 131 Ill. 338, 23 N. E. 603; Straw v. East Maine Conference, 67 Me. 493; Deane v. Home for Aged Colored Women, 111 Mass. 132; Noe v. Miller, 31 N. J. Eq. 234; Ingraham v. Ingra- that in case of the death of either of his three children, "their portion of my estate shall revert to the surviving one; and in case they all die without heirs of their bodies, lawfully begotten, then it shall go to my oldest children," it was held that the son took a fee which remained defeasible although he had several children, the contingency being determinable only upon his death.

In Dawson v. Ennett, 151 N. C. 543, 66 S. E. 566, where testator devised property to his grandchild with the proviso that if she should "die without an issue," then over, it was held that the grandchild took an estate in fee simple, defeasible on her dying without issue living at the time of her death, so that the contingency had not been satisfied by her having had a child which had died.

In Piatt v. Sinton, 37 Ohio St. 353, where testator devised property to one with the proviso that in case she should die without leaving any legitimate heirs of her body, it should go to certain others, it was held that whether the devise over would ever take effect could not be determined until the first taker's death.

In Re Booth [1900] 1 Ch. 768, where testator devised one half of his estate to a niece "for her own absolute use, subject to no control of any husband, but should she die without child or children," then over, it was held that although the case was one of some difficulty, yet, having regard to the form of expression used, the true meaning of the contingency was "dying without child or children then living."

The words "die without children" are said to have been construed in Re Hambleton [1884] W. N. p. 157, cited in [1900] 1 Ch. 768, as signifying "die without having had a child;" but the report being inaccessible, it is not possible to state the grounds of the decision.

In Thicknesse v. Liege, 3 Bro. P. C. 365, where a testator gave his residuary estate to his daughter for life, and after her death to be divided amongst her issue when the youngest of them should be twenty-one years old, but if the daughter should happen to die without any child, or the youngest of them should not arrive to twenty-one years, and none of them should have left lawful issue, then to other persons, it was held that upon the death of the daughter without any child or issue of any child then living, the devise over took effect, al- though she had had children, who had died in her lifetime.

In Re Denton, 137 N. Y. 428, 33 N. E. 432, where testator gave his residuary estate to his four children, adding: "and in case of the death of either of them leaving issue before either of the different parts thereof as hereinbefore mentioned can be divided, then such issue to take the share or part the parent would have been entitled to if living; if without issue, then the survivors to take," it was held that the contingency expressed by the last clause of the proviso was not eliminated by a son's having had issue in his lifetime, but that such clause is an elliptical form of expression, and is antithetic to the first clause, which relates to the time of the death of the son.

In Parish v. Ferris, 6 Ohio St. 563, in which the question before the court was whether or not a definite failure of issue was intended, it was held that the limitation over in a will in the event of a daughter's death without children took effect although it appeared that she had given birth to a child, which, however, did not survive her.

In Korn's Will, 128 Wis. 428, 107 N. W. 659, where a testator devised a farm to his son with the further provision that in case of the death of the son without issue, then and in that event the property should go to testator's grandchild or grandchildren who might be living at the time of the death of such son, the suggestion was offered by counsel that the condition upon which the son's estate was to terminate had been rendered impossible by the fact of issue born to him, but the court held that the construction of the phrase "death without issue" as "death without issue born" was excluded, except where clearly intended, by a statute providing that "when a remainder shall be limited to take effect on the death of any person without heirs or heirs of his body, or without issue, the words 'heirs' or 'issue' shall be construed to mean heirs or issue living at the death of the person named as ancestor." The court in this instance evidently mistook the purport of the statute, which is, to preserve the probable intention of the testator by preventing a construction which would, by imputing to the phrase the signification of indefinite failure of issue, give the first taker an estate tail and thereby defeat the limitation over.

ham, 169 Ill. 432, 48 N. E. 561, 49 N. E. 320. This is not a bill for the construction of a will, but for the partitioning of real estate. No trust was created by the will and no grounds are alleged in the bill that would give a court of equity jurisdiction in the case except that partition is sought of the lands of testator. Under the rules governing the allowance of solicitor's fees in partition proceedings, appellees are not entitled to the payment of such fees out of the funds of the estate. Bliss v. Seeley, 191 Ill. 461, 61 N. E. 524; McMullen v. Reynolds, 209 Ill. 504, 70 N. E. 1041; Jones v. Young, 228 Ill. 374, 81 N. E. 1042; Mulloy v. Mulloy, 231 Ill. 285, 83 N. E. 158. On the facts shown on this record, the circuit court erred in allowing solicitors' fees to appellees.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF LOUISIANA
v.
SPENCER THOMAS, Appt.
(127 La. 576, 53 So. 868.)

Homicide—shooting bystander.

One hitting a bystander when shooting at another with intent to kill the latter may be convicted therefor, under a statute pro-

Note.—Assault with intent to murder or kill by unlawful act aimed at another than the one injured.

Injuring other than person intended.

It is well settled that one who, in an attempt to kill another person, injures a third, is guilty of assault with intent to murder or kill the latter.

Thus, a conviction for assault with intent to kill will be sustained where one shoots at a person with felonious intent, but misses him, and wounds another not intended, the felonious intent being transferred to the person injured, rendering the assailant as guilty as though the person intended had been shot. State v. Montgomery, 91 Mo. 52, 3 S. W. 379.

So, one who, while trying to murder one person, unintentionally cuts another, is guilty of assault with intent to murder the latter, under a statute providing if one intending to commit a felony, in the act of executing it, by mistake or accident, do another act which, if voluntarily doing for the punishment of whoever shall shoot any person with a dangerous weapon with intent to commit murder.

(November 28, 1910.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Tangipahoa convicting him of shooting with intent to commit murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. C. Reid and S. Reid, for appellant:

An assault with intent to murder involves the concurrence of two distinct elements,—an intent to murder, and an assault or attempt to carry out that intention.

People v. Devine, 59 Cal. 630; White v. State, 3 Tex. App. 605; Bass v. State, 6 Baxt. 581; State v. Evans, 39 La. Ann. 912, 3 So. 63.

The intent to commit the specific crime is the essence of the offense.

Simpson v. State, 59 Ala. 1, 31 Am. Rep. 1; Smith v. State, 83 Ala. 20, 3 So. 551; Felker v. State, 54 Ark. 489, 16 S. W. 663; People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 41, 22 Pac. 80; State v. Fiske, 63 Conn. 388, 28 Atl. 572; Hamilton v. People, 113 Ill. 34, 55 Am. Rep. 396; Crosby v. People, 137 Ill. 325, 27 N. E. 49; State v. White, 41 Iowa, 316, 20 Am. Rep. 602; State v. Neal, 37 Me. 468; Botsch v. State, 43 Neb. 501, 61 N. W. 730; Slattery v. People, 58 N. Y. 354.

It is not sufficient to prove a general felonious intent.

Ogletree v. State, 28 Ala. 693; Simpson v. State, 59 Ala. 1, 31 Am. Rep. 1; Morgan v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 242; Jones v.

done, would be a felony, he shall receive the punishment fixed by law to the offense actually committed. Smith v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 95 S. W. 1057.

So, in Vandermark v. People, 47 Ill. 122, a conviction for assault with intent to commit murder was sustained where a person shot at one, and accidentally hit another, the act of the party in shooting recklessly, regardless of the lives of others, being construed as implying general malice.

It is held in O'Rear v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1537, 78 S. W. 407, that one who, in striking at a person in self-defense, wounds another, is not guilty of maliciously stabbing the latter.

Mistaking identity of person injured.

If A, intending to murder B, shoots C, supposing C to be B, and wounds C, he is guilty of an assault with intent to murder C. Notwithstanding A's mistake, C is the person whom he assaulted, and whom he intended to kill. People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141.

State, 11 Smedes & M. 315; State v. Gainus, 86 N. C. 632.

When one intending to kill A shoots and wounds B, or if it be doubtful which he shoots at, he cannot be convicted of an assault with intent to kill B.

Mr. R. G. Pleasant, with Messrs. Walter Gulon, Attorney General, and W. H. McClendon, for the State:

When parties engaged in the commission of a crime with malicious intent, and in the execution thereof, perpetrate another criminal act, not originally intended, the unintended act derives its character from

So, under statute providing that "every person who shall be convicted of an assault or an assault and battery upon another, with any deadly weapon, with intent to kill and murder such other person, shall be punished," etc., one who, while attempting to kill and murder an enemy in the darkness, dangerously wounds a friend by mistake, is guilty of assault "with intent to kill and murder." McGehee v. State, 62 Miss. 772, 52 Am. Rep. 209.

On trial for assault with intent to kill, it was held in State v. Jump, 90 Mo. 171, 2 S. W. 279, that where one threw a rock at a person, and by mistake hit another, he was liable in law for all the consequences of his act, unless he acted in self-defense.

In Olds v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 411, 113 S. W. 272, which affirmed a conviction of assault with intent to murder, and where it was claimed that accused struck one, mistaking her for another, it was said: "Appellant intended either to kill, or he intended to inflict injury of some character upon, the woman that he did strike, and the fact that he made a mistake, or may have made a mistake, under such circumstances, would not justify him, for the law does not authorize him to strike either woman, under the facts stated. Under no view of the law would a mistake of this sort relieve criminality. The purpose of the defendant was to inflict injury, it was intentional, although, under his theory, he may have made a mistake in the individual he intended to strike."

So, a conviction for assault with intent to murder was affirmed in State v. West, 152 N. C. 832, 68 S. E. 14, where accused shot a person in the darkness, mistaking him for one whom he intended to kill.

So, in Reg. v. Lynch, 1 Cox, C. C. 361, where accused wounded one, supposing him to be another, he was held guilty of the charge of cutting and wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm.

Shooting into crowd.

In Phillips v. United States, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 628, 103 Pac. 861, it is held that 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the intended act, and the original malicious intent affects both acts.

State v. Vines, 34 La. Ann. 1083, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 296; State v. Salter, 48 La. Ann. 204, 19 So. 265; 4 Bl. Com. chap. 14, p. 192.

Provosty, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The accused quarreled with one Washington in front of the latter's house, walked about 200 yards away, and procured a gun, and returned, and, without excuse, fired at Washington, wounding both him and one Alma Meyers, who was on the gallery of the house back of him. The indictment reads that the defendant "wilfully, feloniously, and of his malice aforethought, did shoot Alma Meyers with a dangerous weapa person who fires a gun into a crowd, not caring whom he may kill, with the intention of killing someone of them, is guilty of assault with intent to kill each of them.

In Bray v. State, 118 Ga. 786, 45 S. E. 597, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 694, the indictment charged the accused with assault with intent to murder a named person with a rock. Upon the trial the evidence tended to show that the accused wantonly threw a rock likely to produce death if hitting a person in a vital spot, into a street railroad passenger car occupied by a number of passengers, one of whom was the person alleged to have been so assaulted, and whom the rock came near striking. It did not appear that the accused knew such person or any of the other passengers, or that he intended to hit any particular person in the car. No one was hit. It was held that the evidence did not warrant a verdict of guilty of assault with intent to murder, because it tended to make merely a case of the statutory offense of "rocking a passenger train," as defined in Penal Code 1895, § 511, and therefore that the court erred in not granting a new trial.

It is held in Com. v. McLaughlin, 12 Cush. 616, that if one designedly fires a loaded pistol in the direction of two persons, and so near them that it would probably kill them or do them some great bodily harm, and with the intent so to do, or entirely regardless which it might actually kill, the jury might properly find him guilty of the same intent as to both.

It is held in State v. Sloanaker, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 62, that if a party intentionally and wantonly discharged a pistol into a crowd assembled at a railroad station, regardless of whom he may wound or kill, and wounded one unknown to him, on an assault with intent to kill such person, he will be presumed in law to have intended the probable consequences of his own act, and will be guilty of an assault upon him, but not of the intent to kill him, without proof of such felonious intention like any other material fact in the case.

So, where one fired a pistol toward persons who had ejected him from a store, and wounded one of them, he was held guilty on, with intent to commit murder, contrary to the form of the statute," etc.

The statute is § 791, Rev. Stat., as amended by act No. 43 of 1890, and reads: "Whoever shall shoot, stab, cut, strike, or thrust any person with a dangerous weapon, with intent to commit murder, shall," etc.

The main reliance of defendant is upon three bills covering the difference between his counsel and the judge as to whether there can be a conviction under said statute in a case where the shooting was at another person, and only took effect accidentally upon the person named in the indictment.

We agree with the learned trial judge that in the instant case the terms of the statute are completely satisfied, and the allegations of the indictment fully proved, if there is the shooting of any person,—no matter of what person,—and the shooting is done with a dangerous weapon and with intent to commit murder; in other words, that there is nothing in the terms of the statute requiring that the person who was shot should have been the person intended in fact to be murdered, or who was shot at.

It will be observed that the indictment does not charge that the intent to murder was directed towards Alma Meyers; and that it did not need so to charge. Whether its so charging would have made any difference, or, in other words, whether its so charging could not have been treated as mere surplusage, is a question that need not be considered. In Reg. v. Ryan, 2 of assault with intent to kill, the fact that he shot for effect, and did not intend to do any harm, being no defense. State v. Hamilton, 170 Mo. 377, 70 S. W. 876.

• Poisoning other than one intended.

In Rex v. Lewis, 6 Car. & P. 161, it is held that if A sends poison, intending it for B, with the intent to kill B, and it comes into the possession of C, who takes it, but does not die, A may be indicted for capital offense, on the statute, 9 Geo. IV. chap. 31, § 11. In this case Gurney, B., said: "If a person sends poison with intent to kill one person, and another person takes that poison, it is just the same as if it had been intended for such other person."

And in Johnson v. State, 92 Ga. 36, 17 S. E. 974, it is held that "an indictment alleging that the accused, 'with arsenic poison and other poisons to the grand jurors unknown, but all being weapons likely to produce death, did unlawfully, and with malice aforethought, make an assault upon' a named person, 'by putting said arsenic poison and said other poisons to the grand jurors unknown, into coffee, and administering the said poisons to the said person, charges the offense of assault with intent to murder, with sufficient certainty and fullness."

But in Peebles v. State, 101 Ga. 585, 28 S. E. 920, it is held that the act of maliciously putting poison into a well, with the intent that the water thereof shall be drunk by another, and that he shall in this manner be killed, does not, without more, constitute an offense of assault with intent to murder, when the person whose death was intended never in fact drank of the water after the poison had been introduced into the same.

Necessity of proving specific intent.

There are a number of cases holding that where an indictment in case of assault with intent to kill one, resulting in injury to another, is framed under a statute calling for a specific intent, that intent must be proved.

The following cases failed to sustain a conviction because of failure to prove intent 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to kill the particular person named in the indictment: Ogletree v. State, 28 Ala. 693; Simpson v. State, 59 Ala. 1, 31 Am. Rep. 1 (injury by spring gun); Lacefield v. State, 34 Ark. 275, 36 Am. Rep. 8; People v. Keefer, 18 Cal. 638; Com. v. Morgan, 11 Bush, 601; note to State v. Mulhall, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 630 (charging assault with intent to kill, when actual intent directed against another); Barcus v. State, 49 Miss. 17, 19 Am. Rep. 1, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 249; State v. Shanley, 20 S. D. 18, 104 N. W. 522; People v. Robinson, 6 Utah, 101, 21 Pac. 403; Reg. v. Lallement, 6 Cox, C. C. 204; Morgan v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 242; Reg. v. Ryan, 2 Moody & R. 213 (poison case).

So, in Hollywood v. People, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 376, where the statute was in these words: "Every person who shall be convicted of shooting at another, etc., with the intent to kill . . . such other person," it was held that an indictment charging assault with intent to kill the wife could not be supported by proof of shooting at the husband with intent to kill him, and hitting the wife by mere mistake; but a charge that under such indictment a conviction for shooting the wife could not be had was too broad, for, said the court: "It is equally clear, however, that the prisoner might have been convicted under this indictment of another offense than that described in this statute. At common law, feloniously or unlawfully firing or striking at one, and hitting another, is an offense as to the latter, of which the prisoner might have been convicted under this indictment."

So, in Gentry v. State, 92 Miss. 141, 45 So. 721, where accused shot into a wagon occupied by several persons, and the indictment charged assault with intent to kill and murder a particular one of them, it was held error to instruct the jury that proof of a design to kill the designated person was unnecessary to a conviction.

To the contention that firing into a body of men indiscriminately, with the intention of killing one, not knowing or caring which, is an assault with intent to kill upon each Moody & R. 213, where G. took poison which the prisoner had intended for C., and the indictment charged specifically that the prisoner had intended to poison G., Parke, B., doubted whether the verdict could stand, and directed another indictment to be brought charging generally that the prisoner did the act "with intent to commit murder," without specifying against whom the intent was directed. He said that he doubted the correctness of a previous decision (Rex v. Lewis, 6 Car. & P. 161), where, upon similar facts, the verdict had been maintained, although the statute then required that the intent should have been to murder "such person"—i. e., the person named in the indictment. He added that the language of the statute had been altered in order to provide for just such a case as the one in question; so that it was now sufficient to allege generally that the prisoner did the act "with intent to commit murder," without naming the person against whom the intent was directed.

Under the caption "Assault taking effect on one not meant," Bishop, New Crim. Law, vol. 2, § 741, ¶ 4, has the following: "Should the assault terminate in a battery of a person not meant, is the offense of assault with intent to kill or murder committed? In legal reason, and in the absence of special terms in the statute, it is; because in such a case both the statutory act and the statutory intent have transpired,—the legislative words are covered, and the wrong done is completely within their spirit. The indictment might even charge that the assault was made on one named, mistaken by the accused for another one named, with intent to take the latter's life; for here the thing done would be apparently adapted to accomplish the death meant, bringing the case within the general rule of the law of attempt."

From Bacon's Maxims, rule 15, we take the following: "In criminal causes, general malice or intent is enough, provided it is combined with a fact of as high a degree. . . . All crimes have their conception in a corrupt intent, and have their consummation and issuing in some particular fact, which, though it be not the fact at which the intention of the malefactor leveled, yet the law giveth him no advantage of the error, if another particular ensue of as high a nature." Bacon, Maxims, rule 15. See 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 288.

In support of his contention, the learned counsel for defendant cites the cases of State v. Evans, 39 La. Ann. 912, 3 So. 63; Lacefield v. State, 34 Ark. 275, 36 Am. Rep. 8; State v. Mulhall, 199 Mo. 202, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 630, 97 S. W. 583, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 781.

The doctrine of the Evans Case, here cited, is simply that where a specific intent is required by the statute, and a specific intent is, accordingly, charged in the indictment, this specific intent must be proved. In other words, that in such a case a general and all; that in such a case specific intent to kill is present, and the intention to kill whoever may be reached by the missile includes all and any who may be present, the court in the above case said: "This is true enough, and if the court had limited its charge to the announcement of this principle, we would unhesitatingly affirm the judgment. The argument is, and the principle is, that there must be, there must exist in the testimony, evidence that the defendant did intend to kill and murder the specific person named in the indictment; but this specific intent is furnished by the legal presumption, which is evidence, that one who so shoots recklessly into a crowd intends to kill and murder all, and per consequence, any one of all. In other words the specific intent to kill the person named in the indictment is worked out through this legal presumption. It must exist. This specific intent to kill the very person named in the indictment must be shown by evidence; but the evidence shows such intent when it shows this recklessly shooting into a crowd, which the law says shall mean an intent to kill all, and hence to kill any particular one. There is no relaxation of the principle, fundamental in every such indictment as this, that the testimony, whatever that testimony may be,—the legal presumption or the testimony of witnesses,—must show the specific intent to kill the very person named, which must be established beyond all reasonable doubt." The court further said that had the charge stopped at the words "with intent to kill and murder," it would have been correct, but it was fatal error where, in the concluding clause of the instruction, the jury was told that it was not necessary to show that there was a design to kill and murder Dale, the person named in the indictment. The court added that the indictment, if correctly drawn, should have charged that defendant shot into a wagon wherein were Dale and divers other persons, with the felonious intent of killing some one or more of the occupants, not caring which, and in fact shot Dale.

But it is held in Phillips v. United States, 2 Okla. Crim. Rep. 628, 103 Pac. 861, that where one shoots into a crowd, a conviction will be sustained without proving a specific intention to kill the particular person wounded.

So, in Christian v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 62 S. W. 422, it is held that one who shoots into a wagon with the intent to kill whoever occupies it may be convicted of assault with intent to murder, intent to commit a crime will not suffice, but that the specific intent must be proved.

There can be no doubt that where a specific intent is made by the statute an element of the crime, this specific intent must be proved, and that in such a case proof of general malice or criminal intent will not suffice. Thus, in assault with intent to kill, proof of an intent to rape will not suffice; and, vice versa, in assault with intent to rape, proof of intent to kill will not answer. But in a case like the present the specific intent required by the statute is proved; the shooting is done with intent to kill. True, the intent was to kill a different person, but, we repeat, the statute does not require that the intent must be to kill the person actually shot; it merely requires that there must be an intent to kill.

In the other case cited by defendant, supra,—that of Lacefield v. State, 34 Ark. 275, 36 Am. Rep. 8,—the prisoner shot at McClure and hit one Hearstings. He was charged with having made an assault upon Hearstings, "with intent him, the said Hearstings, to kill and murder." The court held that the specific intent to kill Hearstings had to be proved. In support of that view the court cited Rex v. Holt, 7 Car. & P. 522; 2 Starkie, Ev. 572; State v. Neal, 37 Me. 468; State v. Jefferson, 3 Harr. (Del.) 571; Ogletree v. State, 28 Ala. 693.

In Rex v. Holt, as already pointed out, supra, the statute required that the intent should have been to murder "such person," i. e., the person named in the indictment. This distinguishes that case from ours, and, possibly, also from this Lacefield Case, since in this Lacefield Case it might perhaps have been possible to treat the allegation of the intent having been to murder the person named in the indictment as surplusage.

Referring to Starkie on Ev. 572, we find there a note announcing broadly, as in this Lacefield Case, that "where one aiming at A misses him and wounds B, he cannot be convicted of assault with intent to kill B." Whether this note is by Starkie is not certain. No decision or other authority is cited in support of it.

In Ogletree v. State, 28 Ala. 693, the defendant had threatened to kill one Mitchell, and was about to assault Mitchell with a stick when one Tiller intervened to prevent him from doing so, and defendant turned upon Tiller and struck him with the stick, and the indictment was for assaulting Tiller with intent to kill. Proof of the threat made against Mitchell was objected to, on the ground that the threat had been made against a different person. The trial court admitted the evidence on the principle that the general intent which the defendant entertained at the moment to commit a crime could be proved in support of the alleged specific intent to kill Tiller. On appeal the ruling was reversed, the court holding that the evidence had to be restricted to the whether he knew the occupant or not. The court said: "The fact that the indictment charged the name of the person actually assaulted does not require the state to prove that appellant knew the person assaulted, since it is immaterial whether he knew him or not."

And in Moore v. State, 18 Ala. 533, it is held error to charge that, in order to convict for assault with intent to kill and murder, it must be proved that the prisoner had, at the time of the commission of the assault, a positive intention to commit murder, it being well calculated to mislead the jury. The court said: "The statute does not use the word 'positive' as qualifying the intent, and in so far as it may be construed to mean an express intent, as contradistinguished from an intent implied or inferred from the circumstances of the case, by so much would it be erroneous."

It is also held in this case that, on trial for assault with intent to kill and murder, it is error to charge that the same facts and circumstances which would make the offense murder, if death ensued, furnish sufficient evidence of the intention, since in a number of cases a killing may amount to murder, and yet the party did not intend to kill. As, if one from a housetop recklessly throw down a billet of wood upon the sidewalk, where persons are constantly passing, and it fall upon a person passing by and kill him, this would be, by the common law, murder; but if, instead of killing him, it inflicts only a slight injury, the party could not be convicted of an assault with intent to commit murder.

In Rex v. Jarvis, 2 Moody & R. 40, it is held that an indictment under 9 Geo. IV. chap. 31, § 12, for maliciously shooting at A B is supported, if he be struck by the shot though the gun be aimed at a different person. Gurney, B., in summing up, told the jury it was perfectly immaterial for whom the shot was intended. If a man laid poison for one person, and another took it and died, it would be murder; so a blow aimed at one person, and killing another, would make the party equally answerable.

In Rex v. Lovel, 2 Moody & R. 39, the prisoner was indicted under 9 Geo. IV. chap. 31, § 12, for maliciously shooting at G. with intent, etc. It was held that the fact of firing a gun into a room of A B's house with intent to shoot A B, the prisoner supposing him to be in the room, will not support a charge of shooting at A B, if he be shown not to be in the room or within reach of the shot.

J. D. C.

specific intent to kill Tiller. The case is authority only to the extent stated in the syllabus, that "to constitute an assault with intent to murder, . . . it is not sufficient to prove a general felonious intent, or any other than the particular intent alleged in the indictment."

The case is not analogous with ours, or with the Lacefield Case, supra, in that it was not the case of a blow aimed at one person, and falling accidentally upon another.

So, in State v. Neal, 37 Me. 468, there was not presented a case of injury falling upon a different person from the one intended. The question there was simply as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show malice aforethought. The case is authority for no other proposition than that malice aforethought must be proved before a defendant can be convicted with assaulting with intent to murder. What malice there was in that case was directed against the person injured.

The other, and last, decision cited in the Lacefield Case, namely, State v. Jefferson, 3 Harr. (Del.) 571, we are not able to refer to, the report not being in our library.

The case of State v. Mulhall, 199 Mo. 202, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 630, 97 S. W. 583, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 781, cited by defendant, we do not consider to be analogous with ours in its facts. The statute in that case read: "Every person who shall, on purpose and of malice aforethought, shoot at . . . another . . . with intent to kill . . . such person, or in the attempt to," etc., "shall," etc.

The defendant had not "shot at" the person he wounded, but had "shot at" another person. It will be observed that the statute required as an essential element in the crime, that the accused should have "shot at" the person named in the indictment: "Every person who shall . . . shoot or stab at another, . . . with intent to kill . . . such person," i. e., the person shot at. Such being the case, it would seem to be plain that he could not be convicted upon facts showing that he "shot at" a different person.

So, in like manner, in Jones v. State, 11 Smedes & M. 315, Morgan v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 242, and Com. v. Morgan, 11 Bush, 601, the indictment was for "shoot-ing at," as in this Mulhall Case.

It must be admitted, however, that in these cases, and in many others that could be referred to, the court dealt with the case as if the statute had read like that in the case at bar. And it must be further admitted that, in a large number of cases, the courts have announced broadly that where 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the statute requires a specific intent, there cannot be a conviction unless the facts show that the intent was directed against the particular person named in the indictment. But all these cases, except that of Lacefield v. State, supra, may be distinguished their facts as we have done hereinabove with that of State v. Mulhall, supra. Thus, in Felker v. State, 54 Ark. 489, 16 S. W. 663, the accused had armed himself with a gun and gone to the ginhouse of the prosecuting witness with the intention of burning it, and while there, and endeavoring to execute such purpose, had shot the prosecuting witness, who was attempting to arrest him. The indictment was for assault with intent to murder. The trial judge charged that if the jury found the foregoing facts, they should convict. The appellate court said of this charge: "It does not make the defendant's intent to kill . . . [the prosecuting witness] essential to conviction. If he did not shoot with intent to kill, he was not guilty of the felony charged, although he may have entertained a present design to commit another felony. . . . The specific design to commit another felony cannot supply the specific intent to kill."

In Wood v. State, 34 Ark. 341, 36 Am. Rep. 13, where the charge was larceny, and the defense was absence of intent, the court said: "In larceny, there must be a concurrence with the act,—an intent to do it,—and also a felonious intent; and the same author we have quoted says: 'A bare intentional trespass not being larceny, but the specific intent to steal being necessary, also if one who is too drunk to entertain this specific intent takes property, relinquishing it before the intent could arise in his mind, there is no larceny.'"

In Simpson v. State, 59 Ala. 1, 31 Am. Rep. 1, the accused set a spring gun for trespassers, and accidentally wounded his neighbor, against whom he entertained no enmity. The indictment was for assault with intent to murder. The court said that the doctrine of an intent in law different from the intent in fact, or, in other words, of imputable intent, had no application to the case. That the specific intent to assault the person who was wounded would have to be proved.

This broad statement of the law must be read in connection with the facts of the case, according to which there was no necessity to go further than to hold that whenever a specific intent is required by the statute, as, for instance, to kill or to commit burglary or rape, such intent must be proved; and that malice generally or a general criminal intent will not suffice.

The exact point involved in our case came up before the high court of justice, England, Queen's bench division, in the case of Reg. v. Latimer, L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 359. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge and Judges Bowen, Field, and Manisty, together with master of the rolls, Lord Esher, rendered separate opinions. Judge Field said: "This is a very important case of wide application, and I am glad that it has received the authoritative decision of this court."

Judge Manisty said that the case raised "an exceedingly important question." The decision was unanimous. The case was one where the prisoner had struck at one person, and wounded another whom he had not intended to strike, and the indictment was under 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 100, § 20, providing that "whoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person," etc. On the side of the prisoner, the case of Reg. v. Pembliton, L. K. 2 C. C. 119, was invoked as authority. There, a person throwing a stone at some persons in the street had broken a window, and was indicted for "unlawfully and maliciously" causing damage to the window; and Blackburn, J., had said: "It is impossible to say in this case that the prisoner has maliciously done an act which he did not intend to do."

On the side of the Crown, the case of Rex v. Hunt, 1 Moody, C. C. 93, was cited, where the prisoner, stabbing at one man, cut and wounded another, and, on an indictment for feloniously cutting, the court held that "general malice was sufficient under the statute without particular malice towards the person cut." Coleridge, L. Ch. J., said: "It is common knowledge that a man who has an unlawful and malicious intent against another, and, in attempting to carry it out, injures a third person, is guilty of what the law deems malice against the person injured, because the offender is doing an unlawful act, and has that which the judges called general malice, and that is enough. . . . The master of the rolls has pointed out to me that these sections [18 and 20] are in substitution for, and in correction of, the earlier statutes, in which the unlawful act must be done with intent to injure such person,' making it necessary that the intent should be against the person injured, whereas in 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 100, the words 'such person' are left out, for § 18 says 'any person,' and § 20 'any other person' So, but for Reg. v. Pembliton, there would not have been the slightest difficulty. Does that case make any difference? I think not, and, on consideration, that it was quite 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) rightly decided. But it is clearly distinguishable, because the indictment in Reg. v. Pembliton was on the act making unlawful and malicious injury to property a statutory offense punishable in a certain way, and the facts expressly negated any intention to do injury to property."

In Rex v. Jarvis, 2 Moody & R. 40, the prisoner shot at Hale and accidentally hit Lockeyer, and was indicted for shooting the latter with intent to murder. The conviction was sustained.

In Reg. v. Smith, 1 Dears. C. C. 559, 33 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 567, where the accused shot at A supposing it to be B, whom he intended to murder, Baron Parke said: "The prisoner did not intend to kill the particular person, but he meant to murder the man at whom he shot."

The prosecution was under 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. chap. 85, § 3, for shooting at and wounding B, with intent to murder. The conviction was sustained.

So, where a person deliberately shot into a crowd intending to kill A and wounded B, held that he could be convicted of an assault with intent to murder B. Dunaway v. People, 110 Ill. 333, 51 Am. Rep. 686, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 60; citing State v. Gilman, 69 Me. 163, 31 Am. Rep. 257, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 15.

One who, intending to kill A, assails B in the dark, may be indicted for assaulting with intent to kill B. McGehee v. State, 62 Miss. 772, 52 Am. Rep. 209.

On an indictment for assaulting with intent to kill, an instruction to the effect that if defendant feloniously shot at A with the intention of killing him, and, missing him, shot B, he was guilty. State v. Montgomery, 91 Mo. 52, 3 S. W. 379.

In Callahan v. State, 21 Ohio St. 306, the prosecution was under a statute reading "that if any person shall maliciously shoot any other person with intent to kill, every person so offending shall," etc. The court said: "The questions of chief importance presented by the record arise on exceptions by the prisoner's counsel to the ruling of the court, and are based on the assumption that criminal intent, in the sense of the statute, cannot be asserted of a killing, wounding, or maiming in fact, unless the victim of the shot was the real object of the malice which induced it. To us this seems too narrow a construction of the statute."

In People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141, the defendant was indicted for assault with intent to commit murder. He had assaulted one Mittrovich with a knife, but with an intent to kill one Drascovich. The court said: "If A, intending to murder B, shoots C, supposing C to be B, and wounds C, he is guilty of an assault with intent to murder C. Notwithstanding A's mistake, C is the person whom he assaulted, and whom he intended to kill,"—citing Reg. v. Smith, supra.

Other cases in point are where the prisoner struck at one person with intent to kill, and wounded another (Wareham v. State, 25 Ohio St. 601); where the prisoner threw a stone at a person and struck another (State v. Jump, 90 Mo. 171, 2 S. W. 279); where A mistook B for someone else, and assaulted him (Reg. v. Stopford, 11 Cox, C. C. 643). In the same sense: Mathis v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 549, 47 S. W. 464; State v. Gilman, 69 Me. 163, 31 Am. Rep. 257, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 15; Jennings v. United States, 2 Ind. Terr. 670, 53 S. W. 456; Territory v. Rowand, 8 Mont. 432, 20 Pac. 688, 21 Pac. 19; Musick v. State, 21 Tex. App. 69, 18 S. W. 95; Walker v. State, 8 Ind. 290.

Archbold's Crim. Pr. & Pl. 271, lays down the rule: "If a man fire at A and shoot B, he may be indicted for shooting the pistol or gun against B, for in fact he did so."

In support of this, the author cites Rex v. Jarvis, 2 Moody & R. 40, supra; and the annotator cites Rex v. Holt, 7 Car. & P. 518, supra, and Reg. v. Smith, 1 Dears. C. C. 559, 33 Eng. L. & Eq. Rep. 567, supra.

Our conclusion is that there was no error in the ruling of the trial court on this point.

Defendant also complains of the refusal of the judge to have the clerk take down, in accordance with act 113 of 1896, a statement of facts to be used as a basis for one of his bills of exceptions. The facts in question were a qualification added by the judge to one of the special charges requested by defendant.

It is the right of a defendant to have the judge give his charge in writing, and no part of it verbally. Act No. 113 of 1896 would not seem, therefore, to have been intended to apply to the charge of the judge. But, premitting that question, the defendant has had in the foregoing decision the full benefit of the statement of facts which he desired to have taken down; therefore he has no ground to complain.

Defendant also excepted to the following remarks made by the district attorney in his closing address to the jury: "The testimony of the state's witnesses shows that his mother was there and begged him not to shoot. Why did he not have her here, if it is not true that she was there? And, gentlemen of the jury, it is a circumstance against him."

It is not denied that the witnesses of the prosecution had testified as here stated.

The rest of the remark was by way of argument, and therefore unobjectionable.

Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied January 3, 1911.

HAMPARTZOON MINASIAN

v.

ROBERT L. OSBORNE et al., Appts.

MINAS H. MINASIAN

v.

SAME, Appts.

(210 Mass. 250, 96 N. E. 1036.)

Party—validity of strike—right to test.

1. One who will lose his employment by success of a strike may maintain an action to test its validity.

Strike—right—unequal system.

2. A labor union has a right to strike against the recognition in a shop of a system of piecework which allows workers to employ helpers, the effect of which is, in times of slack work, to deprive those not employing helpers of continuous work, although success may result in throwing out of employment those who have been employed merely at will as helpers, and injure the employer.

(November 29, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendants from decrees of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in plaintiffs' favor, and from an order

Note.—System of work as justification for strike.

The motive of the employees in going on a strike may properly be the subject of inquiry in a civil action for damages brought by a third person under the claim that the primary and direct purpose of going on a strike or threatening to strike was to and did injure him in his business. The motive of the employees is also the subject of inquiry where the right is questioned of employees to resort to some particular means to bring to a successful issue an existing strike, since, if the strike is not justified, the employees may be restrained from resorting to the usual methods which may be properly employed to bring to a successful termination a strike for a cause that has a proper and legitimate relation to the interests of the strikers.

The general question involved in determining the lawfulness of strikes has frequently been determined by the test whether the same action on the part of an individual would be lawful, the theory being that an act lawful if committed by one is not rendered unlawful by reason of concerted overruling demurrers to the complaint, in an action brought to enjoin a strike. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick W. Mansfield, for appellants:

It is legal to strike for higher wages, shorter hours, more work, or better conditions of employment.

action. It is not intended herein to discuss this question. It is discussed in a note in 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 869, in reference to the question as to the basis of distinction between absolute rights and qualified rights as affecting the right to inquire into the motive. It is also discussed in a note in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 748, dealing with the question of boycotts; also in notes in 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 707, and 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 85, dealing with the same question.

As to controversy over open or closed shop as a justification for means employed to aid a strike, see notes in 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 162, and 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 787.

As to liability for procuring discharge of nonunion employees, see note in 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899; and as to civil liability for maliciously procuring the discharge of an employee, or preventing employment, in the absence of a conspiracy or concerted action, see note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 966.

As to the lawfulness of a strike, or a threat to strike, when there is no trade dispute between employers and their own employees, see note in 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067.

The specific question whether an attempt to compel an employer to adopt or change some system in his method of employment or work is a justification for a strike has seldom been raised. As suggested in MINASIAN v. OSBORNE, it naturally depends upon the view that the court may take as to whether or not the proposed change is primarily for the purpose of benefiting employees. If this is the primary purpose, it is lawful, and will justify a strike although, as an incident, injury may result to others. In addition to the Massachusetts case, this is also the doctrine of National Fireproofing Co. v. Mason Builders' Asso. 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 148, 94 C. C. A. 535, 169 Fed. 259, a case giving the general question very serious and able consideration. The question here raised was whether it was lawful for employees to require their employers, who were contractors, to include in their contracts for building all cutting of masonry, interior brick work, the paving of brick floors, the installing of concrete blocks, the brick work of the dampproofing system, and all fireproofing floor arches, slabs, partitions, furring, and roof blocks,—and providing that such contractors shall not lump or sublet the installation, if the labor in connection therewith is bricklayers' work as recognized by the trade. As to all such work the men employed upon the construction of the walls to be given the preference. The court said that the direct object of this requirement was to benefit the employees employed to do the outside mason work, and hence it was lawful.

In this connection, see Pickett v. Walsh, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, referred to in MINASIAN v. OSBORNE, and which holds that a strike is justified where the purpose is to secure for the strikers the work of pointing buildings in which they lay the brick and stone, and to prevent their employer from subletting that portion of the work to others.

In Albro J. Newton Co. v. Erickson, 70 Misc. 291, 126 N. Y. Supp. 949, affirmed without opinion in 144 App. Div. 939, 129 N. Y. Supp. 1111, the purpose of the strike was to enable the employees to impose on their employer the union schedule of wages and hours of service, and other conditions not mentioned in the opinion. The purpose of the strike was said to be lawful, although the matter was given little consideration, as the means resorted to, to bring the strike to a successful termination, were held to be unlawful.

On the other hand, in W. P. Davis Mach. Co. v. Robinson, 41 Misc. 329, 84 N. Y. Supp. 837, the court refused to vacate an injunction against picketing where resorted to in aid of a strike, held unlawful because for the purpose of compelling an employer to sign a contract not to employ any nonunion labor, and to give up piecework or the premium system of work. The court reasoned that while a strike would be lawful if for the primary purpose of promoting the welfare of the strikers, yet a strike against the piece or premium system of work was not primarily for that purpose, and hence did not furnish justification for the strike.

A. G. S.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts which give rise to this controversy (as found by the judge of the superior court) are that the plaintiff Minas, a skilled laster by trade, had a contract for labor as a laster with the Randall Adams Company, terminable at the will of either. With the consent of his employer, he had in turn employed as helper his father, Hampartsoon, the other plaintiff, who was not able to do all the work of a laster, and who received no wages from the Randall Adams Company, and had no relation as servant to it. The work was piecework, and Minas alone received, and was entitled to receive, the compensation for their joint labor. This method of work was known in the craft as "contract" or "cross-handed."

Both of the plaintiffs were, or had been, members of the Lasters' Union, an unincorporated association, of which the defendants are representatives and members. The defendant Osborne, who is the business agent of the Lasters' Union Local No. 1, notified the employer, the Randall Adams Company, that unless the father was discharged, the shop's crew would be "pulled out." The father did not work for a day or two, but returned to work after the superintendent of the employer told the son, Minas, to get him and put him to work again. The next day all the other lasters went out on an orderly strike, which was indorsed by the union. As a consequence, both plaintiffs have lost their employment. The Lasters' Union substantially controls the labor market in the manufacture of shoes, for practically all lasters are members of the union. The effect of the strike, if continued, will be to prevent Randall Adams Company from continuing business unless it discharges Minas, or compels him to dispense with his assistant.

Here is a plain and tangible injury to the plaintiffs as the proximate result of the acts of the defendants. This gives a cause of action to the plaintiffs, unless the defendants have a sufficient justification for their conduct. If they have acted without good cause or excuse, they are liable. Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353-356, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 74 N. E. 603, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 738; Quinn v. Leatham [1901] A. C. 495-510, 70 L. J. P. C. N. S. 76, 65 J. P. 708, 50 Week. Rep. 139, 85 L. T. N. S. 289, 17 Times L. R. 749, 1 B. R. C. 107; South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Co. [1905] A. C. 239-244, 246-251, 74 L. J. K. B. N. S. 525, 53 Week. Rep. 593, 92 L. T. N. S. 710, 21 Times L. R. 27 L.R.A.(N.S.)

441, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 436, 1 B. R. C. 1. As was said in De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 598, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 94 N. E. 317, 319: "Whether the purpose for which a strike is instituted is or is not a legal justification for it is a question of law, to be decided by the court."

The inquiry must be directed to the character of the justification proffered by the defendants in excuse for their conduct. The purpose of the strike (as found by the superior court) was "to compel the plaintiff Minas . . . to cease employing his father to help him, and to induce the employer of Minas either to discharge the father or to require Minas to cease employing a helper, or failing that, to discharge Minas from its employment." But it has been found also that the defendants are not actuated by any ill feeling toward either of the plaintiffs, and that the strike is wholly disconnected with any question of membership in the union. The basis of the strike is objection to the system known as contract labor or cross-hand work. It follows that the real purpose of the strike is to cause the abolition of that system of work in this shop.

It is not of much consequence whether the object of the strike is stated to be the discharge of the father and son without hostility toward them, but for the reason that they practise a certain system of shop labor, or the abolition of the system of shop labor, with the incidental result that one or both of the plaintiffs may be discharged. In its practical effects upon the rights of the parties, the question of law involved is the same whichever way it is put. The question presented for decision is whether the abolition of this particular system of shop work is a legal justification for the interference with the rights of these plaintiffs which arises from an orderly strike by fellow employees.

"The objection to the system is," as found by the trial court, "that where two men work together, as Minas and his father were doing, they can do more work in a day or week than any single man working without a helper, and that, as a result, the men who worked without helpers would not get their fair share of the work that was to be done, and would thus be unable to have a chance to earn as much as they could if there were no helpers employed. The custom in the factory was that when a laster had completed his case of shoes, or had nearly completed it, so as to be ready for another case, he would put his name upon a list, and it was understood that cases of shoes would be furnished him for his work in the order in which the names stood upon the list.

If there was plenty of work, so that any laster could have all he could do, the fact that two men working together could do more than he could would not affect the wages he would ordinarily receive; but in case there was a scarcity of work, or not sufficient work to keep all the lasters employed, the laster who had a helper might be able to do more work, and other lasters might not be able to obtain work. In that aspect of the case, their compensation might be affected by the system of contract labor or cross-hand work." The controversy as presented upon this record is not between employer and employee, but between rival sets of workmen, both of whom were at work in the same shop upon materials of one manufacturer.

This is not a strike which involves any inquiry as to the plaintiffs' habits, conduct, or character which might render them unfit or improper shopmates. It is not for the establishment of any system of shop work or rules directed to the curtailment or limitation of production or interference with reasonable industrial advancement. It is not aimed to prevent the highest efficiency of labor, or the use of modern or economical machinery. It was not instituted to promote a closed shop, or to compel anybody to join or to leave any union, nor primarily to cause the discharge or employment of any person or class of persons. If this results in any instance, it is incidental, and not essential to the chief end. It does not go to the extent of interdicting the absolute and unqualified right of the individual to work, if he desires, contrary to the will or rules of a combination. It is not based upon objections to shop rules established for the reasonable protection of the rights of the employer or promotion of the good order or economical and efficient service of employees. It is not directed against the education of apprentices or those who are trying to learn the trade. It does not appear to be for the establishment or preservation of a monopoly, and this is not indicated by the framework of the bill. It is not directed against piecework as distinguished from day work, nor against any other method of employment where superior skill, dexterity, or swiftness secure commensurately higher rewards than inefficiency, carelessness, or slothfulness. It does not directly or immediately affect the general convenience, necessities, or safety of the public. Its ostensible object is not used as a mask for any ulterior design. The direct and main purpose is to secure a change in a system of work which is asserted to be unjust in its practical operation.

It is contended that this system in its final analysis resulted in an unequal distribution of the work of lasting in slack times, and thus affected the wages of the strikers, although it did not so operate when there was work enough to keep all the employees busy all the time. The finding of the superior court was in substance to this effect, and it is supported by evidence. There is nothing to indicate that the strike was not undertaken in good faith against this system. An honest effort to better conditions of employment by laborers is lawful. The right of the plaintiffs to work upon such terms as they chose is incident to the freedom of the individual. That "right of his could not be taken away from him or interfered with by the defendants, unless it came into conflict with an equal or superior right of theirs." De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593 at 599, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 94 N. E. 317. The right of one person to dispose of his labor freely is not superior to the same rights in others. The right of one to work under unsanitary conditions does not go to the extent of preventing others from striking in order to secure a mitigation of these conditions, merely because such a strike may interfere with the desire of the first to continue to work under those conditions. The same principle applies where a distribution of work discriminates between men of average capacity, and gives an undue preference to one over another in times when there is a dearth of work. A system of giving out work which, under existing conditions, operates unjustly, is a condition of employment in which all workmen affected by it in a particular shop may have a legal interest. Nor is injury to the employer a reason why a strike to remedy such a condition should be enjoined.

The right of the employer is no more absolute in respect of a condition of employment like this than it is as to hours of labor or rate of wages. It is not a subject as to which he is entitled to special protection against an orderly and otherwise lawful strike. Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 638. The conduct of these defendants, although directly affecting to their detriment the labor habits of the plaintiffs, appears to have sufficient justification in the fact that it is of a kind and for a purpose which has a direct relation to the benefits of a more uniform distribution of work, and thus of wages among equally skilled or competent workmen during dull seasons. This was the object which the defendants were trying to obtain.

While the plaintiffs' contractual rights to labor, although terminable at will, were entitled to protection against wanton interference (Citizens' Loan Asso. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 196 Mass. 528, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1025, 124 Am. St. Rep. 584, 82 N. E. 696, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 365, and cases cited), they were not so assured or valuable in their nature as are valid contracts for continued service for a definite period. It may well be that a stronger reason might be needed to justify interference with such contracts than with those here in question. We do not go beyond what is necessary to this decision. The decision of this case depends upon a somewhat narrow interpretation of the findings of the trial court. Construing them as we do, this seems to be a clash of equal rights between fellow laborers, where each could use any lawful means to enforce those rights. No question is presented as to the unlawfulness of the means employed. This is not a case in its facts like those presented for adjudication in Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 51 L.R.A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330, 57 N. E. 1011; Vegetahn v. Guntner, 167 Mass. 92, 35 L.R.A. 722, 57 Am. St. Rep. 443, 44 N. E. 1077; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 9 Am. St. Rep. 689, 17 N. E. 307; Berry v. Donovan, 188 Mass. 353, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 899, 108 Am. St. Rep. 499, 74 N. E. 603, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 738; Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass. 294, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 84 N. E. 457; Willcutt & Sons Co. v. Driscoll, 200 Mass. 110, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1236, 85 N. E. 897; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 94 N. E. 317; Folsom v. Lewis, 208 Mass. 336, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 787, 94 N. E. 316. But it comes within principles recognized and stated in several of those cases and applied in Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, at 579 et sequitur. In the opinion of a majority of the court the entry in each case must be decree reversed. Bill dismissed.

Messrs. Wright & Matchan for respondent.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant publishes at the city of Minneapolis the Daily News, a newspaper of general circulation throughout the northwest. About the 1st of June, 1910, it instituted what it termed a contest, and offered and agreed to give an automobile costing $1,250 to the contestant having, on July 30, 1910, the largest number of votes based upon paid subscriptions for the Daily News. It published, together with this offer, rules governing the contest. So far as here material, these rules provide: "Ten votes will be allowed for every cent paid in advance on subscriptions to the Daily News. . . . Anyone can take subscriptions, . . . and votes will be credited to the contestant for whom they are taken. . . . Votes are not transferable from one contestant to another. . . . During the last week of the contest subscriptions, with remittances for same, must be mailed or deposited in contestant's local bank, to be mailed by the bank officers. . . . Contestants who want the Daily News started to subscribers at once may receive vote ballots for them, which can be counted at any time. A bonus of 5,000 votes will be given every contestant entering the contest before June 15, 1910."

The plaintiff, in compliance with the rules governing the same, became a contestant before June 15, 1910, and was thereafter so recognized and treated by the defendant. There were a number of other contestants. Some additional offers or proposals were afterwards made by the defendant. It is not necessary to consider whether these subsequent proposals varied the contract existing between an individual contestant and the defendant, for the votes received thereunder by the plaintiff are not necessary to the determination of the case presented. The plaintiff, by himself and through friends, thereafter received subscriptions and remitted payments in advance therefor to the defendant company, aggregating $793.10. Of this amount $435.60 was deposited by plaintiff in his local bank on July 30, 1910, the defendant notified thereof, and the amount by the bank officers promptly remitted to the defendant. The other remittances were made directly to the defendant, and received by it on or before July 30th. The form of these remittances was as follows: "Enclosed find $——— in payment of the following subscriptions. Credit votes to M. Mooney, contestant." All the money so sent by and to the credit of the plaintiff was received and retained by the defendant in payment of subscriptions for the Daily News. Giving the plaintiff a credit of 10 votes for each cent of such subscription money gives to him 793,100 votes,—a higher number than that to which any other contestant was entitled. Adding to this number the votes credited by defendant to plaintiff through prizes and special offers makes an aggregate of 1,043,860. One O. J. Lund received 783,900 votes; this being the total number of votes to which he was entitled on account of subscriptions, prizes, and special offers. The defendant gave Lund the described automobile, disallowing the claim of the plaintiff thereto, and refusing his demand therefor. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action to recover $1,250, the value of the automobile, claiming in substance a breach of a contract between himself and the defendant by the terms of which the defendant agreed to give such automobile to him, he having obtained the highest amount of paid subscriptions, or, as stated in the proposition, the highest number of votes. A trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from an order denying its alternative motions for judgment or a new trial.

There is no controversy over the facts above stated. The refusal of the defendant to recognize the plaintiff's claim to the automobile was based on the plaintiff's failure to deliver at the defendant's office, before the close of the contest, certain vote coupons. The defendant company published from time to time during the contest the votes to the credit of the different contestants. Instead of publishing the actual amount to the credit of each contestant, in some cases only a part of the remittance of a contestant, or the vote credit therefor, or the vote credit otherwise obtained, was published in the paper, and for the balance a vote coupon was sent the contestant. This was done in the plaintiff's case without any request by him not to publish the full amount of his credit. Three vote coupons, in amounts 248,000, 20,000, and 80,000, were so sent to the plaintiff,—one July 1st and two July 18th. The amounts of these coupons, together with the amounts published in the Daily News, represented the "vote" credit of the plaintiff up to those dates for subscription remittances and under special offers or prizes. Without including a part of the remittances represented by these coupons, the plaintiff would not have a higher credit than the contestant Lund. The plaintiff deposited these three vote coupons, together with his final subscription remittance, July 30th in his local bank. The bank promptly forwarded them by mail to the defendant company, but they were not received at Minneapolis until a day or two after the close of the contest. The defendant considered that these vote coupons were ballots which might be voted by the contestant before the close of the contest, that they took the place of the credit to the contestant for the remittances on account of which they were issued, and that therefore the credit on account of such remittances would be wholly lost to the contestant if the vote coupons were not sent in before the close of the contest. The defendant company refused to credit the plaintiff with any of the votes represented by such coupons, or with the subscription remittances theretofore received by the defendant, included in such coupons.

While not conceding the claim of the defendant as to the nature of these vote coupons, the plaintiff, upon the trial, testified: That on the morning of July 30th he had a telephone conversation with Mr. Burgess, the general manager of the defendant company. That he said to Mr. Burgess: "Now, I have those receipts and account for what I had sent in. Will I leave those with the bank?" That Mr. Burgess, in answer, stated: "Yes, I will guarantee that will be all right." Mr. Burgess testified that no conversation was had with the plaintiff concerning the deposit of any receipts or coupons. The trial court submitted the case to the jury on the theory that, if this conversation did occur, the defendant was bound to recognize and credit to the plaintiff the subscription remittances and votes covered by these vote coupons, but that it was not bound to give such credit unless so notified and consenting to the deposit of the coupons in the bank. The jury determined that such notification and consent were given. We have examined all the rules, publications, and correspondence contained in the record bearing thereon, and find nothing that prevented the defendant from making a valid agreement with the plaintiff to credit the votes represented by such coupons without the coupons being returned to its office on or before July 30th. There was no error in receiving the testimony of this conversation over the defendant's objection.

We think the case was thus submitted upon a theory more favorable to the defendant than the facts warranted. The defendant received and retained subscription remittances sent to it to be credited to the plaintiff. Under its published rules it agreed to give the plaintiff credit at the specified rate for each such remittance. It had the original subscription orders accompanying the remittances, requesting that such remittances be credited to the plaintiff. We find nothing in the record from which it could be inferred that the plaintiff waived or lost his right to such credits by receiving and retaining vote coupons, or in any other manner whatever. The obtaining of subscriptions paid in advance was the substantial benefit received by the defendant in return for the automobile. Obtaining such subscriptions was the substantial service performed by the contestants, including the plaintiff. The plaintiff having obtained subscriptions and remitted payments therefor entitling him to a greater credit than that to which the next highest contestant was entitled, crediting such other contestant with all prize and special-offer credits, clearly the plaintiff had fully complied with the conditions of the offer made by the defendant company and became entitled to the compensation under the offer. The defendant company, after making and publishing the rules governing its so-called contest, was bound thereby as to the contestants who sent subscription remittances in compliance therewith. After a contract was thus made between defendant and the individual contestants, including the plaintiff, the defendant could not change the rights of the contestants thereunder through its misinterpretation of the rules as published, nor did it have the right to change or give to the rules its own interpretation.

We have considered the various assignments of error relating to the charge of the court and the admission of evidence, and find in them no ground for reversing the action of the trial court.

(In Banc.)

ELIZA W. P. GUYE, Appt.,
v.

JOHN W. GUYE et al., Respts.
(63 Wash. 340, 115 Pac. 731.)

Husband and wife—separate property—trust for community.

1. Separate property is not impressed with a trust in favor of the community by a statutory provision that all the rents, profits, interest, or proceeds of separate property, accruing during marriage, shall be common property, where the statute also provides that the spouse having separate property shall have sole control of it, and shall be liable for his or her debts, whether contracted before or after marriage.

Same—repeal of statute—effect on future income.

2. The existence at the time of marriage of a statute providing that the rents, profits, interest, or proceeds of separate property, accruing during marriage, shall be common property, does not prevent the legislature from restoring all increments of separate property accruing after the passage of the repealing statute, to separate use.

Same—Increase in value—community interest.

3. A statutory declaration that property acquired during marriage shall be community does not make the natural increase in the value of separate real estate community, where the statute also declares that the owner of separate property shall be entitled to the rents, issues, and profits thereof.

Same—property purchased before, but conveyed after, marriage.

4. That a deed for real estate is not executed to a man until after his marriage does not make the land community property if he had contracted for, taken possession of, improved, and paid a portion of the purchase money for it prior to the marriage.

Same—tax money—presumption as to source.

5. The funds for paying taxes on separate property cannot be presumed to have belonged to the community, for the purpose of impressing the property with a community interest, where the owner of the property had a separate source of income.

Evidence — mortgaging property — community character.

6. That husband and wife have joined in mortgaging property is not of itself sufficient to show that it belonged to the community.

Note. — Power of legislature to change increment or income of separate property from community property to separate property, or vice versa.

A search discloses but little authority upon the question under consideration.

In George v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322, 76 Am. Dec. 490, where the property in question was dividends due on stock owned by the wife, a statute providing that the rents and profits of the separate estate of either husband or wife should be deemed common property was held to be a violation of the constitutional provision that property of the wife, owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterward by gift, devise, or bequest, should be her separate property. The court said: "We think the legislature has not the constitutional power to say that the fruits of the property of the wife shall be taken from her, and given to the husband or his creditors. If the constitutional provision be not a protection to the wife against the exercise of this authority, the anomaly would seem to exist of a right of property in one, divested of all beneficial use,—the barren right to hold in the wife, and the beneficial right to enjoy in the husband. One object of the provision was to protect the wife against the improvidence of the husband; but this object would wholly fail, in many instances, if the estate of the wife were reduced to a mere reversionary interest, to be of no avail to her except in the contingency of her surviving her husband. It has been seen that the provision of the Constitution is, that the property acquired by the wife by devise, bequest, etc., shall be her separate property. This term 'separate property' has a fixed meaning in the common law, and had in the minds of those who framed the Constitution, the large majority of whom were familiar with, and had lived under, that system. By the common law, the idea attached to separate property in the wife, and which forms a portion of its definition, is, that it is an estate, held as well in its use as in its title, for the exclusive benefit and advantage of the wife. The common law recognized no such soleism as a right in the wife to the estate, and a right in someone else to use it as he pleased, and to enjoy all the advantages of its use. It is not perceived that property can be in one, in full and separate ownership, with a right in another to control it, and enjoy all of its benefits. The sole value of property is in its use; to dissociate the right of property from the use in this class of cases would be to preserve the name—the mere shadow—and destroy the thing itself, the substance. It would be to make the wife the trustee for the husband, holding the legal title, while he held the fruits of that title. This could no more be done, in consistency with our ideas of property, during the lifetime of the wife, than for all time."

And this decision was followed in Lewis v. Johns, 24 Cal. 99, 85 Am. Dec. 49, where the products of the wife's lands were in question.

As to profits accruing during marriage in connection with property belonging to the separate estate of either spouse as community property, see note to Re Pepper, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1093. J. T. W.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendants' favor in an action brought to quiet title to property of Francis M. Guye, deceased, and for an adjustment of plaintiff's rights therein. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blaine, Tucker, & Hyland, for appellant:

Inasmuch as § 2 of the act of 1871 provides that all property acquired during marriage by the joint labors of the husband and wife, or by their individual labors, together with all rents, profits, interest, or proceeds of the separate property of both accruing during marriage, shall be common property, the real property of the husband and wife, when taken in consideration of § 22, becomes partnership assets, and the husband and wife each become partners, and the capitalization is what each person puts into the property, and any increase or unearned increment becomes partnership or common property.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Francis M. Guye and Eliza W. P. Guye intermarried at the city of Seattle on March 21, 1872, and thereafter, until the death of Francis M. Guye on May 25, 1908, lived together as husband and wife. There was no issue of their marriage. Francis M. Guye had been formerly married, and was the father of children born of such marriage. At the time of his death, he left estate in the state of Washington, consisting of real property of great value, which he specifically devised by will to the different members of his family as if the property, one tract excepted, was his separate property. The will was in form a nonintervention will, and was duly entered for probate as such. In the will he named his son John W. Guye and one Rolland H. Denny as executors. The executors named accepted the trust, and proceeded with the due administration of the estate. The widow, Eliza W. P. Guye, claimed that the entire property was community property, and, on her claim being disallowed by the executors, brought this action to have the status of the property determined and her rights therein adjusted. In the final decree the trial judge found somewhat more of the property to be community property than the deviser or the executors recognized as such, but did not allow the claim of Mrs. Guye to its fullest extent. From so much of the decree as is adverse to her interests, she appeals.

Based on differences between the time and manner of its acquisition, counsel have divided the land left by the deceased into five distinct classes: First, certain tracts of land acquired by the deceased by purchase, and for which deeds had passed prior to his marriage with the appellant; second, a tract of land acquired by the deceased by purchase prior to his marriage with the appellant, but for which the deed passed after such marriage; third, a tract of land acquired from the United States by the deceased after his marriage, under a coal-land entry; fourth, certain tracts acquired from the United States by the deceased after his marriage, under the mining laws; and, fifth, certain tracts acquired by the deceased by purchase from private holders subsequent to his marriage.

The claim that the land first described is community property is based principally upon the somewhat peculiar common property statute of 1871. Laws 1871, p. 67. By § 1 of that act, it was provided that all property owned by the husband or wife at the time of the marriage, and all property acquired by either of them during the marriage by gift, devise, descent, bequest, or inheritance, and all property purchased or acquired with the separate funds of either during marriage, and designated as separate property as per deed or inventory, in accordance with the provisions of the act, should be the separate property of the spouse acquiring it, the same as though no marriage existed. Section 2 provided that all property acquired during the marriage by the joint labors of the husband and wife or by their individual labors, together with all "rents, profits, interest, or proceeds of the separate property of both, accruing during the marriage," should be common property. Sections 8, 9, 10, and 11 defined the class of debts for which the common and separate property might be sold. Section 14 provided that the husband should have the sole control and management of his own separate property, and need not be joined by the wife in any sale, transfer, or encumbrance thereof. Section 15 provided that the wife should have the sole control and management of her own separate property, and need not be joined by the husband in any sale, transfer, or encumbrance thereof, unless the property be that acquired by gift from the husband. Section 22 provided that, the "common property being partnership property," the wife's share should be one half thereof, and should be hers and her heirs forever. Section 23 provided that neither dower nor courtesy should thereafter accrue. Section 26 provided that the husband should not by will deprive the widow of any rights under the act. This statute remained upon the statute book but two years. At the next session of the legislative assembly it was repealed, and a new law enacted. It is not necessary to point out all the differences between the new law and the one cited, but the radical changes were that the new law failed to provide that the rents, profits, issues, or proceeds of the separate property of the spouses should be common property, and it eliminated § 22, which declared the common property to be partnership property. This act remained in force until 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 77), when the present community-property law was enacted. By the terms of the latter act, the rents, issues, and profits of separate property are expressly declared to be separate property. By the latter act also the name "common property" was changed to "community property," and it was expressly provided that the property rights of the spouses were thereafter to be governed by the act in the absence of a marriage settlement or postnuptial agreement. "any act to the contrary notwithstanding."

By reference to the dates above given, it will be observed that Francis M. Guye and the appellant intermarried while the act of 1879 (L.R.A. (N.S.)

1871 was in force. Based on this fact, the appellant argues that the act of 1871 fixed the rights of property between the appellant and her husband, "and that any subsequent law could in no way alter or change it;" and "that inasmuch as § 2 of that act provides that all property acquired during marriage by the joint labors of the husband and wife, or by their individual labors, together with all rents, profits, interest, or proceeds of the separate property of both, accruing during marriage, shall be common property, it means nothing else than that real property of the husband and wife, when taken in consideration of § 22, becomes partnership assets, and the husband and wife each become partners, and the capitalization is what each person puts into the property, and any increase or unearned increment becomes partnership or common property." In other words, it is contended that a marriage during the existence of the act of 1871 impressed the separate property with which each of the contracting parties was then seised with a trust to pay the income thereof to the common use of both spouses during the continuance of the marital relation, or until such time as they could mutually agree on some other disposition of it. We are not able to agree with this contention. That such was not the intent of the statute is plain from the very statute itself. The statute does not in express words devote the income of the separate property of each of the spouses to the common use of both, nor does it in express words charge such separate property with a trust to that effect. In so far as the intent is expressed, it does nothing more than provide that the income of separate property when it comes into existence shall be common property. And that no such intention is implied is clear from the fact that such a construction is inconsistent with other express provisions of the statute. It is provided, it will be observed, that the spouse owning or acquiring separate property during the marriage relation shall have the sole control and management thereof, and need not be joined by the other spouse "in any sale, transfer, or encumbrance thereof." It is provided, also, in the act, that the separate property of a spouse shall be liable for the separate debts of that spouse, whether contracted before or subsequent to the marriage. These provisions are wholly inconsistent with the idea that the separate property of one spouse is, in virtue of the marital relation, impressed with a charge or trust of any kind in favor of the other, or in favor of the common use of both, and to our minds conclusively determines the contrary.

There can be no trust in property for the common benefit of two persons where one of them has power at any time to destroy the trust by disposing of the property, or by putting it to another use. In so far as the rents, profits, interest, or proceeds of the separate property of either came into being during the existence of this statute, we have no doubt that they belonged to the husband and wife in common, and that it was not competent for the legislature, by subsequent enactment, to declare such property to be the property of the one or the other; but, as to rents, issues, and profits of such property accruing subsequently to the passage of the act, we have no doubt that the power existed.

Counsel, however, call attention to the word "interest" in the phrase, "rents, profits, interest, and proceeds," and argue therefrom that something more than the mere income from the real property was meant thereby. But it must be remembered that the framers of the act used the phrase with reference to personal property as well as real property, and could possibly have had reference to a very common source of income from that character of personal property known as money. Be this as it may, however, even a causal perusal of the act will show that its framers had no very accurate conception of the meaning of words or very great skill in their use; at least, there is nothing in the wording of the act elsewhere that would imply that they had any such nicety in their use as this construction would imply. We rather think from the context that this phrase was the somewhat labored effort of the draughtsman of the law to convey the idea that the entire income of the property described should become common property. As this act stood on the statute books but two years, and as we hold that it was within the power of the legislature to say that the future income and proceeds of the separate property of the spouses should be the property of the spouse owning the separate property, it is not necessary that we discuss the effect of § 22 of the act, which declared common property to be the partnership property of the spouses; there being no showing in the record that any of the income of the property now under discussion was put back onto the property in the way of permanent fixtures or improvements which enhanced its value.

Counsel argue, however, that the natural enhancement in the value accruing while the marital relation existed should be treated as community property. They point out that the tracts adjudged to be separate property by the trial court have enhanced in value practically $350,000 since the marriage of the appellant and Francis M. Guye, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) and contend that it is property acquired during marriage, within the spirit and intent of the statute. But we think this contention untenable also. Since by the statute the spouse owning separate property is entitled to the rents, issues, and profits thereof, so such owner must be entitled to the natural increase in value, as such increase is as much the issue of such property as would be the rents derived therefrom. So, also, under such a rule, the ownership of a specific tract might be constantly changing. As long as its value remained stationary or decreased, it would be separate property. But the moment it increased in value it would become mixed property; that is, in part separate and in part community. And so, again, property that is separate property to-day might be mixed property to-morrow, and on the next day again be separate property, owing to its fluctuation in value. We cannot think this the meaning of the statute. We think the statute meant to declare that a specific article of personal property, or a specific tract of real property, once the separate property of one of the spouses, no matter how it may fluctuate in value, remains so unless, by the voluntary act of the spouse owning it, its nature is changed.

The cases relied upon by counsel to support this contention we shall not notice specifically. They call special attention, however, to the case of White v. White, 5 Barb. 474, and, as that case is illustrative of the others, we will point out wherein we think the question at bar differs from the question there determined. The case cited was a suit by the wife against the husband. It appears that subsequent to the marriage between the parties the wife inherited from her father's estate a considerable tract of land situated in the state of New York; that, after she had thus acquired the title, the legislative assembly of that state passed an act, the 2d section of which reads as follows: "The real and personal property, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, of any female now married, shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband, but shall be her sole and separate property as if she were a single female, except so far as the same may be liable for the debts of the husband heretofore contracted." N. Y. Laws 1848, p. 307. The suit was based upon this provision of the statute. The complaint set forth that the wife took possession of the inherited land soon after it was set apart to her by the commission appointed to make partition, and that she had continued to reside thereon until the last few weeks prior to the filing of the complaint, during which time she had been prevented from occupying the premises by her husband. It was further alleged that since she had acquired the property her husband had had the management and control of the same, and had enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits thereof; that he was a man of idle habits and addicted to the use of spirituous liquors; that he had been careless and improvident in the management and cultivation of the farm, and had greatly neglected it; that, after the passage of the act above named, he had avowed his determination to exercise the exclusive control of the land, and had prevented the plaintiff from exercising any control thereof, and had finally by personal force and violence expelled her therefrom. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and the court held that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, basing its decision on the ground that by the common law and the law in force in the state of New York prior to the passage of the act in question, the husband, by virtue of the marriage contract, became seised of a freehold estate in the real property of his wife, and was entitled to take the rents, issues, and profits of the land during their joint lives; and, further, since children had been born alive to them, he had a freehold estate during his natural life as tenant by curtesy in the property, which right was a vested right, and could not be taken away by any subsequent enactment of the legislature. This case, it is at once apparent, has no analogy to the case at bar, unless we are to hold that the statute of 1871 gave the wife at the time of the marriage a vested interest of some sort in the separate property of the husband. But this, as we have said, we are unable to do. Had the husband in the case at bar attempted to claim as his separate property by virtue of the subsequent statutes rents, issues, and profits of his separate property which had come into being during the time the act of 1871 was in force, the case cited would have bearing, but no such question, as we have said, is pointed out by the record. The case furnishes no aid by which to determine the proper construction of the statute of 1871. We conclude, therefore, that the property of the first class cited was rightly adjudged to be the separate property of the husband.

The tract of land forming the second class, as classified by counsel, was purchased from the executors of the estate of Charles C. Terry. The record shows that Charles C. Terry died February 17, 1867; that he left a will in which he named Franklin Mathias and Erasmus Smithers as executors, with power to sell and convey the real estate of which he died seised, at such times, at such prices, and on such terms, as the executors should deem wise; that, pursuant to the power conferred by the will, the executors sold the lot of which the tract now in question is a part to Francis M. Guye and one Charles Burnett on March 20, 1870, some two years prior to the marriage of Francis M. Guye to the appellant; that thereafter the lot was divided between the purchasers, Francis M. Guye taking the west half; that Guye took possession of the land awarded him, erected buildings thereon, and otherwise improved the same; that he subsequently rented the same to tenants and collected rents therefrom, all prior to his marriage with the appellant; that a deed to the property was made by the executors January 7, 1873, nearly one year after the marriage of Francis M. Guye and the appellant; that some two years later a return to the probate court was made by the executors of the sale, reciting that a sale of the property was had on March 29, 1870, to Guye and Burnett for $500, and asking that the sale be confirmed. The record made by the executors does not show when the purchase price of the lot was paid. Burnett, however, testified that the negotiations leading up to the purchase of the lot were transacted by Guye, and that some part of the purchase price was paid at the time of the purchase, but whether all or not he did not remember. There was no evidence of any other payment. The appellant bases her claim of a community interest in this tract on the fact that the deed to the same passed after her marriage with Guye, and the presumption arising from the manner in which business is ordinarily conducted that the purchase price was paid at the time the deed was delivered. But we cannot think this a just deduction from the facts shown. Clearly Guye had a valid subsisting interest in this property at the time of his marriage. He had taken possession of it and improved it, and paid a part, at least, of the purchase price. Had it been shown that the balance of the purchase price had been paid with community funds after the marriage, it might well be that, under the doctrine of Heintz v. Brown, 46 Wash. 387, 123 Am. St. Rep. 937, 90 Pac. 211, the property would have been community property "to the extent and in the proportion that the consideration is furnished by the community, the spouse supplying the separate funds having a separate interest in the property in proportion to the amount of his or her investment;" but clearly the entire property could not be community property. But there is no evidence in the record that community funds entered into the purchase price of the property. Therefore, for the want of some rule with which to measure such interest, if for no other, the court cannot hold that the community had any interest in this property.

The appellant calls attention to the fact that during the forty years of her married life with Francis M. Guye large sums were paid in taxes on this separate property, and she asks the court to presume that the money with which they were paid was community funds, and to charge the land with one half thereof for her benefit. But we cannot presume that the funds used to pay the taxes were community funds. What would have been the rule had it been shown that the husband had no separate income with which to pay these taxes we do not need to discuss; but where, as here, it is shown that he did have such separate income, there can be no presumption that he used community funds for the purpose of paying his separate debts. The presumption is always in favor of honesty and fair dealing rather than to the contrary. Moreover, the right of the spouses in their separate property is as sacred as is the right in their community property, and, when it is once made to appear that property was once of a separate character, it will be presumed that it maintains that character until some direct and positive evidence to the contrary is made to appear.

Nor do we think the fact that the spouses have joined in mortgaging property sufficient evidence on which to found a claim that the property mortgaged is community property. While the statute allows a husband or wife to sell and encumber his or her separate property, yet no prudent purchaser or mortgagee will ever take the separate deed or mortgage of a married man or married woman even when the other spouse sits by and disclaims interest. Such a deed or mortgage always requires explanation in subsequent dealings with the property whenever either of them forms a part of the chain of title, rendering the property less easy of disposition than it otherwise would be. The fact that both spouses joined in the encumbrances put on the property in this instance is therefore little or no evidence that the property was community rather than separate property.

The third class of lands claimed by the appellant to be community property are the lands acquired under coal-land entries made by the husband during the existence of the marital relation, and patented to him while the relation existed. In Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 32 L.R.A. 671, 39 Pac. 229, we held that land acquired by the husband under the homestead laws of the United States, where the entry was made, the necessary residence had, and the final proof made, during the existence of the marital relation, was community property. In subsequent cases we have applied the rule to pre-emption entries. On the other hand, we have held that land acquired under the stone and timber acts from the United States by the husband, during the marital relation, was his separate property. Gardner v. Port Blakely Mill Co. 8 Wash. 1, 35 Pac. 402; James v. James, 51 Wash. 60, 97 Pac. 1113, 98 Pac. 1115. The decisions were based on distinctions existing between the several acts providing the manner of entry, and the persons entitled to enter. Under the homestead and pre-emption acts but one entry was allowed to a family, which must be made by the head of the family; and it was required that the family live on the land and make a certain amount of improvements thereon before final proof could be made. The land was granted ostensibly for the benefit of the family, and the intent of Congress in passing the act was to induce men with families to settle upon and make their homes upon the public lands. Under the timber-land acts, no settlement upon or living upon the lands was required. The entryman was required to take an oath that he had made no other application under the act; that he did not apply to purchase the land for speculation, but for his own use and benefit; and that he had not made any agreement, directly or indirectly, in any way or manner, with any person or persons whomsoever by which the title he should acquire would inure to the benefit of any person other than himself. Each of the spouses could make such an entry, and there was nothing in the act itself which indicated a purpose to grant the land as a place of residence of the individual making the entry. True, after title was acquired, the entryman could make such use of it as he pleased, but it was not the primary purpose of the grant, as it was under the homestead and pre-emption acts, to furnish a home for the entryman and his family. These differences we thought and still think are fundamental, and justify the distinction made with reference to the character of the property on its acquisition.

The method of acquiring land under the coal-land acts in analogous to that of the timber and stone acts, and not that of the homestead and pre-emption acts. Each of the spouses can make an entry and acquire title under it. No residence on the land is required. The entryman must take and subscribe to an oath to the effect that the entry is made for his own benefit, and not directly or indirectly for the benefit of any other person. By analogy, therefore, the property should be held to be separate property rather than community property. But the appellant argues that this court has expressed its dissatisfaction with the decisions under the timber and stone act, holding property so acquired to be separate property, and has adhered to the rule on the doctrine of stare decisis rather than on principle, thinking that to disturb the earlier rule would disturb property rights acquired under it, that here there is no precedent to interfere, as this is a case of first impression in this court, and the court is at liberty to adopt such rule as it thinks most agreeable with the community system of property adopted in this state. But while it is true that the first decision under the timber and stone act was by a divided court, and it may be that individual members of the court have expressed doubt as to whether the correct rule was adopted in that case, the majority of the court has always felt that the case was correct in principle, and should be adhered to on that ground rather than on the ground of stare decisis. By analogy, therefore, we hold that the land here in question was the separate property of the husband, and not the community property of the husband and wife.

The fourth class involves the mining claims. The laws relating to the acquisition of mines containing the precious metals are similar to those relating to the acquisition of timber and coal lands. Either spouse can make entry under them, and acquire a full title from the United States without the aid or intervention of the other, and that such property is the separate property of the locator, and not the community property of the husband and wife, we held in Phoenix Min. & Mill. Co. v. Scott, 20 Wash. 48, 54 Pac. 777.

The fifth class was adjudged by the trial court to be community property, and no question concerning the correctness of the decision is suggested on the appeal.

These conclusions require an affirmance of the judgment of the court below, and such affirmance will be ordered.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

NEW YORK CONTINENTAL JEWELL FILTRATION COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

MARGARET J. JONES.

(37 App. D. C. 511.)

Water — percolating — withdrawal — interference with surface support — liability.

No action lies for withdrawing percolating water from under the surface of a parcel of real estate in the construction of a tunnel of a railroad under an adjoining street, the fee of which is in the public, although the result is a consolidation of the earth which causes a settlement and cracking of the walls of buildings thereon.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by

The earlier cases involving rights in percolating water were discussed in the note to Meeker v. East Orange, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465, and earlier L.R.A. notes therein cited, which show that, whereas the earlier decisions laid down the general rule of absolute rights in such water, the great majority of the recent cases have receded from that view, and favor the doctrine of confining each landowner to a reasonable use of the water. This being so, it is clear that NEW YORK CONTINENTAL JEWELL FILTRATION Co. v. JONES is out of line with the modern authorities in invoking, as it does, the doctrine of absolute rights.

The case of Burr v. MacLay Rancho Water Co. — Cal. —, 116 Pac. 715, a former appeal of which is reported in 154 Cal. 423, 98 Pac. 260, and commented upon in the note in 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331, follows Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 64 L.R.A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, and holds that the existence of a common supply of water in a state of percolation, of such character, that the taking from one overlying tract will subsequently diminish the quantity available in another overlying tract, gives correlative rights in the common supply, and creates a right in one such landowner to prevent another from taking the water to distant lands not overlying the common supply, if such taking is injurious to him. It was further held that one who acquires adjoining property after the appropriation has begun takes subject to the right which the appropriator then had, but that the appropriator does not, because of his first taking, have any right to take an additional quantity thereafter. And it is also held that water taken solely to fulfil the private contractual obligation of the appropriator to deliver water to such lots, which it has sold with a water right, is a private use, and not a public use, so as to render applicable the rule of Katz v. Walkinshaw, supra, in regard to an estoppel upon him who, without protest, knowingly allows his property to be taken for public use, sees expensive works installed and the public service begun, and stating the rule to be that in such case he will be limited to the remedy of an action for damages,

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James H. Hayden and George W. Dalzell, for appellant:

The defendant's acts of which the plaintiff complains were duly authorized and required by legislative authority, and plaintiff's damage, if sustained as alleged, was damnum absque injuria.

United States v. Alexander, 148 U. S. 186, 37 L. ed. 415, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529.

Mr. Justice Van Orsdel delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case brought by Margaret J. Jones, plaintiff below, against the New York Continental Jewell Filtration Company, a corporation, defendant, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff in consequence of the construction of the railroad tunnel of the Washington Terminal Company under the west side of First street, Northeast, in the city of Washington.

Plaintiff alleged in her declaration that she was the owner of a house and lot abutting the parking on the easterly side of First street, between East Capitol and A streets; that while the defendant company, under contract with the Washington Terminal Company for the construction of the tunnel, was excavating and constructing the tunnel under the street opposite her property, the land began to settle, causing the foundations and walls of her house to crack, and that this settlement and cracking, which plaintiff alleges began March 1, 1903, continued up to the time this action was brought.

The declaration is in four counts. In the first two plaintiff charged that the settlement was caused by the excavating and other work done by the defendant in constructing the tunnel, the effect of which had been to destroy the lateral support of her land. In the third count it was charged that the building of the tunnel had caused a permanent impairment of the property and diminution of its value. The fourth count charged negligence. The third and fourth counts were withdrawn from the jury, and a verdict for damages rendered in favor of the plaintiff upon the first two counts of the declaration.

It appears from the testimony that the tunnel is 48 feet wide and 24 feet in height; that from the top of the tunnel to the surface of the street opposite plaintiff's premises is a distance of 27½ feet; that the distance on the surface of the street from a point perpendicular to the east side of said tunnel to the west line of plaintiff's lot, or the west wall of her house, is 69 feet, and that a direct line between the nearest adjacent points of the house and the tunnel is about 90 feet.

A plat showing the settlement of the ground as it appeared on the surface of the street in front of plaintiff's property was admitted in evidence, and is conceded to show the exact condition after the construction of the tunnel. It appears that directly in front of plaintiff's house the settlement in the street at the center line of the tunnel in February, 1908, was 1 foot, 3 inches, and that the settlement, as it appeared on the surface, gradually decreased in an easterly direction until it entirely disappeared at a point 20 feet, 3 inches west of the west line of plaintiff's premises, the west wall of the house being on the west line of the lot. Photographs, taken before work on the tunnel was begun, showing cracks in the outside walls of plaintiff's house, are in evidence.

Attention is called to these established facts in order that we may approach more intelligently the point upon which this appeal must turn. There is considerable evidence in the record to the effect that the upper stratum of soil in the vicinity of plaintiff's property is composed of sand and gravel heavily charged with water, and that to meet this contingency drain pipes were laid in each side of the tunnel to carry away the percolating subterranean waters. The chief engineer of the defendant company testified: "The tunnel could not have been constructed without provision for drainage. The plans called for a system of waterproofing and drainage, and the tunnel was constructed accordingly. The withdrawal of water from subterranean soil tends to decrease the voids between the individual particles of soil and allow gradual consolidation. After the water is withdrawn, the soil will occupy less volume than it did originally when the water was present. The stratum of sand and gravel overlying the clay was heavily charged with water. Some springs were encountered, but the water was continuous throughout the stratum of sand and gravel. The soil was practically uniform along square 728." A number of witnesses, both for plaintiff and defendant, testified that the withdrawal of underground water would cause a consolidation of the earth and admit of settlement.

While the lot on which the house stood, and for a considerable distance west of the house, showed no surface settlement, according to the exhibited plat, it may well be that the superior weight of the house caused its walls to settle, due to the withdrawal of subterranean waters. This theory, considering the physical conditions shown to exist at and surrounding plaintiff's premises before and after the construction of the tunnel, is certainly more plausible than that the construction of a tunnel at a distance of 90 feet from the house, without negligence to cause an unnecessary movement of the earth, withdrew the lateral support of earth from its foundations and caused the settlement of the walls.

At the conclusion of the case, counsel for defendant offered the following instruction, which the court refused to submit to the jury: "The jury is instructed that if they find that the injury, if any, to plaintiff's premises, was due to the withdrawal of subterranean waters from beneath the surface of plaintiff's land, caused by the excavation of the tunnels, plaintiff cannot recover, and their verdict must be for the defendant." This was error. Clearly, if the damage was caused by the withdrawal of subterranean waters in consequence of the construction of the tunnel, it is damnum absque injuria, and there can be no recovery.

The common-law right of a landowner, or those holding under him, if essential to 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the full enjoyment of his estate, to drain percolating subterranean water from beneath the land of his neighbor, is too well settled to admit of division of opinion. The exception is found in the familiar rule that where one grants land to another for a particular purpose, if the withdrawal of the water by the grantor on adjacent land would destroy the use for which the grantee purchased, the grantor would be estopped from doing an act in derogation of his own grant. But the exception has no application to this case. When plaintiff purchased the lot she was charged with notice of the uses to which the adjacent land might be subjected, both by public and private structures, such as are common in great cities.

The controlling case on this subject, and one generally cited in support of the common-law rule, is Popplewell v. Hodgkinson, L. R. 4 Exch. 248. Cockburn, Ch. J., announcing the opinion of the court said: "Although there is no doubt that a man has no right to withdraw from his neighbor the support of adjacent soil, there is nothing at common law to prevent his draining that soil, if, for any reason, it becomes necessary or convenient for him to do so. It may be, indeed, that where one grants land to another for some special purpose, for building purposes, for example, then, since, according to the old maxim, a man cannot derogate from his own grant, the grantor could not do anything whatever with his own land which might have the effect of rendering the land granted less fit for the special purpose in question than it otherwise might have been. . . . Indeed, when we remember that the land was close to an important and populous town, and that there was, therefore, every probability of its being built upon, the plaintiff, we may infer, must have had strong reasons for supposing that it would be so built upon, and, consequently, would be effectually drained, if the nature of the erections proposed to be put upon it should render that operation necessary. It so happens that a church has been built there, and it was essential, the buildings being large and heavy, to drain the land deeply to get a secure foundation. Now, the plaintiff cannot complain of this, for he had no right to suppose that the adjacent land would be used for the erection of such cottages as he had himself erected, or of other buildings requiring equally little support. Seeing, then, that there was no implied condition that the grantor in this case would not drain, there was no obligation on him or those who claim through him not to drain, to such an extent as the nature of the building to be erected rendered safe and desirable."

The reason for the rule is that percolating subterranean water is a wandering thing, which, like the air, is not subject to any fixed rules of law. The existence, origin, course, and movement of such waters, and the causes which govern and direct their movements, are so involved in mystery, secrecy, and uncertainty as to render any attempt to establish or administer any set of legal rules with respect to them practically impossible.

One of the best-considered cases which has come to our notice is Chatfield v. Wilson, 28 Vt. 49. It is there held that "there are no correlative rights existing between the proprietors of adjoining lands, in reference to the use of the water in the earth, or percolating under its surface. Such water is to be regarded as part of the land itself, to be enjoyed absolutely by the proprietor within whose territory it is; and to it the law governing the use of running streams is inapplicable." This case, based upon the strongest reason, goes to the full extent in holding that the act of detaining or diverting subsurface percolating waters from an adjoining proprietor gives no right of action.

It is not different that the drainage here was caused by the construction of a railroad in a public street. The use of the street for this purpose was proper. The railroad company acquired its right of way from the government, in which was the fee and control of the street. We can see no distinction between the right of the railway company through its agent, the defendant, to intercept the percolating waters findings their way to the tunnel, and that of the government itself, had it caused similar drainage by the construction of sewerage or other public work under the street. In New Albany & S. R. Co. v. Peterson, 14 Ind. 112, 77 Am. Dec. 60, where the railroad, in excavating on its right of way, drained a well on neighboring land, not touched by the right of way, it was said: "The railroad company, for the purpose of constructing their road, had the same right to excavate, within the limits of their right of way, that a private individual would have to dig upon his land for any purpose; and we know of no statute or principle which would hold them liable for an injury, such as that complained of, beyond the liability of a natural person for a like injury."

condemned a right of way for a tunnel through which to convey water to supply the city of Washington. In its construction, appellee's well, situated a distance of 500 feet from the tunnel, and not within the right of way condemned, was destroyed. The act of Congress authorizing the condemnation of the right of way provided for the adjustment of "all claims for value or damages on account of ownership of any interest in said premises, or on account of injury to a property right by the construction of said works." The case turned upon the statutory right of action granted. The court held that water collected in appellee's well constituted a property right, and that, under the provisions of the statute, the government was liable for damages incurred by reason of its destruction. The court, referring to the common-law rule as laid down in Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 324, 13 L. J. Exch. N. S. 289, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 168, and similar cases, said: "The doctrine of those cases substantially is, that the owner of land may dig therein and apply all that is there found to his own purposes at his free will and pleasure; and that if, in the exercise of such right, he intercepts or drains off the water collected from underground springs in his neighbor's well, this inconvenience to his neighbor falls within the description of damnum absque injuria, which cannot become the ground of an action. We recognize this as sound doctrine in the ordinary case of a question between adjoining owners of land. But in a case like the present, where the injury complained of is inflicted by the construction of a public work under authority of a statute, over land upon which the public authority has acquired a right of way only, and where the statute itself provides a remedy for such injury, the law has been held to be otherwise in cases whose reasoning demands our assent." The court then refers at length to a number of decisions by the supreme court of Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts it has been held that the common law does not apply where damage to an adjacent property owner was caused by the drainage of underground waters by a railroad company in the course of constructing its road within the limits of its own right of way. Parker v. Boston & M. R. Co. 3 Cush. 107, 50 Am. Dec. 709. But the common law has been superseded by statute in Massachusetts in respect of damages caused by the construction and maintenance of railroads. The statute provides that "every railroad corporation shall be liable to pay all damages that shall be occasioned by laying out and making and maintaining their road, or by taking any land or materials." A similar statute in Massachusetts also holds a municipal corporation liable for damages occasioned by the making or maintaining of a street in a condemned right of way. It provides that in estimating damage "regard shall be had to all the damages done to the party, whether by taking his property or injuring it in any manner." Marsden v. Cambridge, 114 Mass. 490. Under these statutory provisions damages can be recovered for injuring land, whether it abut upon the right of way or not.

There is no statute in this District abrogating the common-law rule. Hence, if the damage to plaintiff's property was occasioned by the withdrawal of the percolating subsurface waters from underneath her premises, there can be no recovery, and defendant company was entitled to have the jury so instructed.

The judgment is reversed, with costs, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Nuisance — purchaser — notice.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Muhlenberg County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' land by water permitted to flow from defendant's mines. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert Hardison, Jr., for appellants:

A coal mining company that has upon its land a mine in which there is a breakthrough, out of which copperas water habitually escapes and damages the land of another, is liable for such damage, whether it actually knows the water is escaping and causing the damage or not.

Nebo Consol. Coal & Coking Co. v. Lynch, 141 Ky. 711, 133 S. W. 763; Kinnaird v. Standard Oil Co. 89 Ky. 468, 7 L.R.A. 451, 25 Am. St. Rep. 545, 12 S. W. 938.

The owner of lands damaged by copperas water cast upon them from a coal mine is entitled to recover for such damages, although such lands have, since such copperas water was turned upon them, increased in value.

Covington v. Berry, 120 Ky. 582, 87 S. W. 317.

Messrs. Sparks & Belcher and Newton Belcher for appellee.

Lassing, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this litigation the appellants, W. E. Glenn and others, the owners of a small tract of land in Muhlenberg county, Kentucky, sought to recover damages of the Crescent Coal Company for suffering and permitting copperas water to flow from its mines over their property. They alleged that some of this copperas water was suffered and permitted to flow from an unused mine owned by appellee, while still other water was pumped from one of its mines, and that this water, flowing from the unused mine and pumped from the mine in use, ran down upon their land and destroyed the vegetation thereon, damaging it in the sum of $800.

The defendant in its answer denied that it had damaged the plaintiffs in any sum whatever. It further pleaded that the unused mine had not been worked for many years, that they had only recently come in possession of the property, i. e., within the last few years, and that they were not aware that any copperas water flowed therefrom, or had flowed therefrom, over on plaintiffs' land. They admitted pumping copperas water from the other mine, but alleged that it flowed down the natural water way through plaintiffs' land, and that, if any damage was done by said copperas water, it was due to the fact that plaintiffs had caused the water way to become closed by the accumulation of dead timber or other waste material from their farm, thus diverting the water from its channel, and causing it at times to flow upon plaintiffs' land.

The affirmative matter in the answer was traversed, and upon a trial of the issues thus formed a verdict was returned in favor of the defendant. The suit was in equity, and an injunction was sought prohibiting the defendant company from permitting the copperas water to flow from its unused mine, and also prohibiting it from pumping copperas water from its other mine, so that it could flow over plaintiffs' land. The jury having found against plaintiffs, the chancellor dismissed their petition, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

A reversal is sought principally upon the ground that the court did not properly instruct the jury. Upon the question of damage, the evidence was conflicting, and it cannot be said that the verdict of the jury is against the weight of the evidence; and unless the court erred in instructing the jury, its finding of fact must be affirmed. The instructions to which appellants object are Nos. 6, 7, and 8.

In instruction No. 6 the court in substance told the jury that, unless the defendants operated the old mine or caused the opening thereof to be in such condition that the copperas water flowed therefrom upon and over plaintiffs' land, defendants were not liable for any damage resulting therefrom, unless they had notice that said water was flowing from said opening upon their land and injuring it. This old mine had been opened some thirty years before the trial, and such copperas water as escaped therefrom flowed down a natural water way, which was a small ditch or branch, through the lands owned by appellants. The pumping station from which the water was pumped out was established some twenty years or more before the litigation, and the water as pumped from it had likewise flowed down the natural water way through appellants' land. The property was in this identical condition when bought by appellee company. They at no time worked the old mine, or did anything to it or with it, and made no change of any sort in its opening or mouth, from which the water flowed. After their purchase, they did continue to pump water from the pumping station, until some time in the year 1905. During all of this time, no complaint was made to them by anyone owning this land of any damage whatever from any source, until three or four years after the pumping station had been abandoned, and no water had been thrown by appellee into this natural water way. The proof shows that copperas water from other openings passed through ditches and natural water ways over the lands of other persons, until it reached the stream flowing over appellants' land. All of the evidence shows that no damage resulted to appellants from the copperas water after it reached the stream, although there is some evidence supporting appellants' claim that during periods of heavy rainfall the water way or ditch was not sufficient to carry the flow, and that its banks overflowed, and that the water ran into a field near and below the ditch or water way, and it is this land which appellants claim was damaged. It is not shown that there was any deposit of copperas on this land, or that mineral water was standing on any of the land, although there is testimony that some of the lower portions of this land produced no vegetation. The ground upon which appellants rest their right to recover is that appellee was maintaining a nuisance. If so, before appellants would have any just cause of complaint, they should have brought notice of this fact home to appellee, and given it an opportunity to abate it, or correct the evil. When appellee purchased this property, the old mine was there in the same condition that it had been for many years, and as no complaint, so far as the evidence shows, had been made that the water discharged therefrom was injuring the property of anyone, and particularly appellants, it would be manifestly unjust to hold that appellee was liable for damage resulting from this flow of water, in the absence of some notice to it that injury or damage was being caused thereby.

In the case of West v. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. 8 Bush, 404, this court had under consideration the right of a distillery company to recover damages from a railroad company, for injury to its property resulting from the flooding of the distillery, on account of an obstruction which the railroad company had put in a stream running near by. The bed of the road was built in 1833. When built, culverts were placed thereunder, and it appears that these culverts were never sufficient for the free and natural passage of the water in rainy seasons, and at different times it had caused the water to accumulate above it and overflow the adjacent lands. Some years after the construction of the railroad, the distillery property was bought by West & Brother, and the flooding thereof occurred after its purchase. After stating the facts, the court said: "With reference to the imputed liability of the appellee for continuing in 1870 a private nuisance created as early as 1833, it must be borne in mind that the parties are in the position of grantees since the erection of the nuisance. But, although when one who erects a nuisance conveys the land, he does not transfer the liability for the erection to the grantee, it is nevertheless true that an alienee may become responsible for the continuance of a nuisance, either to a party originally affected by it or another deriving title from him. We consider the principle, however, as sustained, at least by a preponderance of authority, that in such a case the alienee or grantee does not become responsible unless, after reasonable notice, request, or remonstrance, he shall refuse to reform or abate the nuisance." And, continuing, the court cited with approval the following from Johnson v. Lewis, 13 Conn. 303, 33 Am. Dec. 405: "The purchaser of property might be subjected to great injustice if he were made responsible for consequences of which he was ignorant, and for damages which he never intended to occasion. They are often such as cannot be easily known, except to the party injured. A plaintiff ought not to rest in silence, and finally surprise an unsuspecting purchaser by an action for damages, but should be presumed to acquiesce until he requests a removal of the nuisance."

We are of opinion that, under these authorities, instruction No. 6 was authorized; and we are further of opinion that in the form in which it was given, it was even more favorable to appellants than they were entitled to have it.

Complaint is likewise made of instructions Nos. 7 and 8. In instruction No. 7 the court told the jury that it was the duty of plaintiffs, after receiving notice that their land was being injured by copperas water from defendant's pumping station or mine, to exercise reasonable care to protect themselves from further injury, and if they failed to do so, they cannot now recover for any injury which, by the exercise of reasonable care, they might have avoided. This instruction was given because it was made to appear in the evidence that the plaintiffs had deadened a lot of trees and timber along the banks of the water way, and had suffered and permitted this deadened timber to fall into and obstruct the free flow of the stream, causing the water to flow over their land.

In instruction No. 8 the court told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the plaintiffs had failed to make a reasonable effort to prevent the natural water ways across their lands, through which copperas water from defendant's mine was flowing, from becoming obstructed and filled up, and thereby said water was caused to flow upon their land and injure it, they should find for the defendant as to such injury.

These instructions, while not strictly accurate in defining the rights of the respective parties, were evidently not prejudicial to appellants, for it is clear from the evidence that they knew that these deadened trees were falling into and across the water way, and that the débris and trash which the heavy rains brought down from the uplands would lodge against these timbers and cause the stream to overflow. It seems this is what plaintiffs desired should be done. Their lands at that point were low and swampy. They knew that much silt and detritus was brought down from the higher lands above them, and that, if the water carrying this was caused to overflow their land, this silt and soil would be deposited thereon, and the land would be rendered more valuable. This is doubtless true; but they knew, or must have known, that the copperas water from these mines above them flowed down this natural water way, and that, if the water was diverted from its channel and caused to flow over their land, the copperas water would to some extent be deposited thereon. If they desired that their lowlands should be built up by deposits brought down by the stream from above, and with a view to this end they suffered and permitted the bed of the stream to become closed, so that the water flowed over their land, they must take it as they find it,—the burden with the benefits. It is well settled that the owner of land through which a stream flows may make any reasonable use he desires of the stream, so long as such use does not interfere with the rights of others. It was perfectly right for plaintiffs to cause the water from this stream to flow over their land, provided they again caused it to enter its channel before leaving their property. But they could not, after causing the water to leave the banks of the stream and flow over their land, hold appellee responsible for their resulting damage. This would be an improper use of the water on their part.

It is the enunciation of no new principle to state that it is the duty of one whose property is injured, or about to be injured, by the wrong of another, to exercise reasonable diligence to avoid or minimize the resulting injury. If he fails to do so, he cannot recover for any damage which he could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have avoided. This principle is admirably stated by Mr. Thompson in his work on Negligence, vol. 1, p. 195, where, after discussing various phases of this subject, he says: "In short, the law imposes upon every person who has been injured, either in his person or his property, by the negligence or misconduct of another, to do what he reasonably may in order to keep down the damages or to prevent their enhancement. But the obligation is not absolute; it is relative; it extends no further than to require him to do what a reasonable man, guided by considerations of obligations which rest upon every member of a civilized society, might be expected to do under the circumstances." This is, in substance, what the court told the jury it was the duty of plaintiffs to do in regard to this water way.

In Raleigh v. Clark, 114 Ky. 732, 71 S. W. 857, it was held that, where one whose duty it was to clean out a ditch failed to do so, by reason of which another's land was overflowed and his crop damaged, he could only recover the reasonable cost of opening the ditch and keeping it open. And in Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Chestnut Bros. 28 Ky. L. Rep. 404, 89 S. W. 298, the plaintiff sought to recover damages from the railroad company for failure to deliver to them a carload of fowls with reasonable despatch, by reason of which delay a number of the fowls were frozen and damaged. It appeared in the evidence that, although there was delay in forwarding the car to its destination in Chicago, the consignees, the agents of plaintiff, failed to unload the fowls therefrom promptly upon its arrival, and because of such failure an additional loss was sustained. In passing upon the rights of the respective parties, the court said: "From these facts it must be seen that appellants were not liable at all for fowls which died because of diseased condition when shipped; nor for those which died from exposure or other cause before they reached Chicago; nor for any that died or were damaged by reason of any negligence of Brown & Son in failing to remove them from the car after having had it so placed that they reasonably could have removed them before damage or death to them." It will be observed that the court here held that there could be no recovery for any damage which might have been prevented by the exercise of reasonable care upon the part of the plaintiff's agent in unloading the fowls. So, in the case at bar, appellants could have avoided any injury whatever to their land by keeping the water way or ditch through it free from the falling timber, which obstructed the stream and caused the water to overflow their land.

L. Rep. 201, 84 S. W. 583, it was held that a passenger put off a train at a wrong station was not entitled to recover for damages which she could reasonably have avoided, or to enhance her damages by her own imprudent conduct. In other words, she should exercise reasonable care not to enhance or increase her damage.

In New York L. Ins. Co. v. Pope, 139 Ky. 567, 68 S. W. 851, it was held that one holding a policy of insurance which entitled him to borrow money thereon from the insurance company at a specified rate was not entitled to recover damages from the company because of its failure to loan him money thereon, in the absence of a showing that he was unable to borrow money elsewhere at as favorable a rate.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Sullivan Timber Co. 138 Ala. 379, 35 So. 327, it was held that where the property of the appellee was set fire to by sparks from an engine of the appellant company, it was the duty of appellee to exercise reasonable care to extinguish the fire and prevent its spread, and that they were only entitled to recover for such damage as they could not have avoided by the exercise of reasonable care.

In Ft. Smith Suburban R. Co. v. Maledon, 78 Ark. 366, 95 S. W. 472, it was held that where one had wrongfully entered another's land and left his fences down, so that cattle entered the premises and destroyed the crops, a recovery could be had only for such damages as the owner of the crops could not have avoided by the exercise of reasonable care.

In Macon v. Dannenberg, 113 Ga. 1111, 39 S. E. 446, it was held that where a city had negligently permitted a drain to be so obstructed as not to carry away the water from a lot, the owner of this lot must exercise reasonable care to prevent his lot from being injured by an overflow, and that he could not recover from the city for any damages which he might have, by the exercise of ordinary care in this particular, avoided. To the same effect are Hartford Deposit Co. v. Calkins, 186 Ill. 104, 57 N. E. 863, and Scherrer v. Baltzer, 84 Ill. App. 126.

In Harrison v. Missouri, P. R. Co. 88 Mo. 625, it is held to be the duty of a person whose property has been injured by the negligence of another, to put forth reasonable exertion and expense to prevent its injury, and if he fails to do so, he cannot recover as for a total loss.

Clearly, upon principle and in the exercise of common justice, it was the duty of appellants, when they knew their land was being injured by the flow of copperas water over it, to exercise reasonable care to prevent this injury by the removal of the fallen trees from the water way. Had this been done, they would have suffered practically no damage at all. The jury evidently regarded this failure on their part as the proximate cause of any damage which they had sustained.

The substance of the instruction asked for by appellants and refused was embodied in the instruction on the measure of damages given by the court.

Lastly, it is urged for appellants, that the chancellor should have, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, enjoined the appellee company from permitting the copperas water to flow from its mine down upon their land. Clearly he should not have done so, unless he believed from the evidence before him that the appellants were damaged thereby. While it is true that the verdict of the jury need not exercise a controlling influence over the mind of the chancellor in determining the rights of the parties, it is entirely proper that it should have been given some weight and consideration by him. We are of opinion, after having read the record with great care, that he gave this verdict of the jury no more weight than it was entitled to. Plaintiffs' damage, if any, was not caused by the running of this copperas water into the natural water way that flowed through their place. So long as the water way remained open, they suffered no damage to their land, but it was only when they permitted it to become closed or stopped up that any damage resulted to them. If the timber which they deadened along the banks of this water way fell into it, and was permitted by them to remain in it, and thus cause the stream to overflow, plaintiffs might not rightfully complain of any resulting damage. This is not a suit for damages arising from a pollution of the stream, but for injury to land caused by the overflow of the stream, and, the jury having found that plaintiffs have not sustained any damage on this account, the chancellor did not err in refusing the injunction.

Judgment affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

M. J. McFADDEN, Appt.,

v.

FRANK FOLLRATH, Respnt.

(114 Minn. 85, 130 N. W. 542.)

Principal and agent — authority to indorse.

1. Authority of an agent to collect bills and receipt therefor carries no implication of authority to indorse negotiable paper.

Payment — check — condition.

2. When a debtor has given his check for the amount of his indebtedness, in the absence of a contrary agreement, such check is given and received as a conditional, not an absolute, payment of the debt.

Bank — unauthorized indorsement — liability to owner.

3. A bank, paying a check upon the unauthorized indorsement of the payee, and charging the amount thereof to the drawer's account, becomes liable to the payee for the amount of such check, unless the conduct of the payee excuses such payment, or prevents him from asserting such liability.

Check — indorsement by agent — effect.

4. Under such circumstances, a check given by the debtor to pay an account, and wrongfully indorsed by the agent authorized to receive it, discharges the liability on the original account.

Payment — check — collection by agent.

5. To pay an existing indebtedness, the defendant gave his check payable to plaintiff's order, to an agent of plaintiff authorized to receive the same. The agent, having no authority so to do, indorsed the plaintiff's name by himself as agent, and cashed the check at the bank on which it was drawn. The bank charged the defendant's account with the amount of the check, and returned the check to defendant, stamped "Paid." Held, such facts are a defense to an action by the plaintiff against the defendant on the account to pay which the check was given.

The exact point here annotated, as stated in McFADDEN v. FOLLRATH, does not seem to have been often decided in reported cases.

In Burstein v. Sullivan, 134 App. Div. 623, 119 N. Y. Supp. 317, motion for reargument denied in 136 App. Div. 920, 120 N. Y. Supp. 1116, where a debtor drew his check for work done, to the order of his creditors, and handed it to the general manager of the latter's business, who had authority to render bills and receive payments, but no express authority to sign checks, it was held that the account was paid, notwithstanding the fact that the general manager indorsed the check and appropriated it to his own use. Miller, J., said: "A payment to . . . [the general manager] in cash would have been a payment to the plaintiffs, though he had stolen the money; and the defendant should not be compelled to pay twice, or [be] subjected to the hazard of a lawsuit with the bank, for having taken the precaution to protect the plaintiffs by making a check payable to their order. It is true that the delivery of a check or of a note does not of itself discharge the indebtedness. If the check or the note is not paid, the creditor may sue on the original indebtedness. But the cases dealing with that subject have no application whatever to the question in hand. If this check had not been paid by the funds of the defendant on deposit in the bank upon which it was drawn, the plaintiffs could sue, either upon the check or the original indebtedness; and, of course, the defense of payment could not successfully be pleaded to a suit on the original indebtedness." Then, after saying what is quoted in McFADDEN v. FOLLRATH, the learned justice continued: "No doubt, the rule is that express authority, or power involving such authority, must be conferred upon an agent to sign negotiable paper, and that authority merely to collect a debt does not involve authority to indorse checks given in payment of it; but those propositions and the authorities in support of them are aside from the point now involved. Upon the delivery of the check to . . . [the general manager], in payment of the bill rendered 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by him, it became the plaintiffs' property; and if their agent by a forged indorsement, or one made without sufficient authority, obtained the cash and appropriated it to his own use, they should settle the question with the bank."

And in Sage v. Burton, 84 Hun, 267, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1122, which is set out in McFADDEN v. FOLLRATH, it was further said: "The plaintiffs, having authorized the agent to receive the check, and thus removing it beyond the control of the defendant, took, as between them and the defendant, the risk of the acts of their own agent; all the risk that the defendant took in the matter was that of establishing that the agent had power and authority to take the check in settlement, and that the drawer had funds in the bank with which to pay it on presentment. He did not even take the risk of a forged indorsement. That, probably, was the risk of the bank. The jury, under the charge of the court, have, we think, found, upon sufficient evidence, that the agent in this matter was authorized by the principal to receive this check, and that, coupled with its finding of payment of the check, operated to discharge the defendant from liability. . . . If it be held that . . . [the agent], in this transaction, was not the alter ego of the plaintiffs, and had no authority to indorse this check, yet, if he was authorized by the plaintiffs to receive this check from the defendant, any misappropriation of its proceeds by him is at the risk of the party who set him in motion and put it in his power to perpetrate the wrong; such party must suffer rather than the party who is no wise accountable for, and has no control of, the perpetration of the wrong."

So, in Allen v. Tarrant & Co. 7 App. Div. 172, 40 N. Y. Supp. 114, it is said that the case cannot be distinguished from Sage v. Burton, supra. Here it appeared that, prior to the giving of the checks in dispute, the creditor, through its agent, received a check of the debtor's, which was deposited in the creditor's account in bank, and paid by the defendant without any disapproval of the debtor's procedure. After considering salesmen of plaintiff, who presented statements of account to defendant. Payment was usually made by checks payable to plaintiff's order, and delivered to such agents. These checks were, by the agents, sent in to plaintiff, by plaintiff indorsed, and through the usual channels were paid and returned to defendant. On the 8th of February defendant was indebted to plaintiff for goods sold in the sum of $77.03. Plaintiff then had in his employ as a traveling salesman one Henry J. Good. Good was instructed to call on the defendant and collect this bill. He was authorized to receive payment in cash or by check. Upon presentation of the account, defendant made and delivered to Good his check drawn on the First State Bank of Arlington, dated February 15th, payable to plaintiff's order, for the amount of the bill, and received from Good a receipt acknowledging payment. Good indorsed the check, "McFadden Candy Company, by Henry J. Good, Agent," presented it to the First State Bank of Arlington, and received from the bank, in money, the amount of the check. The bank charged defendant's account with the amount, and returned the check to defendant in the regular course of business, stamped, "Paid Feb. 8." Good did not account to plaintiff for the proceeds of the check. He was not authorized to indorse for plaintiff and receive money on checks payable to plaintiff. Plaintiff brings this action against the defendant for goods sold, and seeks to recover the same ing that the silence of the creditor to some extent justified the debtor's belief that the agent was authorized to accept checks, and considering other circumstances in the case, the court held that there was evidence to justify a finding that the money received on the checks was lawfully in the possession of the creditor's agent at the time the latter converted it to his own use, and that the debtor was entitled to go to the jury upon this question of payment.

Where an agent who was authorized to sell certain cattle accepted as part payment a check payable to the order of his principal, and the agent indorsed it in the name of his principal for collection, got the cash and deposited it to the credit of the principal, it was held in Case v. Kramer, 34 Mont. 142, 85 Pac. 878, that the payment was good, and that it was of no importance that the check made payable to the order of the principal was indorsed in his name for collection by the agent without special authority, since the principal actually received the proceeds.

The extinguishment of a debt is not effected by the debtor's drawing his check to the order of his creditor, and handing it to the latter's bookkeeper, who is "in the habit of receiving checks and cash paid at the office," and who indorses it without authority to another, who deposits it in his own bank, by which it is collected of the drawee bank and charged by such bank to the account of the debtor, and returned by it to the debtor with other vouchers, since the check was not actually paid in due course. Bernheimer v. Herrman, 44 Hun, 110, wherein it was said: "A check in and of itself is not payment, but it may become so when accepted as such, and in due course actually paid; that is, in order that a check may operate as payment, two things must concur. The check must be accepted as payment, and in due course be actually paid. In the case at bar only one of these necessary elements exists. The check in question was accepted as payment, but it has not in due course been paid. The payment of a check drawn payable to order, and unindorsed, to a party who has received the same from a person who has stolen the check, cannot be held to be payment in due course."

So, a like decision was reached in Dowdall v. Borgfeldt & Co. 113 N. Y. Supp. 1069, where an employee of the plaintiff opened the latter's mail, forged the indorsement of the plaintiff on the checks, indorsed his own name thereon, and misappropriated the proceeds.

No written opinion appears in Falk v. Starr, 31 Misc. 756, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1135, where the judgment was for the plaintiff, the court merely saying: "We think this case was correctly disposed of by the court below on the authority of Bernheimer v. Herrman, supra, decided in this department [appellate division of supreme court, first department], and which, for that reason, we should follow, rather than Sage v. Burton, supra, elsewhere decided [appellate division of supreme court, third department] by a divided court."

Both Bernheimer v. Herrman and Dowdall v. Borgfeldt & Co. supra, are distinguished in Burstein v. Sullivan, supra, from the latter case, on the ground that in the former cases neither of the agents who made the indorsement on the check was a general manager, having the sole charge of the business.

In Morris v. Hofferberth, 81 App. Div. 512, 81 N. Y. Supp. 403, affirmed in 180 N. Y. 545, 73 N. E. 1127, where the action was brought to compel the defendant to pay again for lumber purchased from the plaintiff through the latter's agent, and paid for with check drawn to the order of the plaintiff, which the agent indorsed and converted to his own use, although the plaintiff's testimony to the effect that his agent had no express authority to indorse checks made payable to the order of the plaintiff was not contradicted specifically, the court held that, since the entire charge and management of the business was in the hands of the agent, it was proper to leave it to the jury to say whether the agent had authority to indorse the checks in question by writing plaintiff's name upon their back, and they so found.

balance for which the check was given by defendant to plaintiff's agent. The defendant pleads payment, and relies on the facts above stated to establish his defense. The trial court determined the issue in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff appeals from an order denying a new trial.

When a debtor has given his check for the amount of his indebtedness, in the absence of a contrary agreement, such check is given and received as a conditional, not an absolute, payment of the debt. In case the check is not honored upon presentation, the original indebtedness for which it was given is not discharged, and the creditor may recover on such indebtedness, and need not rely on the liability on the check. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 569; Good v. Singleton, 39 Minn. 340, 40 N. W. 359; First Nat. Bank v. McConnell, 103 Minn. 340, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 616, 123 Am. St. Rep. 336, 114 N. W. 1129, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396. Giving a receipt acknowledging payment of the debt at the time the check is delivered does not evidence an agreement to accept the check as absolute payment. Weddigen v. Boston Elastic Fabric Co. 100 Mass. 422; Bradford v. Fox, 38 N. Y. 289. Payment by check becomes absolute payment of the debt when the check is paid upon presentation. Upon such payment of the check, the debt is deemed to have been discharged from the time the check was given. Downey v. Hicks, 14 How. 240, 14 L. ed. 404; Strong v. Ten Cent Tutor Bldg. & L. Asso. 189 Pa. 406, 42 Atl. 46. While payment by check usually becomes absolute payment of the debt through payment of the check, it may become so by the certification of the check by the bank for the payee, or through the laches of the payee in not presenting the check to the bank. 30 Cyc. 1209; Brown v. Schintz, 202 Ill. 509, 67 N. E. 172; Taylor v. Wilson, 11 Met. 44, 45 Am. Dec. 180. In Taylor v. Wilson, supra, it is stated: "A check is merely evidence of a debt due from the drawer. Whether it shall operate as payment, or not, depends on two facts: First, that the drawer has funds to his credit in the bank upon which it is drawn; and, second, that the bank is solvent, or, in other words, pays its bills and the checks duly drawn upon it, on demand." In case a check given to pay a debt is lost, and has not been presented for payment to the bank on which it is drawn, an action may be maintained by the payee against the drawer on the check. Rev. Laws 1905, § 4717; First Nat. Bank v. McConnell, supra.

Authority given an agent to collect accounts does not, by implication, give such agent authority to indorse and present for payment checks received by him payable to his principal's order. In this case, Good had no authority, express or implied, to indorse plaintiff's name and cash the check he received from the defendant. The bank on which the check was drawn was bound to pay it to the payee therein named or his order. When the check was presented, therefore, indorsed "by Henry J. Good, Agent," the bank was bound to determine, at its peril, that he had authority, as agent, to make such indorsement and receive payment on the check. Ermentrout v. Girard F. & M. Ins. Co. 63 Minn. 305, 30 L.R.A. 346, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481, 65 N. W. 635. Under the facts appearing in this case, the bank, without authority, accepted and paid to Good the check given by defendant. When it so paid such check, and charged the sum so paid to the account of the defendant, such charge being acquiesced in by the defendant, a right of action against the bank accrued in favor of the plaintiff, in the absence of any act or omission on his part which would excuse such payment by the bank, or deprive him of such right of action. William Deering & Co. v. Kelso, 74 Minn. 41, 73 Am. St. Rep. 324, 76 N. W. 792; Dispatch Printing Co. v. National Bank, 109 Minn. 440, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 124 N. W. 236; Columbia Mill Co. v. National Bank, 52 Minn. 224, 53 N. W. 1061.

The reason for this rule is apparent in jurisdictions in which the payee may sue the bank upon its refusal, on presentment, to pay a check drawn on it by one having funds in the bank available for payment. The payee, once having the right to present the check and collect the amount from the bank, does not lose his right of action by the bank's unauthorized payment of the check. In some cases where it is held that, on the refusal of the bank to pay the check, there is no such privity between the payee and the bank as would give the payee a right to sue the bank upon the check, such privity is deemed established by payment on an unauthorized indorsement, and by charging the amount to the account of the drawer; the reason assigned being that the bank, by charging the check to the account of the drawer, thereby accepts the check, or undertakes to apply to the payment of the check the funds so withdrawn from the account of the drawer. Seventh Nat. Bank v. Cook, 73 Pa. 483, 13 Am. Rep. 751; Saylor v. Bushong, 100 Pa. 23, 45 Am. Rep. 353. In this state the right of a payee to maintain suit against the bank on its wrongful refusal to pay a check when presented does not seem to have been determined. Northern Trust Co. v. Rogers, 60 Minn. 208, 51 Am. St. Rep. 526, 62 N. W.

273; Varley v. Sims, 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 473; First Nat. Bank v. McConnell, 103 Minn. 340, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 616, 123 Am. St. Rep. 336, 114 N. W. 1129, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 396. But, whatever the exact reason to be assigned therefor, it is the settled rule in this state that, under the circumstances of this case, an unauthorized payment and subsequent charge to the account of the drawer is a sufficient basis for a liability of the bank to the payee.

Under these same circumstances, the liability of the drawer of the check upon the original account, to pay which the check, is drawn, should be held discharged, having regard to the general rules of law governing the correlated duties and rights of the parties, and to commercial usage and custom. The defendant gave his check to pay his account owing plaintiff. He delivered the check to the agent to whom the plaintiff had requested him to make delivery. When the check was given, and thereafter, the defendant had money to meet it on deposit in a solvent bank. In the usual course of business, he would not be called upon to do any other act for the benefit or protection of the payee, and the check would serve to pay the account. It does not seem that the defendant, in allowing his account to be charged with the amount of the check given the authorized agent of plaintiff, violated any commercial usage or legal duty. It would be a novel burden if the drawer of a check, given in the usual course of business, to the authorized agent of the payee, upon such check being indorsed by such agent, were charged with the duty of determining that the indorsement on the check was authorized. To establish such a rule would make payment by check a matter of uncertainty and some risk. Under the usual method of transacting business, the drawer of a check has no means of determining when the check is returned to him, stamped "Paid," whether the indorsement of the payee thereon was authorized or not. Whether a check is delivered to an agent or sent by mail, it usually comes into the hands of employees of the payee, who are not given the right, but are given the opportunity, by the payee, to indorse the check and receive the money, provided the bank neglects its duty to see that payment is made to the payee or his order. If the check is improperly paid, because of the dishonesty of the agent that the payee intrusts with the check, and the negligence of the bank, there would seem to be no sufficient reason for placing the responsibility therefor on the drawer of the check. The drawer of the check parted with control over it in the usual course of business, and in this case in the exact manner the payee requested. If either the drawer or payee must suffer because of the dishonesty of the agent, the one who designated him to receive the check, and intrusted him with it, should suffer, rather than the drawer, who had no voice in the selection of such agent, and who is in no way responsible for his acts.

It is urged that under the facts herein the defendant, if he is obliged to pay this account, can recover from the bank the amount of the check cashed without authority and charged by the bank to defendant's account. But the liability of the defendant on the account must be determined by a constant rule. In this case the only question involved may perhaps be whether the payee or the drawer shall proceed against the bank. If, however, the bank, paying a check under circumstances such as here exist, and charging it to the account of the drawer, should thereafter become insolvent, either the drawer or payee of the check would suffer loss. Such loss should fall on the party more directly responsible for, and having control of, the agent whose dishonest use of the check made the loss possible.

This exact question does not seem to have been often decided in reported cases. In Sage v. Burton, 84 Hun, 267, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1122, the question here involved was decided, and the rule stated: "While a check of the debtor does not, until paid, ordinarily amount to payment of the debt, it does, after payment of the check, extinguish the debtor's liability, if the same is paid to the creditor, or to the agent of the creditor authorized to receive the check of the debtor, for the reason that, after he has parted with the check to the creditor or his agent, he has no further duty in the matter, except to see that funds are in the bank on which it is drawn for its payment." Again, in Burstein v. Sullivan, 134 App. Div. 623, 119 N. Y. Supp. 317, in a similar case, it was said: "But where a debtor delivers his check to the creditor or his agent duly authorized to receive it, and has funds in the bank to meet the check, the transaction as between the debtor and the creditor should be treated as a payment precisely as though cash had been paid, even though the agent forges an indorsement and steals the money." Thomson v. Bank of British N. A. 82 N. Y. 1, and Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Ivy Leaf Coal Co. 97 Ala. 705, 12 So. 395, are cases where suit was brought by the creditor upon the original debt after a check had been given in payment thereof, and the same had been cashed upon an unauthorized indorsement of the payee; but, because of the grounds assigned in those cases for the decisions reached, neither is an authority under the conditions here existing.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SOUTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

SIOUX K. GRIGSBY, Respt.,
v.

CARL G. WOPSCHALL et al., Appts.,

(25 S. D. 564, 127 N. W. 605.)

Process — publication — affidavit — sufficiency.

1. An affidavit is insufficient to support

Note. — Character of inquiry as to whereabouts of party necessary to sustain constructive service of process.

General principles.

In GRIGSBY v. WOPSCHALL it is said that all reasonable means to ascertain the whereabouts of a party should be taken, and then the court endeavors to state just what sort of inquiry the law requires before an order of publication will be granted. No unvarying rule can be laid down as to just what extent, and of whom, the inquiry should be made, for that is a matter depending very largely upon the circumstances of each case, to be resolved by the different judges as the question arises from time to time. About all that can be said is that it is agreed that all reasonable inquiry should be made.

In Bixby v. Smith, 3 Hun, 60, 5 Thomp. & C. 279, it was said: "Due diligence means some effort or attempt to find the party, which the court or judge shall be satisfied is reasonable under the circumstances, and the phrase, 'after due diligence,' can have no other just significance than would be given if it read, 'after due diligence has been used.' What the diligence used has been, should be shown, and the court or judge is to determine whether, under the circumstances, it is or is not 'due,' within the intent of the statute. Of course, the judge or court will determine the question whether the diligence shown is due or not, in view of the other fact that the defendant resides out of the state; for less effort to ascertain that a nonresident cannot be found within the state would be satisfactory proof of due diligence, than would be required to show that a resident cannot be so found."

"It is generally held that a mere statement in affidavits to be used as a basis for orders of publication, that due diligence was used to find the defendant, is not alone a statement of fact authorizing a publication. Such statements are deemed conclusions. The facts must be stated, and the court draws the inference therefrom 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

a service of process by publication, which merely shows inquiry of a few persons as to the whereabouts of defendant, without getting information concerning him, and placing the summons for service in the hands of two sheriffs whose returns show inability to find him after inquiry of certain public officials, without showing any attempt to find relatives or neighbors of defendant from whom information might be obtained.

2. The court should on motion vacate a judgment founded on publication of summons, which is not supported by a sufficient affidavit showing diligence to ascertain the location of defendant and make personal service upon him.

whether due diligence has been exercised or not. What constitutes due diligence is therefore generally held to be a question of law. . . . The means by which due diligence is shown is not confined to any particular method of procedure. It is the fact that due diligence of some kind is shown that gives validity to the order of publication." Pillsbury v. J. B. Streeter, Jr. Co. 15 N. D. 174, 107 N. W. 40.

It is not sufficient in an affidavit for an order of publication, to state generally that after due diligence the defendant cannot be found within the state, but the acts constituting due diligence should be stated. Ricketson v. Richardson, 26 Cal. 149, wherein it was said: "To hold that a bald repetition of the statute is sufficient is to strip the court or judge to whom the application is made of all judicial functions, and allow the party himself to determine in his own way the existence of jurisdictional facts,—a practice too dangerous to the rights of defendants to admit of judicial toleration. The ultimate facts stated in the statute are to be found, so to speak, by the court or judge from the probatory facts stated in the affidavit, before the order for publication can be legally entered."

"What constitutes reasonable diligence in any case of this character must depend upon its particular facts and circumstances. Whether in any case every reasonable effort has been exhausted is a question upon which equally qualified persons may honestly differ. A showing satisfactory to one trial judge might be deemed inadequate by another, and wholly insufficient by an appellate tribunal. . . . The law required an honest and reasonable effort to ascertain defendant's whereabouts." Coughran v. Markley, 15 S. D. 37, 87 N. W. 2.

"What and how much evidence the court shall require to satisfy it of the existence of this ultimate fact rests largely with the court granting the order; but proof by affidavit of the probative facts must be produced before the court granting the order, substantiating the ultimate fact sought to be established, before the court can grant the order. . . . No unvarying rule can be laid down by this court as to what the proof shall be, as that will depend very largely upon the circumstances of each case. It will suffice to say that the proof must be such as to satisfy the court making the order, that due diligence has in good faith been used, and which this court, upon review, can say is sufficient to support the finding of the lower court." Woods v. Pollard, 14 S. D. 44, 84 N. W. 214.

An affidavit for publication of summons which states "that due and diligent search has been made for the defendants, and that said defendants cannot be found within the state of Idaho," without stating the facts which constitute such "due and diligent search," is insufficient to authorize the making of an order for publication, and an order and publication made thereon is without jurisdiction and void. Mills v. Smiley, 9 Idaho, 325, 76 Pac. 786, wherein it was said: "If, then, the affidavit submitted only states the ultimate, and not the probative, facts, the plaintiff, instead of the judge, would be determining what constitutes 'due diligence' and the other facts required, and there would be no reason or necessity for an order at all, but the affidavit alone might serve that purpose. This is neither the purpose nor intention of the statute. The law requires the plaintiff to make a showing by affidavit as to what he has done in order to obtain personal service, and what effort he has made to find the party to be served, and where such party resides, etc.; and upon such showing of facts, the judge to whom it is presented will determine judicially whether or not the probative facts thus shown are sufficient to bring the plaintiff within the provisions of § 4145, supra, and entitle him to the order. The conclusion as to 'due diligence,' etc., cannot be left to the affidavit-making judgment and discretion of the plaintiff, but must be reserved to the judge. It is a legal conclusion to be derived from the facts as presented by the evidence, viz., the affidavit."

An affidavit which merely repeats the language or substance of the statute is not sufficient. Unavoidably, the statute cannot go into details, but is compelled to content itself with a statement of the ultimate facts which must be made to appear, leaving the detail to be supplied by the affidavit, from the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Between the statute and the affidavit, there is a relation which is analogous to that existing between a pleading and the evidence which supports it. The ultimate facts of the statute must be proved, so to speak, by the affidavit, by showing the probative facts upon which each ultimate fact depends. These ultimate facts are conclusions drawn from the existence of other facts, to disclose which is the special office of the affidavit. Palmer v. McMaster, 13 Mont. 184, 40 Am. St. Rep. 434, 33 Pac. 132.

The affidavit for an order of publication must recite the particular facts tending to show what due and reasonable diligence has been used in order to find the defendant. Whaley v. Carter, 1 Dak. 504.

Extraordinary or unusual steps.

Extraordinary steps to ascertain the whereabouts of a party are not required. Thus, in Warner v. Miner, 41 Wash. 98, 82 Pac. 1033, it was contended that the plaintiff should have shown in his affidavit for an order of publication, that he had inquired of officers of the counties wherein certain notaries public had taken the acknowledgments to a deed, as to the whereabouts of the notaries, and then that he had written the notaries to learn just where the parties he wished to subpoena were. The court held that such a course was not required of the plaintiff. Mount, Ch. J., said "It is probable that the residences of the defendants might have been discovered in that way, but it does not follow that the county officers would have known the addresses of the notaries, or that the notaries would have known the addresses of the defendants at the time the suit was brought, because all may have changed their residences from the places where they resided when the deed was acknowledged. At any rate, it would have required more than ordinary diligence to were not pursued down to the time of application for the order of publication, which is fatal to the validity of the order.

have found the addresses of defendants in this roundabout way; and since no duty was imposed by statute upon the plaintiff to inquire, he was not bound to make such extraordinary inquiry."

The law does not demand the use of every possible means to find the defendants. It requires only that an honest and reasonable effort be made to ascertain their whereabouts. Coughran v. Markley, 15 S. D. 37, 87 N. W. 2, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff's attorney made an affidavit in which he stated that he had inquired of the plaintiff and of certain persons, including the sheriff of the county in which the action was pending, who were acquainted with the defendants when they resided in that county, concerning their whereabouts, and was informed that they had removed from the county more than five years preceding the time of the inquiries, and that they did not know where they were. The court held that the affidavit was sufficient. It was said: "The showing would have been more satisfactory had the affiant stated in detail what his inquiries were and what replies he received, or, what would have been better still, he might have secured the affidavits of the persons of whom he inquired; but, as heretofore suggested, the methods of making the inquiry and of proving diligence in these cases are without limit. The fact to be ascertained was the whereabouts of the defendants. The most natural and reasonable method of ascertaining that fact was inquiry of persons acquainted with them at their last known residence. Assuming the affidavit to be true, the conclusion cannot be escaped that the affiant was convinced that the defendants had removed from Lincoln county, and that they could not be found. Presuming that affiant acted in good faith, mindful of his duty as an officer of the court, the only fair inference is that he heard of nothing demanding further inquiry, and that further inquiry would not have resulted in finding defendants. It now appearing that defendants were living at the time, of course, as successful search was possible. But the law did not demand 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

McCoy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was commenced on the 8th day of December, 1908, in the circuit court of Minnehaha county by respondent, as plaintiff, against appellants, as defendants, to quiet title to certain real estate situated in Roberts county, this state. The summons was served by publication. No appearance or answer was made by defendants, and judgment was therefore entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendants, quieting the use of every possible means to find them. The trial judge was satisfied that a reasonable effort had resulted in failure. Doubtless, a more satisfactory showing might have been made, but certainly sufficient facts were stated to call into exercise the judicial mind of the judge, and his judicial determination cannot be questioned in this proceeding."

In Cohen v. Portland Lodge No. 142 B. P. O. E. 81 C. C. A. 483, 152 Fed. 357, affirming 144 Fed. 266, it appeared that inquiry was made of one of the executors of the will as to the whereabouts of the minor child of the testator, who was a party to the action, and, that affiant having been told by such person, who was in charge of the education of the child, that he was then residing at a particular orphan asylum in another state, made no further inquiry as to its whereabouts. It was held that sufficient inquiry had been made. The court said: "Suppose a person cannot be found within a state after the exercise of ordinary and honest diligence to learn of his whereabouts. Suppose he is not at his usual abiding place, nor is he seen upon the streets of the city where he lives, nor is he doing business where he is ordinarily accustomed to. What is so natural in looking for him as to inquire of his relatives concerning his whereabouts; or if he be a minor, to inquire of the one who has care of his person, his education, or his property, or both? And if one makes such diligent search to find, and swears positively to its having been made, is he not in a position to accept and rely upon the information he has obtained, by adopting a conclusion, necessarily a belief, that the person looked for is in fact absent from the state? We think he is, and that when he gives the source of his information, and then declares that, because of the information, a summons or paper cannot be handed to the person sought within the state, he adopts the information, and, by adopting it, makes an averment of his own that the person is absent from the state."

In Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732, it was held that although title in said real estate in plaintiff. Thereafter, immediately upon discovering the entry of said judgment, defendants, appearing specially, and not otherwise, moved the court to set aside and vacate said judgment, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction over the parties to the action or the subject-matter thereof, and that the court had no jurisdiction to render said judgment. Upon the hearing of said motion the court made the following order: "Ordered that said motion be, and the same hereby is, in all things overruled and denied, without prejudice, however, to the defendants moving to open the judgment and for leave to answer, should they be so advised." To the making and entry of said order, the defendants duly excepted. Defendants appeal, and assign as error the making and entry of said order overruling said motion to vacate said judgment. The order for publication of summons was based upon the affidavit of plaintiff, and the return certifies of the sheriffs of Roberts and Minnehaha counties, which are as follows:

I, J. L. Minder, sheriff in and for the county of Roberts and state of South Dakota, do hereby certify and return that the summons in the above-entitled action came into my hands for service on the 15th day of December, 1908, and that I immediately began diligent search and inquiry for the above-named defendants and each of them, within said county of Roberts, and that I inquired of L. M. Foss, clerk of courts, and the facts stated in the affidavit for the order of publication were only hearsay, and that the inquiries of the affiant as to the whereabouts of the party were limited to persons in the county wherein the action was pending, they were nevertheless proper to be considered by the judge when the application for the order was made, for the purpose of determining whether sufficient diligence had been employed to ascertain if the defendant could be found within the state. The court said: "From the nature of the question to be determined, the evidence thereon must to a very great extent be hearsay, and the number and character of the persons inquired of must in each case be determined by the judge. Diligence is in all cases a relative term, and what is due diligence must be determined by the circumstances of each case. If it should be held as an invariable rule that inquiries should be extended beyond the county in which the suit is pending, it might be difficult to say which counties of the state could be safely omitted, and unless the judge is at liberty to determine whether the person from whom inquiries have been made sufficiently shows the requisite diligence, it might be necessary for the plaintiff to question all the citizens of the county before obtaining the order."

Weis v. Cain, — Cal. —, 73 Pac. 980, was exactly like the case of Rue v. Quinn, supra, except that the latter case contained a statement to the effect that inquiry was made of all other persons from whom it could be expected that information might be given as to the residence or whereabouts of the defendants, and since the court in the former case did not think the added statement was one of importance, it decided the case upon the authority of the latter case.

So, in Jacob v. Roberts, 223 U. S. 261, 56 L. ed. —, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 303, affirming 154 Cal. 307, 97 Pac. 671, and order for the substituted service of a summons, made conformably to the California Code of Civil Procedure, § 412, was held to be supported by a sufficient showing of diligent inquiry to satisfy the due process of law clause of the Constitution of the United States (14th Amendment), where it was made upon an affidavit which, after reciting the proceedings, including the issue of the summons and the certificate of the sheriff that, "after diligent search and inquiry," he was unable to find the "defendants or either or any of them in this, San Diego, county," further stated that unsuccessful inquiries as to the whereabouts of defendants were made of their former neighbors and other residents of San Diego, and of certain county and state officers, and that the plaintiff himself made diligent inquiry, and had no knowledge of their residence or postoffice address, or where they could be found.

And in Jacob v. Roberts, supra, in answer to the contention that other parts of the state were not searched for the parties, and that this was necessary, since the process of the court could run to every county in the state, the court said: "The requirement is extreme, and we are cited to no cases in which it is decided to be necessary."

Where the affidavit showed that the plaintiff placed the summons in the hands of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, and received from him an official return that he had used due diligence to find the defendants in his county, but was unable to do so, and further showed that the plaintiff's attorney had himself made inquiries to find the defendants, which resulted in information from a reliable source that they resided in another state, it was held to be sufficient to enable the judge to be satisfied intelligently that after due diligence the defendants could not be found within the state, and to authorize him to grant the order of publication. Belmont v. Cornen, 82 N. Y. 256, wherein it was said: "The fanciful suggestion that the defendants might have been found transiently here is not sufficient to deprive the judge of jurisdiction to determine that the case was a proper one for service by publication. Neither can we sanction the criticism that the evidence of an effort to serve the defendants was insufficient because the of W. C. Oliver, county auditor, and also of Casper Kennedy, postmaster, all of Roberts county, South Dakota, all of whom are well acquainted throughout the county of Roberts, state of South Dakota, as to the whereabouts of the said defendants and each of them, and that all of said parties stated that to the best of their knowledge, information, and belief, none of the said defendants were residents of the state of South Dakota, or could be found therein. That I was informed by the said L. M. Foss, aforesaid, that to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, the said defendants, Carl G. Wopschall, Otto H. Wopschall, and Gustav Wopschall, were residents of the state of Wisconsin, but was unable to give their residence or postoffice address, and that I could find no trace of the defendant W. H. Hartzell whatever. That I am personally well acquainted throughout the county of Roberts and state of South Dakota, and that to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, none of the said defendants are residents of or can be served with the summons herein in the state of South Dakota. After diligent search and inquiry in the county of Roberts and state of South Dakota, and being unable to find the said defendants or either of them, I therefore return said summons not served.

Dated this 15th day of December, 1908.

J. L. Minder, Sheriff,

summons was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county of New York only, and that his certificate was merely that the defendants could not be found within that county. We think it would have been unreasonable to require that the plaintiff's attorney should have issued a summons to the sheriff of every other county in the state. Such an extreme degree of diligence was not necessary to satisfy the judge, in view of the fact, not denied, that they resided out of it."

Although in Belmont v. Cornen, supra, the idea of placing a summons in the hands of the sheriffs of the other counties in the state, in order to find the defendant, was characterized as "an extreme degree of diligence," and not necessary to satisfy the judge that he resided out of it, there are decisions which apparently do require that such a course should be taken.

Thus, in Wheeler v. Cobb, 75 N. C. 21, an affidavit for an order of publication, which did not state that "the person on whom the summons is to be served cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state," was held not to be sufficient to justify an order of publication, since everything necessary to dispense with personal service of the summons must appear by affidavit. It was said: "The mere issuing of a summons to the sheriff of the county of Pasquotank, and his indorsement upon it the same day after it came to hand, that 'the defendant is not found in my county,' is no compliance whatever with the law; for it might well be that the defendant was at that time in some other county in the state, and that the plaintiff knew it, or by due diligence could have known it, and made upon the defendant a personal service of the summons. Every principle of law requires that this personal service should be made, if compatible with reasonable diligence."

And an affidavit for an order of publication, which states that the defendants are nonresidents and reside out of the territory of Oklahoma, and that the plaintiff is unable, with due diligence, to make service of summons upon them, although it is 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

otherwise sufficient, is defective on direct attack in that it does not state that service cannot be had upon said defendants within the state. Spaulding v. Polley, 28 Okla. 769, 115 Pac. 804. The court said that the affidavit in question did not state that service could not be had upon the defendants within the state, and that it might very well be that service could not be made upon the defendants within the county, although due diligence to that extent had been exercised.

And it seems that unusual efforts to find a party have been held to be necessary in order to support an order of publication.

Where the affidavit for order of publication was not in the language of the statute, and no facts were given which showed that any inquiry whatever was made by the affiant to ascertain the residence of her husband (the single facts stated being that at one time one person had informed her that her husband had informed him that he had gone to Hot Springs, in Arkansas), it was held that the affidavit was not sufficient. Hartung v. Hartung, 8 Ill. App. 156, wherein it was said: "The facts stated to show diligent inquiry should clearly show on the face of the affidavit that the inquiry was diligently made, and that the residence of the defendant could not be ascertained. In this case, the 'diligent inquiry' contemplated by the statute would require the defendant in error to make inquiries of her neighbors and others who would probably be informed as to where her husband resided or could be found, and if, on such inquiries, she learned that on leaving Illinois he had gone to Hot Springs, she should have prosecuted her inquiries in that direction, and if she then learned that he had left that place for some other place unknown, or had never lived there, she could truly make the affidavit required, 'that upon diligent inquiry his place of residence could not be ascertained.'"

Statement of conclusion that party cannot be found.

Where the affidavit states that the de-

I, C. M. Nelson, sheriff in and for the county of Minnehaha and state of South Dakota, do hereby certify and return that the summons in the above-entitled action came into my hands for service on the 25th day of January, 1909; that I have inquired of W. C. McConnell, clerk of courts, James Monroe, register of deeds, Charles E. Hill, county auditor, and other parties regarding the whereabouts of the said defendants and each of them; that all of said parties inquired of informed me that to the best of their knowledge, information, and belief, the said defendants or either of them are not residents of the county of Minnehaha, state of South Dakota, and cannot be found therein; that I am well acquainted through out the county of Minnehaha and state of South Dakota, and do not know the said defendants, and have been unable to find them or either of them, after due and diligent search and inquiry, and that to the best of knowledge, information, and belief, they are not residents of or now within the state, and cannot be found therein. I therefore return said summons not served.

Dated this 26th day of January, 1909.

Affidavit for publication: "Sioux K. Grigsby, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a member of the firm of Grigsby & Grigsby, attorneys for the plaintiff in the above-entitled action, which has defendant cannot "with due diligence be found within the state," and that he resides in another state, and is not a resident of the state in which his presence is desired, it has been held that the affidavit need not show what diligence was used to find the defendant, but that the general statement that he cannot after due diligence be found is sufficient. Sueterlee v. Sir, 25 Wis. 357; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Eldred, 20 Wis. 197; Young v. Schneck, 22 Wis. 556; Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 1 Am. St. Rep. 34, 13 Pac. 73; Furnish v. Mullan, 76 Cal. 646, 18 Pac. 854; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 77 Pac. 1007; Washburn v. Buchanan, 52 Kan. 417, 34 Pac. 1049; Roberts v. Fagan, 76 Kan. 536, 92 Pac. 559; Torrans v. Hicks, 32 Mich. 307.

Thus, in Ballew v. Young, 24 Okla. 182, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1084, 103 Pac. 623, where the plaintiff stated positively that the defendant was not a resident of the territory, and that service could not be had upon him therein, it was said: "If such statement is true, no amount of diligence would have enabled plaintiff to obtain service upon him; and if service could have been had by due diligence, then affiant could not have stated in his affidavit that it could not be made within the territory." To the same effect, see Cochran v. Germain, 15 S. D. 77, 87 N. W. 527, affirmed on rehearing in 17 S. D. 529, 97 N. W. 743.

An order of publication is properly granted on an affidavit which states on information and belief that the defendants are residents of certain places in a distant state, and cannot be found after due and diligent search. Van Wyck v. Hardy, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 496, affirming 11 Abb. Pr. 473, wherein the court said of the affidavit: "It shows substantially that the information of the deponent as to those facts was obtained on inquiry, and that his belief was founded on such inquiry and a diligent search. It would unquestionably have afforded more satisfactory proof of those facts, if it had been shown what measures had been taken, and what acts of diligence had been used, and, particularly, what inquiries had been made, and of whom, and the means of knowledge possessed by such persons in relation to the residence of those defendants, and of the practicability of a personal service on them in this state; so that the court or judge might be better able to determine whether in fact due diligence had been used, and it may be conceded that no order ought to be made without proof of that character; but it cannot be said such specification is absolutely necessary, nor can we say that the affidavit in question is of no legal effect."

It has been held that where the "proof of nonresidence is clear and conclusive, and that the defendant is living out of the state and in a distant state, there may be strong reasons for holding that proof of due diligence is not required." Kennedy v. New York L. Ins. & T. Co. 101 N. Y. 487, 5 N. E. 774. In this case the affidavit stated that the defendants "cannot after due diligence be found within this state" (they being residents of other states as therein named), and "that the summons herein was duly issued for said defendants, but could not be served personally upon them by reason of such nonresidence." There was no allegation in the affidavit of any effort to ascertain the whereabouts of the defendants, and the court held that it conferred jurisdiction to grant the order.

On the other hand, in by far the greater number of cases, it is held that the mere statement in the affidavit for the order of publication, to the effect that the party is a nonresident of the state, is not in itself sufficient, but the affidavit must state that after due diligence the party cannot be found within the state, and the facts constituting the diligence must be set forth so that the court may judge. It was a compliance with the foregoing principle that sustained the order in the following cases:

Thus, an affidavit for publication which states that the defendant after due diligence cannot be found within the state, and that personal service of the summons cannot be made upon him; that the summons was placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, and the return made that, after making diligent search and inquiry of various been commenced by the filing of a complaint in this court, the recording of a notice of lis pendens, and the issuance of a summons herein, which summons and complaint are hereto attached and specifically made a part thereof; that this action is brought by the plaintiff against said defendants, to quiet the title of plaintiff in and to certain lands in the said complaint more particularly described, and that the said defendants and each of them are necessary parties hereto, and that a cause of action exists in favor of the plaintiff, and against the said defendants and each of them, and that this court has jurisdiction of the said action, as more fully appears by the said complaint. That the said defendants or either of them, after due diligence, cannot be found within the state of South Dakota, and that personal service of the summons in this action cannot be made upon the said defendants or either of them, within said state of South Dakota, and that to the best of this deponent's knowledge, information, and belief, the said defendants are not residents of, and do not reside in, and are not now within, the said state of South Dakota. That due and diligent effort has been made by affiant to find the above-named defendants and each of them, within the state of South Dakota, and to serve upon them the summons in this action, to wit: That for the purpose of ascertaining the defendant's whereabouts and of making personal service of the summons herein upon them and each of them, affiant, on the 5th day of December, persons who would be likely to know of the whereabouts of the defendant, he was not able to find him, and could not make personal service; that the affiant had personally known the defendant for a number of years, and that the defendant had sold his residence, severed his business connections, and removed with his family to a named place in another state, and affiant had seen a letter he had written from such place, exhibits sufficient diligence to authorize the order of publication. Woods v. Pollard, 14 S. D. 44, 84 N. W. 214.

In Howe Mach Co. v. Pettibone, 74 N. Y. 68, it was held that the sheriff's return to the summons to the effect that from his best information the defendant was a nonresident and had left the state and gone to California, taken in connection with other facts presented in the affidavit, to the effect that the person sought had become very much involved in his business, and had appropriated money of his employer to his own use, and left his employer without any explanation or excuse, with other suspicious circumstances, was enough to establish the fact of his nonresidence, and to authorize the publication of summons.

Where the affidavit contained the positive statement that the defendant could not after due diligence be found in the state, that the summons was duly issued in the action and placed in the hands of the sheriff, and was returned by him with the indorsement that the defendant could not be found within the county, and the affiant further stated that he had been in correspondence with the defendant, and had received letters from him from a distant state, it was held that sufficient probative facts appeared to authorize the order. Allen v. Richardson, 16 S. D. 390, 92 N. W. 1075.

An affidavit for an order of publication was held to be sufficient in Andrews v. Borland, 10 N. Y. S. R. 396, where it was stated "that the defendant is not a resident of the state, but resides in the city of Portland, in the state of Oregon, as deponent is informed upon making inquiries of one . . . a friend or relative of" the 27 L.R.A. (N.S.)

defendant, and that the defendant cannot after due diligence and inquiry be found within the state.

Sufficient proof to justify an order for service of summons by a publication is made by evidence that the defendants did not reside in the jurisdiction, and that one of them, which was a corporation, had no managing agent therein, but that its president resided in another jurisdiction, while the proper officer has returned the summons with the statement that after due and diligent search he has been unable to find the defendants or either of them, or their authorized agents, within this district. Marx v. Ebner, 180 U. S. 314, 45 L. ed. 547, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376, wherein it was held that the presumption that a public officer who has received process for service has done his duty, and has made the reasonable and diligent search that is required, though not alone sufficient to justify an order for service by publication, may add some weight, when there is other proof of the necessary facts.

An affidavit stating that the deponent knows the defendants personally, and knows that they are not residents of New York state, but reside at Lynn, in Massachusetts, and have engaged in business there under a certain firm name, and that the plaintiff will be unable with due diligence to make personal service of the summons within the state, has been held sufficient to warrant an order of publication. Smith v. Mahon, 27 Hun, 40, 63 How. Pr. 382. In this case it was said that it could be stated with very great propriety that when it appears that the defendants are nonresidents of the state and engaged in business at their residences, a statement of such facts would warrant an inference that no personal service of papers could be made upon them in this state by due diligence.

Where the affidavit for an order of publication stated that one of the defendants had been away from the United States for more than two years without having communicated with his brother, who was a defendant in the action, and that his 1908, placed the said summons in the hands of J. L. Minder, sheriff in and for the county of Roberts and state of South Dakota, and instructed the said sheriff to forthwith serve the said summons upon the said defendants and each of them; and that on the 15th day of December, 1908, the said sheriff of Roberts county made his return to this court hereto attached and made a part hereof, that after diligent search and inquiry, and being unable to find the said defendants or either of them, or to serve said summons upon the said defendants or either of them, that said summons was returned not served, and this affiant makes a part of this affidavit the sworn return of the said sheriff as hereto attached. That for the purpose of ascertaining the defendants whereabouts and of making personal service of the summons herein upon them and each of them, affiant, on the 25th day of January, 1909, placed said summons in the hands of C. N. Nelson, sheriff of Minnehaha county, state of South Dakota, with instructions to forthwith serve the same upon the said defendants and each of them; and that on the 26th day of January, 1909, the said sheriff made his return to this court, which return is specifically referred to and made a part hereof, that after due and diligent search and inquiry, the said defendants or either of them could not be found by him, the said sheriff, and that said summons was returned not served, and this affiant makes a part of this affidavit the sworn return of the said sheriff hereto attached. That for the pur-brother believed him to be in the Klondyke region; that his sisters were in communication with him, and that a letter addressed to his sisters at a certain address would be forwarded to him; and that the affiant did not believe that the person sought was a resident of the state, and that he had been unable with due diligence to make any service of summons upon him, it was held that the affidavit, while not as satisfactory as it might be wished, particularly as to the efforts to ascertain the whereabouts of the person to be served, from which diligence might appear, yet it was more satisfactory than a great many other affidavits which had been upheld by the courts, and was therefore sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the court to make the order. Union Trust Co. v. Driggs, 62 App. Div. 213, 70 N. Y. Supp. 947.

In Handley v. Quick, 47 How. Pr. 233, where the affidavit stated on the plaintiff's personal knowledge, that the defendant was a nonresident, giving his actual place of residence abroad, and that he could not be found after due diligence within the state; and another affidavit filed by the attorney for the plaintiff stated that a copy of the summons and complaint in the action had been sent to the sheriff of the county adjoining the county of the defendant's residence, to be served upon the defendant if he could be found, and that the attorney had received a telegram from the sheriff stating that he had been unable to serve said summons, the affidavits were sufficient to authorize an order of publication.

Where the affidavit for the order of publication shows that no diligence will be able to secure a personal service by reason of the absence of the party, the affidavit is sufficient. Hudson v. Kowing, 4 N. Y. S. R. 866, wherein it appeared that the affidavit stated, upon information derived from a receiver of the defendant in New York, who was in frequent correspondence with the defendant, that the defendant was a resident of the state, and the affidavit further stated that the defendant had been a resident of the state, but was then at a certain named place in New Jersey.

In Murphy v. Franklin Sav. Bank, 131 App. Div. 759, 116 N. Y. Supp. 228, affidavits from which it appeared that the person sought had gone to a distant country, and that several letters had been received from him some three or four years before the trial, and at that time he was in one of two named places, and that another letter had been received from a third party stating that he was at one of the places in the same country, were held to show sufficient inquiry as to the whereabouts of the person, but the affidavit for the order was held insufficient on another ground.

An affidavit for an order, stating "that said defendants reside at Walla Walla, in the territory of Washington, which is their postoffice address. . . . That personal service cannot be made upon said defendants or either of them for the reason that said defendants have departed from this state, and remained absent therefrom for more than six consecutive weeks, and now reside at Walla Walla," is sufficient, because, although nonresidence is not of itself sufficient to authorize the order for publication, because that alone is not inconsistent with the idea that the defendant may be in the state doing business although his residence is in another state, and hence does not relieve the necessity or requirement for due diligence, still, when the allegation of nonresidence is taken in connection with the fact additionally alleged, that he was actually living in the resident state, it is a ground for claiming that due diligence would be unavailing. Pike v. Kennedy, 15 Or. 420, 15 Pac. 637. To the same effect, see Bank of Colfax v. Richardson, 34 Or. 518, 75 Am. St. Rep. 664, 54 Pac. 359, where the allegations in the affidavit were quite similar.

Where the affidavit was made by the plaintiff, who stated that the defendant was his son-in-law; that he had left the state several years before and removed to a distant state, where he was residing with pose of ascertaining the defendants' whereabouts and of making personal services of this summons herein upon them and each of them, this affiant of William H. Lyon, of George T. Blackman, and H. E. Judge, all of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, for more than ten years last past, and are well acquainted throughout this state, and each of whom informed this affiant that they did not know the said defendants or either of them, and that to the best of their knowledge, information, and belief, the said defendants are not residents of, and cannot be served with the summons in this action within, the state of South Dakota. This affiant further says that he is a resident of the state of South Dakota, and has been engaged in the practice of law at Sioux Falls, South Dakota, for more than ten years last past, and is well acquainted throughout the said state, and that affiant does not know the said defendants or either of them, and that to the best of affiant's knowledge, information, and belief, the said defendants or either of them are not residents of or now within the state of South Dakota, and cannot be served with the summons in this action therein. This affiant further says that he has made inquiry of the said J. L. Minder, sheriff of Roberts county, and of C. N. Nelson, sheriff of Minnehaha county, and of said William H. Lyon, George T. Blackman, and of H. E. Judge, of Sioux Falls, South Dakota, as to the residence and postoffice of the said defendants and each of them, and that affiant is informed by each of his family; that the summons issued could not be served by reason of the defendant's absence, and that the plaintiff himself had searched for the defendant and endeavored to find him without results, and had seen letters from his son-in-law in the distant state, it was held that the affidavit was sufficient. Waffle v. Goble, 53 Barb. 517.

And where the affidavit stated that the defendant could not be found within the state after due diligence to find him had been used, and then recited that inquiry was made of three persons as to the defendant's whereabouts, who stated that his last known residence was in the city of New York, and that his postoffice address was the general delivery in that city, from which address each had received letters from him within a year, it was held that the affidavit showed the exercise of reasonable or due diligence to find the defendant within the state, and that it fully authorized an order of publication. Pillsbury v. J. B. Streeter, Jr. Co. 15 N. D. 174, 107 N. W. 40.

So, where the affidavit stated that the defendant, to the knowledge of the affiant, had moved from the state two or three years prior to the date of the affidavit, and, upon information and belief, that he was not a resident of the state, but was a resident of a city in another state, where he was engaged in business, and the affiant was informed by others that the defendant was in the other state, it was held that the affidavit was sufficient to authorize an order of publication. Iowa State Sav. Bank v. Jacobson, 8 S. D. 292, 66 N. W. 453.

And an affidavit for an order of publication, which states that the defendant is not a resident of the state, but resides at a place in another state, as the affiant is informed by people living there, and whom he names, is sufficient to show that the defendant cannot be served within the state by the exercise of due diligence, and justifies the order of publication. Davis v. Cook, 9 S. D. 319, 69 N. W. 18.

In Peterson v. Peterson, 15 S. D. 462, 90 N. W. 136, where the affidavit stated that the defendant was not a resident of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the state, but was a resident of another state, naming her postoffice address therein, and that the affiant's means of knowledge as to the residence and postoffice address was derived from letters received within the last three days from said place, stating that such was her residence and postoffice address, it was held sufficient to authorize an order of publication. The court thought that the affidavit would have been much more satisfactory had the letters referred to been attached to and made a part of the affidavit, but that it could not be said that there was a total absence of evidence tending to prove that the defendant was in the distant state, since the court was justified in assuming that the affiant was truthful, and that he had truthfully stated the only information conveyed by the letters.

In Barnard v. Heydrick, 49 Barb. 62, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 47, an affidavit properly made and forming a part of the records of the state, although not in the action at bar, in which the order is asked, and which stated that the persons sought, as the affiant was informed and believed, were nonresidents of the state, and could not with due diligence be served with a summons in the state, and that they are residents of certain named points in other states, is sufficient to warrant an order of publication in the case at bar.

In Jerome v. Flagg, 48 Hun, 351, 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 79, 1 N. Y. Supp. 101, where the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney stated that the defendant could not with due diligence be served within New York state, and the proof was clear and conclusive that the defendant was a resident of a distant state, and absolutely located there, and that no amount of diligence would avail to effect a personal service in this state, it was held that the affidavit justified the order for service of summons by publication.

An affidavit which states that the defendants are nonresidents of the state, and not to be found therein, and that upon due inquiry and diligent search their address is at a designated number in a street said parties named that they do not know the residence or postoffice address of either of the said defendants, and affiant further states that he does not know the residence or postoffice address of either of said defendants and that said residence and postoffice address cannot, after due diligence, be ascertained by him. Wherefore deponent prays an order of this court in accordance with the statutes in such cases made and provided, that the summons in this action may be served upon the said defendants by due and legal publication thereof. Dated January 30, 1909."

We are of the opinion that there was not a sufficient showing of diligence to give the court jurisdiction to order publication, and render judgment against defendants. While, in a city of another state, fully complies with all the requirements of the statute, and is sufficient to justify the court in making the order of publication. Bower v. Stein, 101 C. C. A. 299, 177 Fed. 673, affirming 165 Fed. 232.

In Yates v. Gridley, 16 S. C. 496, an affidavit which stated that the defendants were not residents of South Carolina, but were residents of the city of New York, and that their postoffice was unknown to deponent, and could not be ascertained although due diligence had been employed, and that they could not be found in South Carolina after due search for them, was sufficient in order to authorize the order of publication, since the only requirement was that the officer granting the order should be satisfied that it was a proper case therefor.

And so, where the party was a nonresident, and that fact was merely stated, with no evidence of that ultimate fact appearing, so that the judicial mind could act intelligently, it was held in the following cases that the affidavit for an order of publication was not sufficient:

Thus, a statute providing for the publication of summons after it has appeared to the satisfaction of the court or judge that the person desired cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state, is not satisfied by an affidavit which states that the defendant is a nonresident of the state, and cannot be found therein, but has a place of residence at a point in a neighboring state, and entirely omits the words "after due diligence," or to state that any degree of diligence whatever has been used to find the defendant. McCracken v. Flanagan, 127 N. Y. 493, 24 Am. St. Rep. 481, 28 N. E. 385, reversing 52 Hun, 614, 24 N. Y. S. R. 439, 5 N. Y. Supp. 338, where in it was said: "It is, from an examination of this statute and the decisions in relation to it, pretty evident that some degree of diligence must be exercised to find the party, and what is a due degree depends upon circumstances surrounding each case, and that the simple averments in the affidavit that the defendant is a non-resident, and cannot be found within the state, are not alone sufficient to support an order for the service of a summons by publication. Those facts do not imply that any diligence has been exercised to find and serve the defendant personally with process. It needs no argument to show that the averment in the affidavit that the defendant cannot be found in the state does not tend to prove the exercise of due diligence to find the defendant, for the statute in question not only requires that it be stated in the affidavit that the defendant cannot be found, but expressly requires the averment that he cannot be found after due diligence. Hence, the statute forbids that due diligence may be implied from the statement that the defendant cannot be found within the state."

In Carleton v. Carleton, 85 N. Y. 313, where the affidavit upon which the order was granted stated that the defendant had not resided within the state of New York since a certain named date, and deponent was informed and believed that defendant was a resident of a city in a distant state, without reciting that due diligence had been used to find the defendant in New York state, and that after such diligence he could not be found therein, it was held insufficient to authorize the order. In this case the court said that it was such a well-known fact that many persons who are residents of one state have places of business, and transact such business, in a state different than that in which their residence is located, and are so frequently in the latter state and pass most of their time there, that the affidavit should set forth what effort had been made personally to serve the summons.

Where the affidavit for the order of publication stated that certain of the defendants were nonresidents of the state of New York, but there was no suggestion that any effort had been made to serve them in that state, and therefore that there was nothing to indicate that they could not have been found with due diligence in New York state, it was held that the affidavit was clearly insufficient to authorize the order effort to give it. The statute contemplates, and trial judges should invariably require, that the party who institutes the suit shall in good faith make every reasonable effort to not only ascertain that the defendant cannot be served in the state, but to ascertain his whereabouts, in order that copies of the summons and complaint may reach him through the mails or otherwise." Where a defendant on whom service by publication is sought has recently left the state, plaintiff should ascertain the place where he last resided, and it is also incumbent upon plaintiff to ascertain whether such defendant left any relatives or agents or other business associates in such vicinity, and, if so, inquiry should be made of them, as persons presumed to be most likely to know the present whereabouts of such defendant. Failing to find such relatives, agents, or business associates, inquiry should be made of the nearest and most immediate neighbors of such defendant, as persons also presumed to be likely to know the whereabouts of such defendant. Inquiry of the postmaster at the last-known postoffice address of such defendant might readily lead to the discovery of his whereabouts. The affidavit for publication should show that all reasonable inquiry has been made of persons likely or presumed to know the whereabouts of the person sought to be notified by publication. Near neighbors might know of near relatives of defendant, who resided in some other locality, who could furnish the desired inof publication. Seidenburg v. Pesce, 140 App. Div. 232, 125 N. Y. Supp. 107. In this case the court said that the bare fact that a person was known to be a resident of another state did not exclude the idea that, by the display of ordinary diligence, he could not be found within that state where his presence was desired, and particularly was this true where the state of his residence was a neighboring state.

In Peck v. Cook, 41 Barb. 549, the decision would no doubt have been to the effect that the affidavit for the order of publication justified the order if the affidavit, after showing the defendant's nonresidence, had not stated that "he frequently visited the county of Livingston" in the state. This fact was held to impose on the plaintiff greater effort to find him, and to require more evidence that he could not be found than would otherwise have been necessary.

Where the affidavit presented for the order of publication recited that the defendants resided in a neighboring state, and that "the plaintiff will be unable with due diligence to make personal service of the summons within the state," but contained nothing whatever upon the subject of diligence, disclosed no effort to serve the summons in this state, and gave no reasons for not making an effort, aside from the bare fact of nonresidence, it was held that the affidavit was insufficient to support the order asked for. Kennedy v. Lamb, 182 N. Y. 228, 108 Am. St. Rep. 800, 74 N. E. 834, reversing 102 App. Div. 429, 92 N. Y. Supp. 385, wherein it was said: "Even if residence in a distant state or in a foreign country permits the inference that the person to be served cannot be found in this state, residence in an adjoining state, just across the line, with no evidence that the nonresident is not in business in this state, or that he does not sojourn here, and no explanation whatever for not trying to serve him here, is not sufficient."

An affidavit which shows that the defendants "cannot be found in the state of Oregon, but both reside in San José, California, and that is their postoffice address," is not sufficient, for the facts stated must show beyond a peradventure that the diligence required by the statute would have been unavailing. McDonald v. Cooper, 32 Fed. 745, wherein it was said: "San José is in the immediate vicinity of San Francisco, the commercial metropolis of an adjoining, not a 'distant,' state, between which and this city there was then constant and frequent communication and intimate business and social relations. No summons was attempted to be served; nor is it stated that the defendants or either of them had departed from this state, or were then 'actually living' at San José."

Section 439 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that where an order of publication is applied for on the ground of nonresidence, proof by affidavit must be exhibited to the court, "that plaintiff has been or will be unable, with due diligence, to make personal service of the summons," is not complied with where the affidavits upon which the order was granted did not recite the return of the sheriff on the summons, to the effect that he had used due diligence to find the defendant so as to serve him with the summons and complaint, and, from the best information that he could obtain, had learned that he was a resident of a certain named place in Ontario; and did not state that the plaintiff had been or would be unable, in the exercise of due diligence, to serve the summons personally. Empire City Sav. Bank v. Silleck, 180 N. Y. 541, 73 N. E. 1123, affirming 98 App. Div. 139, 90 N. Y. Supp. 561, wherein it was said: "It would probably be sufficient to show that Watson was a nonresident and resided in Hamilton, Ontario, if that fact were averred by the affiant, upon information and belief based upon the information set forth; but in the absence of such an averment, the mere declarations of third parties have no probative force. For aught that appears, the affiant may have known or had reason to believe from other information obtained, that Watson did not reside in Hamilton, Ontario, and may have known or had reason to believe that Watson was within the formation. It is the use of all such reasonable means of this character that constitutes "due diligence." The affidavit should show that such sources of inquiry have been reasonably pursued and exhausted. Inquiries made of persons in a distant part of the county or state, 20, 50, 100, or more miles from the locality where defendant last resided, who are not personally acquainted with and did not know defendant, are wholly worthless and wholly immaterial to establish "due diligence." Such persons are not likely or presumed to know the whereabouts of defendant. It has been heretofore held that the showing of "due diligence" can only be made by affidavit. The return of the sheriff will not answer, that not being the kind of evidence required by the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 112. Soderberg v. Soderberg, 1 Dak. 503; Coughran v. Markley, supra. The sheriff's return is not sworn to, and a prosecution for perjury could not be based thereon, in case the same was made knowingly and intentionally false. When we eliminate the sheriff's returns from the showing in this case, nothing remains, other than conclusions and immaterial statements, bearing upon the question of "due diligence," and appellant's motion to vacate the judgment should have been granted.

Since the argument and submission of this cause in this court, respondent has made application for an order to show cause why he should not be permitted to file a further and amended additional abstract, state or was coming to the state or entered the state before the order was obtained many weeks later, so that personal service could have been made upon him. If the affidavit alleged the principal facts upon information and belief derived from the sources and based upon the grounds stated, and had shown that the summons had been issued to the sheriff and returned unserved by him, the proof of the nonresidence, and the inability to make personal service in the exercise of due diligence, would sufficiently appear."

Where the affidavit for the order recited that the defendants were not residents of New York state, but resided in the state of Texas in a named city, as the deponent was informed by the defendants themselves in letters received from them at that place, and that the deponent had caused a summons and complaint to be issued in the action against the defendants, to the sheriff of the city and county of New York, but that the defendants could not be found after due diligence within the state, and that the deponent "is informed and believes that said defendants are now in the city of Laredo, state of Texas," but the letters relied on to establish the nonresidence of the defendants were not attached to the affidavits, nor even their dates given, it was held that the reference to them furnished no proof that the defendants could not with due diligence be personally served with the summons, and that the affidavit was not sufficient to support the order. Greenbaum v. Dwyer, 66 How. S. 286.

In Bothell v. Hoellwarth, 10 S. D. 491, 74 N. W. 231, where no probative facts whatever as to the diligence used to find the defendant were stated, but the affidavit contained simply the bald and naked statement that the defendant could not, after due diligence, be found within the state, it was held that the affidavit was insufficient to justify an order of publication.

An affidavit reciting that the summons was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county for service upon the defendants, and was returned with the indorsement that, after due and diligent search and inquiry, he was unable to find the defendants, and containing a statement of the affiant that he had made inquiry of the different county officers and of other named persons as well as of the sheriff of the county, to whom the summons was directed; and further reciting a conversation had with one of the defendants only a few days prior to the issuance of the summons, in which the defendant stated that his residence and postoffice address was in another state, is not sufficient to authorize an order of publication. Plummer v. Bair, 12 S. D. 23, 80 N. W. 139, wherein it was said: "Not being apprised of what the sheriff actually did in the way of an effort to find the defendants and obtain personal service of the summons, affiant's opinion that the return shows 'due and diligent search and inquiry' amounts to a gratuitous assumption, without probative substance. In the absence of any facts tending to show that personal service could not be had notwithstanding defendants are nonresidents, the reasonable inference deducible from affiant's conversation had with one of them about the time he placed the summons in the hands of the sheriff of Beadle county is that the meeting was had in this state, and the postoffice address of defendant ascertained to be Memphis, Tennessee. The affidavit fails to contain any of the essential details from which the trial court could judicially determine the ultimate statutory fact that the persons on whom the service of the summons is to be made cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state."

An affidavit made by the plaintiff's attorney upon information and belief, merely stating that the defendants are nonresidents of the territory, and that service of summons cannot be had upon them within said territory, is wholly insufficient to authorize an order for publication of summons; the court being of the opinion that the affidavit should set forth facts showing that the defendants are nonresidents of the territory so that the court might see that due service of the process cannot which would tend to show that appellants in the circuit court made a general, instead of a special, appearance, as shown by the abstracts now on file. It is contended by respondent that because in some of the affidavits presented on the hearing to vacate the judgment in the circuit court on the part of appellants, there was a prayer that appellants be permitted to make answer to the complaint, that appellants were seeking other and further relief in the court below than the vacation of the judgment for want of jurisdiction, and that there was, in effect, a general appearance in the action. We are of the opinion that this application to amend the additional abstract comes too late. Respondent served an additional abstract in which all this matter now sought to be included was carefully omitted. After discovering on the argument of the cause in this court that his former position was doubtful, he should not now be permitted to raise entirely new questions by an amended additional abstract. Again, it appears from the record now before this court that the circuit court found and held that the appearance of the appellants in the court below was a special one, and the order appealed from indicates the same effect. The order appealed from and the recitals and findings therein were no doubt prepared by respondent or his counsel. Under any circumstances, it would be hardly proper for this court to permit respondent to now change front and be permitted to oppose that which he procured in the lower court.

be made. Romig v. Gillett, 10 Okla. 186, 62 Pac. 805, reversed on another point in 187 U. S. 111, 47 L. ed. 97, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40.

In Flint v. Coffin, 100 C. C. A. 342, 176 Fed. 872, where the affidavit simply stated that the defendants were all nonresidents, residing in the state of New York, and could not be found in the state of North Carolina, and that the summons could not be served on them or either of them, but no fact relating to the "due diligence" on the part of the party whose duty it was to make diligent search in the state was set forth in the affidavit, it was held that it was not sufficient.

Where it appeared by the affidavits upon which the order was obtained, that the defendant had left the state, and that the plaintiff had been unable with due diligence to make personal service of the summons upon him, but they did not make it appear whether the defendant was or was not a resident of the state, and there was no statement of fact which tended to prove that the defendant had left the state with the intent to defraud his creditors or to avoid the service of a summons, the mere statement of those things in the language of the statute was held to be no proof of them, and insufficient to support an order of publication. Blute v. Fellows, 143 App. Div. 825, 128 N. Y. Supp. 18, rehearing denied in 129 N. Y. Supp. 1113.

Where the affidavit merely stated that the defendant was a resident of another state, and that the plaintiff would be unable with due diligence to make personal service of the summons, it was held that it was insufficient because, while it might be true that the defendant resided elsewhere, yet he might at that time have been in the state where he was wanted, and the plaintiff have had knowledge of the fact. McLeod v. Moore, 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 77, 3 N. Y. Supp. 792.

An affidavit which merely states that the defendant is a nonresident of the state, without proof where he actually is at the time, is not sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to make the order; some evidence must be shown from which the court can find that the defendant is not at the time within the state, and personal service of the summons therein cannot with due diligence be made. Hyatt v. Swivel, 20 Jones & S. 1.

Where the affidavit recited that the defendant was a nonresident of the state of New York, but resided at a named address at Elizabeth, New Jersey, and that the plaintiff was unable to make personal service of the summons upon the defendant, and that the source of his information and the grounds of his belief were correspondence had with the defendant from her residence in New Jersey, and from conversations with the son and representative of the defendant, but what was written and what was said did not appear, and the court was without the slightest information of the facts themselves, upon which to determine whether service could or could not be had with the exercise of due diligence, it was held that the affidavit was insufficient. Orr v. Currie, 14 Misc. 74, 35 N. Y. Supp. 198, 25 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 16, 2 N. Y. Anno. Cas. 24.

An affidavit which states the names of the persons sought, and that they cannot be found in the state after due diligence, since they are residents of a named city in another state, is held to be insufficient in Kennedy v. New York L. Ins. & T. Co. 32 Hun, 35, to support an order of publication, since it contains no fact from which the judge to whom it was presented might infer that an attempt had been made to serve the summons within the state, and it did not even state that any attempt was made.

In Simensen v. Simensen, 13 N. D. 305, 100 N. W. 708, where the affidavit showed that summons was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county in which the action was pending, and returned by him with the statement that the defendant did not reside within the county nor within the state, as he was informed by certain former neighbor and acquaintances of the defendant, and that he was informed by

The appellants' motion to vacate the judgment on the ground of want of jurisdiction, and the motion paper itself, recited that the appearance was special for that purpose and none other. The hearing in the circuit court was on that theory. The circuit court found that the appearance of defendant was special, and respondent should not now complain that the findings and order in the circuit court procured by himself are not correct. In the lower court appellants were not permitted to make answer, evidently on the ground that their motion only included an objection to the jurisdiction of the court. There was no proposed answer made or submitted by defendants.

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to vacate and set aside the judgment heretofore entered in this action.

the same persons that the defendant had removed from the state and resided at a certain named place in Wisconsin, as he verily believes, but did not show that the sheriff returned that he was unable to make personal service within the state, or that he had used any diligence to find the defendant, it was held that the affidavit was not sufficient to support an order, since the record in the case shows that the return of the sheriff was made nearly five months before the order of publication was granted, and the court was of the opinion that it was no proof that personal service might not have been made upon the defendant during that intervening time.

An affidavit for an order of publication, which stated that one of the defendants could not after due diligence be found within the state, and that the deponent was informed and believes that he is or was last residing in a town in another state, and disclosed no effort to find the defendant to serve him within the state, nor stated any reason why such effort, if made, would be useless, is insufficient to support an order of publication. Reid v. Johnson, 121 N. Y. Supp. 750.

Inquiry of people presumed to know of whereabouts. .

In Bradford v. McAvoy, 99 Cal. 324, 33 Pac. 1091, where the affidavit for publication was made by one of the plaintiffs, and stated that about the time of the commencement of the action, the defendant resided in a certain named city, and had an office at a certain named place, but about the same time disappeared from his office and could not be found; that affiant thereafter made inquiries for the defendant at various places, including his old office, and of various persons who knew him and would be likely to know of his whereabouts, but was unable to find him; that eight new summonses had been issued in the action, and that since the issuance of the first summons, four different competent persons had been employed to obtain service upon defendant, but without success; and that ever since the first issuance, a continued and constant effort had been made to procure personal service of the summons upon defendant; that "since the commencement of this suit, defendant . . . has not been in his accustomed places and resorts, but has left an agent in this city who is using persistent efforts to continue to collect the rents of the premises sought to be recovered herein;" and that affiant does not know the whereabouts of the defendant,—it was held that it was sufficient to support the order for publication, although it did not state that the affiant had made inquiries of the defendant's agent.

In Seaver v. Fitzgerald, 23 Cal. 85, where the affidavit for the order recited that the defendant was a resident of a certain township in the county; that he had occupied a house on a tract of land claimed by him to be his own, and which he had cultivated up to the commencement of the suit, and for a long time previous, but that on the day before the commencement of the suit he left his residence, informing his servants that he would be back that evening or the next day, and that the summons in the suit was put in the hands of the proper constable, who made diligent search and was unable to serve it, and that the defendant had not returned to his residence and was concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding service of the summons, it was held that the affidavit was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the order of publication.

Where the affidavit upon which the order for publication of summons was based showed that search had been made for the defendant at and about his last place of residence; that members of his family had informed persons who were attempting to secure service of a summons that the defendant was not at home, and that he was not in the state; and that the informants refused to tell where the defendant was; and the affidavit was further accompanied by the affidavits of four deputy constables who had attempted to make personal service of the summons upon the defendant, it was held that the facts shown in the affidavits for publication of summons were sufficient to justify the court in finding that the defendant could not after due diligence be found within the state, and to support the order that the service of summons be made upon him by publication. Merchants' Nat. Union v. Buisseret, 15 Cal. App. 444, 115 Pac. 58.

Where the affidavit for an order directing the publication of the summons was made by the attorney for the plaintiff, and stated that the summons was placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county for service, and was returned with the indorsement that the defendant could not be found in the county; that the affiant did not know the residence of the defendant, and that since the summons was issued he had made due and diligent search and inquiry for the defendant of several prominent county officers, whom he named, and of all other persons from whom he could expect to obtain information as to the residence or whereabouts of the defendant, it was held that the affidavit was sufficient to warrant the order of publication. Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732. To the same effect, is Weis v. Cain, — Cal. —, 73 Pac. 980.

Where the affidavit for publication recited that the summons had been placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, and that inquiry had been made of the treasurer of the county, who, under the law, was to receive the money which had been, or was yet to be, paid on the land in controversy, and therefore the most likely officer in the county to have the postoffice address and know of the residence of the defendant, and that inquiry had been made of other persons, it shows the taking of such diligence as is necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the court to make the order. People v. Wrin, 143 Cal. 11, 76 Pac. 646.

People v. McAllister, — Cal. —, 76 Pac. 1127, is exactly similar to the case of People v. Wrin, supra, and upon the authority of that case was decided.

A statute providing for service of process by publication, where the person on whom it is to be made cannot after due diligence be found within the state, is satisfactorily complied with where the affidavit states that the defendant cannot be found within the state after diligent search made therein for him by the affiant; that such diligent search consisted of making inquiries of each and every person from whom he had reason to believe he would receive knowledge of the whereabouts of the person, and contains a statement of the persons of whom he made inquiries, and the reason why he expected them to know of his whereabouts, although it fails to state expressly the result of the inquiries. Chapman v. Moore, 151 Cal. 509, 121 Am. St. Rep. 130, 91 Pac. 324. To the same effect, see Ligare v. California Southern R. Co. 76 Cal. 610, 18 Pac. 777.

In Towsley v. McDonald, 32 Barb. 604, an affidavit for an order of publication which stated that the person sought was a resident of a certain county during certain years, but had disappeared from the neighborhood, leaving his family, and had not since returned; that the affiant had made inquiry for him and had been informed that he had been in a distant state, but had left there for the West, and that the affiant was further informed by the wife of the defendant that she did not know where he was, and that he took his clothes; that he was a hard drinker, and she did not believe he would return, was sufficient to show that the defendant could not after due effort and diligence be found within the state. In this case, however, certain other facts had to be shown in order to warrant the issuance of the order, and the case turned on another point.

In Brenen v. North, 7 App. Div. 79, 39 N. Y. Supp. 975, where one of the affidavits for an order of publication was made by the attorney for the plaintiff, and stated that the person sought could not after due diligence be found in the state, and that the deponent had inquired from people who knew him, and was informed that he left New York seven years ago and never returned to their knowledge, and another affidavit filed in the same matter by a sister of the defendant stated that her brother had left New York seven years before the time she made her affidavit, and that she had never heard from him, and although she had made diligent inquiries as to his whereabouts, she was unable to get any information concerning him, and that therefore she believed he was not a resident of this state, it was held that the affidavits together were sufficient to authorize the order of publication.

But an affidavit for an order of publication which states that the affiant had inquired of all persons whom he thought likely to know the defendant, to ascertain where he might be found, but had been unable to find anyone who had seen him or had heard positively from him for the past eight years, is clearly insufficient to authorize the publication of the summons, since it does not show that the affiant did not obtain from anyone of whom he made inquiries any information as to where the defendant was. Brady v. Seaman, 30 Cal. 610.

Where the statements in the affidavit as to the whereabouts of the defendant were made upon information and belief, and were to the effect that the defendant had absconded from the state, and that inquiry among his former neighbors had not disclosed his present whereabouts, but that the deponent had been informed that the defendant had been in a certain named state, it was held that the affidavit was insufficient. Hafern v. Davis, 10 Wis. 501.

A statute providing that whenever any complainant shall file in the office of the clerk of the court in which his suit is pending an affidavit showing that any defendant resides or is gone out of the state, or on due inquiry cannot be found, publication of the summons may be made in some newspaper printed in the defendant's county, is complied with when the affidavit avers in the language of the statute that upon diligent inquiry the place of residence of the defendant could not be ascertained, or where it gives the facts connected with the inquiry has been made by the affiant, and that upon such inquiry the residence of the defendant could not be ascertained. Hartung v. Hartung, 8 Ill. App. 156.

A statute which authorizes service by a publication when the party to be served resides out of the state or has departed from the state, or cannot after due diligence be found within the state, is not complied with by an affidavit which merely states that the defendant cannot after due diligence be found in the county, and that the affiant has inquired of a certain named person, who was an intimate friend of the defendant, as to his whereabouts. Swaine v. Chase, 12 Cal. 283.

In Kahn v. Matthai, 115 Cal. 689, 47 Pac. 698, the affidavit for order of publication was held to be fatally defective in failing to show with accuracy the efforts made to serve defendant with summons. In this case the affidavit stated that the plaintiff's attorney placed the summons and complaint in the hands of five different persons (naming them) for service, and that they returned them with the information that they could not find the defendant nor see her, and that she cannot be found in the city or county. The court said: "This statement is but hearsay and may be wholly untrue in fact, without any impeachment of the truthfulness of the affiant. Where service of process upon a defendant within the county is attempted to be made by a person other than the sheriff, his affidavit should, as a rule, be required, showing the nature of the effort made to serve the party, and, where practicable, the reasons why such service cannot be had."

Miscellaneous.

Where the affidavit for the order stated that the efforts made to obtain service of the summons upon the defendants within the state were confined to delivering the summons to the sheriff, with directions to serve the same, and that he returned that he was unable to make such service, the return being stated fifteen days before the making of the affidavit, and the plaintiffs themselves stated that they were unable with due diligence to make the required service, and from the return of the sheriff it appeared that the defendants could not be found within the state, it was held that the affidavit was sufficient. Gallun v. Weil, 116 Wis. 236, 92 N. W. 1091.

Where it appeared from the affidavit for the order of publication that the defendant was a man with a wife, and owned real estate in New York, and had been indicted for a criminal offense; that the plaintiff had become his bondsman to appear for trial, and he did not appear, and that the police had searched for him vainly, and that he had never communicated with his bondsman, and had not demanded payment of rents due him, and could not be found at his house, and that there were other facts of like significance, it was held that the affidavit was sufficient. Wichman v. Aschpurwis, 23 Jones & S. 218.

In Denman v. McGuire, 101 N. Y. 161, 4 N. E. 278, it does not appear just what steps were taken in order personally to serve the summons, before the order of publication was asked for, the court merely stating that the affidavits submitted were sufficient for the purpose; they showed that efforts were made to serve the summons upon the person sought, and to ascertain his place of residence, and that his residence and whereabouts were unknown.

Where the affidavit upon which the application for the order of publication was made stated the nonresidence of the defendant; that he had no place of business in New York; that plaintiff believed that the summons could not with due diligence be served personally within the state; that he had present knowledge of defendant's movements, and was satisfied that he frequented no place in the state, it was held that, while it was not as full as might be desired, it stated sufficient facts to uphold the finding of the judge to whom it was presented, that the plaintiff would be unable with due diligence to make personal service within the state, and authorized an order of publication. Crouter v. Crouter, 133 N. Y. 55, 30 N. E. 726, affirming 63 Hun, 630, 43 N. Y. S. R. 438, 17 N. Y. Supp. 758.

But an affidavit for publication in a chancery cause, which states merely that the affiant cannot find the defendant in the state by reason of his absence therefrom, or of his concealment within it, is not sufficient. The affidavit should state the facts of inquiry and investigation, so that the court can see that the conclusion that the party cannot be found for the reason stated is a reasonable one upon such facts. Thompson v. Circuit Judge, 54 Mich. 236, 10 N. W. 967.

In Palmer v. McMaster, 13 Mont. 184, 40 Am. St. Rep. 434, 33 Pac. 132, where the affidavit did not state that due or any diligence had been used to ascertain the whereabouts of the defendant, or that any effort had been made to obtain personal service of the summons upon him, and his residence was not stated, and no reason given for not stating it, and there was not a single probatory fact stated in the affidavit, the court held that it was an attempt to state the words of the statute without stating any probatory facts that would enable the court judicially to determine whether or not it was sufficient to authorize the issuance of the order for publication of summons, and that it was not sufficient in law to support an order of publication of summons.

An affidavit which recites merely that the defendant cannot be found after due diligence is insufficient to warrant an order of publication, because it is a mere conclusion of law, and does not state the facts upon which is predicated the conclusion of due diligence, which must appear by affidavit in order to justify the judge or other officer in granting the order. Alderson v. Marshall, 7 Mont. 288, 16 Pac. 576.

Where an order of publication is sought against a foreign corporation, a mere affidavit that the constable had returned the summons not served, and that due diligence had been made to find the defendant, is not sufficient, but the affidavit must go further and state that the corporation had no officer in the state upon whom service might have been made, setting out the facts showing what diligence had been used, and what he had done in attempting to ascertain the required information. Victor Mill. & Min. Co. v. Justice Ct. 18 Nev. 21, 1 Pac. 831.

An affidavit for an order of publication ought to state the facts from which the judge would be able to find that the persons sought are nonresidents of the state; or that the plaintiff is unable to ascertain whether they are residents or nonresidents, and that she had been and would be unable with due diligence to make personal service on them within the state; and a mere statement in the language of the statute without setting forth just what inquiry was made is not sufficient. McLaughlin v. McCann, 123 App. Div. 67, 107 N. Y. Supp. 762.

In Nicoll v. Midlands Sav. & L. Co. 21 Okla. 591, 96 Pac. 744, where the publication was sought against a foreign corporation, which, among other statutory requirements, was required to have an agent within the state upon whom service could be had, and the affidavit filed for the order stated that with the exercise of due diligence the plaintiff was unable to procure service of summons upon the defendant within the territory, but did not state the facts tending to show just what diligence the party had taken in order to serve the summons, it was held that it was not sufficient.

In Cordray v. Cordray, 19 Okla. 36, 91 Pac. 781, where the affidavit for the order did not say that service could not be had within the territory, the court held that it was insufficient, for it was incumbent upon the affiant then to show what diligence he had used to ascertain whether service could be had upon the defendant within the territory at the time the affiant made the affidavit.

And the decision in the preceding case was followed in Harrington v. Loomis, 10 Minn. 366, Gil. 293, wherein it appeared that the affidavit for publication recited merely that the defendants could not be found, after due diligence, within the state, and that diligent inquiry had been made for them, and information obtained that they lived in a certain named distant place.

An affidavit to procure an order for the publication of a summons must set out all the facts and circumstances to show that the defendant cannot be found, and a mere statement that he cannot after due diligence be found is insufficient. Mackubin v. Smith, 5 Minn. 367, Gil. 296, wherein it was said: "This statement does not even show that a single effort had been made to find him, either by inquiry or otherwise. The deponent says that the defendant could not be found even if he should look for him. This is the fair meaning of the words used; but even if they should be understood as stating that the deponent had used due diligence, they present nothing save his opinion for the officer to decide the fact upon. What the deponent might consider due diligence in a given case might fail entirely to satisfy the officer of the fact, should the acts constituting the diligence have been made to appear."

"To obtain an order for publication against a defendant who resides in the state, but who is absent therefrom or concealed within the same, the affidavit should state the place of residence of the defendant, the particular circumstances of his absence, and probable duration thereof, and the names and residences, or other descriptions, of the persons from whom the information of such absence or concealment was obtained,—to enable the court to judge of the necessity or propriety of proceeding against the defendant by a publication of the notice, instead of a personal service of the subpoena." Evarts v. Becker, 8 Paige, 506, wherein it was held that an affidavit which states merely that the deponent believes that the defendant resides in the state, and that the subpoena could not be served on him by reason of his concealment within the state, or of his continued absence from the place of his residence, is not sufficient to authorize the court to grant an order of publication.

CHARGEURS REUNIS, Respnt.

Shipping — duty to follow short route.

An ocean carrier is not liable for injury to freight due to the steamer to which the property is delivered for transportation following its usual route to the port of destination, although there is a short route, by following which the injury might have been prevented.

(November 4, 1911.)

(Gose, J., dissents.)

Note. — Duty of carrier as to route.

This note assumes to discuss only the general question of a carrier's duty with respect to the route to be followed, without dealing specifically with what conduct may or may not constitute an infraction of such duty.

"It is well-settled elementary law," says Sharswood, J., in Empire Transp. Co. v. Wallace, 68 Pa. 302, 8 Am. Rep. 178, "that, in the absence of any special contract, the obligation of a carrier of goods is to transport them by the usual route proposed by him to the public."

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bogle, Merritt, & Bogle, for appellant:

Under the bill of lading, where the termini of the voyage alone are given, and no particular route between the termini designated, the carrier is bound to take the northern route, being the most usual, shortest, and most direct sea route for steam vessels between these points.

"The obligation of the carrier to carry depends on his public profession . . . and therefore he is bound to carry only according to the route which he holds out to the public. . . . It is no breach of his duty that he does not carry by a shorter route than that which he professes. If the carrier wishes his goods to be sent by a shorter route than the accustomed one, he should ask for it; and if refused, he should exercise his choice of sending by another carrier." Per Blackburn, J., in Hales v. London & N. W. R. Co. 4 Best & S. 68.

The duty of a carrier to transport the goods intrusted to it by the usual or customary route is also adverted to in The Niagara v. Cordes, 21 How. 7, 16 L. ed. 41; The Indrapura, 171 Fed. 929; Pierce v. Southern P. Co. 120 Cal. 156, 40 L.R.A. 350, 47 Pac. 874, 52 Pac. 302; American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. v. The law implies a duty in the owner of a vessel, whether a general ship or hired for the special purpose of the voyage, to proceed without unnecessary deviation in the usual and customary course. Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716, 4 Moore & P. 540, 8 L. J. C. P. 253, 5 Eng. Rul. Cas. 273.

In every contract of affreightment, unless otherwise expressly provided therein, the shipowner's undertaking is that he will be diligent in carrying the goods on the agreed voyage, and will do so directly, without any unnecessary deviation. Globe Nav. Co. v. Russ Lumber & Mill Co. 167 Fed. 228.

But a departure from the regular and usual course of the voyage, which is a customary incident of the voyage, and according to the known usage of trade, is not a deviation which will subject the carrier to the responsibility of an insurer. Constable v. National S. S. Co. 154 U. S. 51, 38 L. ed. 903, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1062.

This is true even though the usage is not known to the particular shipper, if it is established as a general usage. Hostetter v. 3; L.R.A. (N.S.)

A direct voyage to the destination indicated by the bill of lading is prima facie intended; but this may be controlled by usage, or by personal knowledge of the shipper. Lowry v. Russell, 8 Pick. 360; Thatcher v. McCulloh, Olcott, 365, Fed. Cas. No. 13,862; Wright v. Holcombe, 6 U. C. C. P. 531.

The usage of trade will warrant a carrier in departing from the direct course of the voyage (Bentaloe v. Pratt, Wall. Sr. 58, Fed. Cas. No. 1,330; Bulkley v. Protection Ins. Co. 2 Paine, 82, Fed. Cas. No. 2,118; Folsom v. Merchants' Mut. M. Ins. Co. 38 Me. 421; Parsons v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co. 16 Gray, 463); but such usage ought to be so certain and uniform as to warrant the presumption that it is generally known as the law of that trade (Bulkley v. Protection Ins. Co. and Folsom v. Merchants' Mut. M. Ins. Co. supra).

In the absence of any stipulation as to the route to be taken, a carrier may take either of several customary and usual routes. White v. Ashton, 51 N. Y. 280; Commonwealth Ins. Co. v. Cropper, 21 Md. 311.

Where there are two or more customary routes, and the carrier is left free to choose between them, he may take his choice without incurring increased liability, if there are no special reasons which make the route chosen unsafe. Pierce v. Southern P. Co. 120 Cal. 156, 40 L.R.A. 350, 47 Pac. 874, 52 Pac. 302.

A carrier must, in selecting the route, have due regard to the right and interests of the shipper; as, for example, if it is known to a carrier that a shipment will be more liable to loss or injury on one route than it would on another, he must select the safer route, or be liable for the consequences; especially where instructions to that effect are given. Chartrand v. Southern R. Co. 85 S. C. 479, 67 S. E. 741.

It is a deviation to forward goods by the more hazardous of two routes, where it is practicable to obey the instruction given by the shipper to forward by the safer route. United States Exp. Co. v. Kountze Bros. 8 Wall. 342, 19 L. ed. 457.

Messrs. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey, for respondent:

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages on account of a shipment of oranges from Yokohama to Seattle. Upon a trial of the cause, the trial court made the following findings of fact:

"(3) That on or about the 22d day of November, 1906, the said defendant was the owner of and then operated the steamship Amiral-Hamelin, then plying between the port of Yokohama, Japan, and the port of Seattle, state of Washington.

"(4) That heretofore, and on, to wit, the 22d day of November, 1906, Yutaka & Company, at the port of Yokohama, Japan, delivered to the defendant, on board of its said steamship Amiral-Hamelin, 500 packages of oranges, each package containing two boxes, the property of said Yutaka & Company, and all then and there in good order and condition, to be carried by said defendant on board its said steamship Amiral-Hamelin, from said port of Yokohama, Japan, to said port of Seattle, Washington, and there delivered in like good order and condition to the order of said Yutaka & Company, that said Yutaka & Company, paid to said defendant the sum of $26.22 as freight on said oranges.

"(5) That on the said 22d day of November, 1906, at said port of Yokohama, upon receipt of said 500 packages of oranges on board said steamship Amiral-Hamelin, as aforesaid, the master of said steamship, one Debonnaire, caused to be signed and delivered to said Yutaka & Company, a bill of lading in writing therefor, a true copy of which bill of lading is attached to said complaint, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part thereof."

The bill of lading contained the following statement: "Shipped by M. Yutaka Shokai on board the French steamer Amiral-Hamelin, Capt. Debonnaire, to be conveyed to Seattle and delivered, after safe arrival of the boat, unto order."

The court further found:

"(6) That thereafter and before the delivery of said oranges at Seattle, the said Yutaka & Company, duly sold, assigned, and transferred the said bill of lading unto said plaintiff, and thereby said plaintiff became the owner of and entitled to the said 500 packages of oranges.

"(7) That the most usual, shortest, and most direct route for steam vessels between the port of Yokohama, Japan, and the port of Seattle, Washington, was what was and is well known in the commercial world as the northern route; the same passing through cool water and a cool climate at said time of year.

"(8) That about six months prior to the receipt by said defendant of the said shipment of oranges, the said defendant commenced to operate steamers from Yokohama, Japan, to Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands; thence to San Francisco, California, thence to Seattle, Washington; and thence returning to San Francisco, and thence to South America; that said defendant operated a steamship upon such route from Yokohama about once every sixty days thereafter; that said steamship Amiral-Hamelin was one of the vessels then owned by said defendant company, and at the time of the receipt of said goods on said steamship the same was about to proceed from Yokohama on a voyage to Honolulu; thence to San Francisco; and thence to Seattle; and was the third or fourth steamship to be operated by the defendant company on said route; and that said route was then the usual and customary and only route of defendant's steam vessels between Yokohama and Seattle.

"(9) That after such receipt of said oranges by said defendant it did not cause its said steamship Amiral-Hamelin to proceed from Yokohama to Seattle by said northern route; but did cause said steamship to thereupon proceed from said port of Yokohama to Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, and thence to San Francisco, California, and thence to Seattle, Washington, and did carry said oranges from Yokohama to Seattle on said route, via Honolulu and San Francisco, and delivered said oranges at Seattle, Wash., on January 16, 1907, and more than 30 days later than the same could have been carried between Yokohama and Seattle and delivered, if said steamship had proceeded or said oranges had been carried and transported via said northern route.

"(10) That such route from Yokohama to Seattle, via Honolulu and San Francisco, was different from and very much longer than the said northern route, and the same passed through water and a climate very much warmer at said time of the year than the said northern route."

Upon these findings the trial court concluded that the defendant was not liable, and dismissed the action. The plaintiff has appealed.

The evidence is not before us. The appellant rests its case upon the findings made by the trial court, and argues that the bill of lading issued by the respondent, providing for the transportation of the oranges in question from Yokohama to Seattle, without specially designating on which route the goods were to be carried, required the respondent company to carry the oranges by the most usual, shortest, and most direct sea route followed by steam vessels between Yokohama and Seattle; and it being found that the vessel did not follow that route, but followed a more distant route, by reason of which the goods were damaged, the defendant is liable. It is, no doubt, the general rule that "a bill of lading for the transportation of goods from one port to another prima facie imports a direct voyage, unless there is a known usage of trade to touch at intermediate ports, or deviation is permitted in the contract of affreightment." 36 Cyc. 232; 2 Hutchinson, Carr. § 613; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 207. "Where, however, there are two customary routes, and the carrier is left free to choose between them, he may make his choice without incurring increased liability, if there are no special reasons which make the route chosen unsafe." 2 Hutchinson, Carr. § 613; Hostetter v. Park, 137 U. S. 30, 34 L. ed. 568, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1; White v. Ashton, 51 N. Y. 280; Empire Transp. Co. v. Wallace, 68 Pa. 302, 8 Am. Rep. 178; Thatcher v. McCulloh, Olcott, 365, Fed. Cas. No. 13,862; Lowry v. Russell, 8 Pick. 360.

In the last case cited, the court said: "The bill of lading, like other contracts, is to be construed according to the intention of the parties. Usage of trade is always presumed to be within the knowledge of the parties, and these contracts are supposed to be made with reference to it. There is nothing in the evidence in the present case contradicting the express terms of the bill of lading, which are that the goods shall be carried from New York to Georgetown. A direct voyage is prima facie intended, but this may be controlled by usage, or by personal knowledge of the shipper. There was competent evidence of the usage in relation to vessels, like this; and there was also evidence that this voyage was known to be by the way of Norfolk."

In Hostetter v. Park, supra, Justice Blatchford said: "But it is no deviation, in respect to such a voyage, to touch and stay at a port out of its course, if such departure is within the usage of the trade. . . . The same doctrine is applicable in the case of the bill of lading, even though the usage be not known to the particular shipper, if it be established as a general usage. . . . It is well settled that parties who contract on a subject-matter concerning which known usages prevail incorporate such usages by implication into their agreements, if nothing is said to the contrary."

In White v. Ashton, supra, the court said: "This contract, however, contained no limitation as to the route to be taken by the vessel. It was simply a contract that the barley was to be 'delivered at the port of Baltimore in good order, the dangers of the seas excepted.' This authorized the carrier to take either of several customary and usual routes. Such is the legal effect of the contract (Angell, Carr. §§ 179, 226). Its effect was the same as if the provision had been inserted in the contract that the carrier was at liberty to take any customary or usual route, in his discretion."

In this case, the effect of the court's findings is that there are two usual and customary routes between Yokohama and Seattle; one "well known in the commercial world as the northern route," and the other "to Honolulu; thence to San Francisco; and thence to Seattle." That this last-named route was "the usual and customary and only route of defendant's steam vessels." Under the rules as stated in the authorities above cited, the defendant was free to choose either of these routes. Furthermore, the court found that the route taken by the vessel was the usual and customary route, and also that it was the only route of defendant's vessels. If usage of the trade is to be presumed within the knowledge of the parties, as stated in Lowry v. Russell, supra, and if there is no deviation where the vessel touches points out of her course, if such departure is within the usage of the trade, even though such usage be not known to the particular shipper, as it is stated in Hostetter v. Park, supra, in either event, it necessarily follows that there can be no recovery in this case. The court here found, upon evidence which was no doubt sufficient, that the vessel upon which the oranges were shipped pursued the usual and customary and only route of its steam vessels. There was no evidence, or rather there was no finding, that the shipper did not know this fact. The presumption must therefore be that he did know the fact, and made the shipment with reference to it.

Note. — Assignment of judgment as affecting attorneys' lien thereon.

This note includes only cases where judgment had been obtained, and thereafter assigned by the judgment creditor; and cases like the following, where interest in the result of an action was assigned before judgment, are not within its scope: Frink v. McComb, 60 Fed. 486; McCain v. Portis, 42 Ark. 402; Bendheim v. Pickford, 31 App. D. C. 488; Fry v. Calder, 74 Ga. 7; Lovett v. Moore, 98 Ga. 158, 26 S. E. 498; La Framboise v. The weight of opinion seems to be that a lien for services of an attorney on a judgment obtained by his labor and skill will not be defeated by a subsequent assignment of the judgment, though in some jurisdictions his right thereto is dependent upon compliance with statutory provisions as to entry on record, or filing of notice with the clerk.

An attorney's lien on a fund recovered by his exertions cannot be affected by an assignment of the fund by the client to one with notice of the lien. Haymes v. Cooper, 33 Beav. 431, 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 488, 10 Jur. N. S. 303, 10 L. T. N. S. 87, 12 Week. Rep. 539.

Attorney — lien on judgment — effect of assignment.

APPPEAL by defendants Cross et al. from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chehalis County enjoining them from selling plaintiff's property upon an alias execution for the enforcement of a lien claimed by the defendant attorney upon a judgment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. Emerson Cross, with Mr. J. C. Cross, for appellants:

The mere assignment of the judgment did not operate to deprive the defendant attorney, by whose industry such judgment had been secured, of any lien upon such judgment for his services.

ment is assigned, attorneys may assert thereon a lien for services as against assignee, and, upon giving the sheriff notice of the lien, require him to withhold the amount from the owner of the judgment and pay it to them. Gill v. Truelsen, 39 Minn. 373, 40 N. W. 254.

Transfer of judgment for value, without notice of lien, and bona fide satisfaction of judgment, will not defeat attorneys' lien for services. Guliano v. Whitenack, 9 Misc. 562, 30 N. Y. Supp. 415.

Assignee of judgments takes equitable title subject to attorneys' lien for compensation. Cunningham v. McGrady, 2 Baxt. 141.

In Parker v. Parker, 71 Vt. 387, 45 Atl. 756, a judgment authorized by stipulation of parties was subsequently assigned, and it was held that the attorneys had a lien thereon as against the assignees.

But in Potter v. Mayo, 3 Me. 34, 14 Am. Dec. 211, it was held that an attorneys' lien was defeated where, after opinion was announced and before judgment was actually entered, the judgment was assigned and the amount paid to the assignee.

Messrs. Bridges & Bruener for respondent.

such judgment after the filing of such lien takes judgment subject thereto, and especially where the assignment was made subject to such lien.

Assignment of judgment will not defeat an attorneys' lien for services, where prior to such assignment the lien has been duly filed. Yates v. Kinney, 33 Neb. 853, 51 N. W. 230.

But statutory provisions that notice of lien must be given by entry upon docket, or by filing with clerk, must be strictly complied with. 4 Cyc. 1009.

In Peterson v. Struby, 25 Ind. App. 19, 56 N. E. 733, 57 N. E. 599, the judgment was assigned without consideration, and afterwards satisfied of record, though no part of the judgment had been paid to assignor by judgment debtor, and the court held that an attorneys' lien filed in compliance with the statute was neither destroyed nor affected by the assignment of judgment, but, as there was no consideration for the assignment, nor any for the release of the judgment, the assignee was not personally liable.

In Alderman v. Nelson, 111 Ind. 255, 12 N. E. 394, it was held that the assignee of a judgment is protected against an attorneys' lien where notice of the intention to hold the lien is not entered, as required by the statute, at the time the judgment of the trial court is rendered. The court, in rendering its decision, said that "while it may be true that some latitude as to the time of filing the notice may be allowed, since it is apparent that the notice could not well be entered at the same instant that judgment is recorded, still we think that . . . [an intervening period of several months] is far longer than the statute allows. To permit such a long delay would defeat one of the chief purposes of the statute, and no reasonable construction of its words will permit the conclusion that a delay of many months will not impair the lien unless rights have been acquired in the meantime."

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit to enjoin the sale of property upon an alias execution for the enforcement of an attorneys' lien claimed upon a judgment. From a judgment granting a permanent injunction, the attorney claiming the lien and the sheriff who was executing the writ have appealed.

Two questions are presented: (1) Does the writ lie in cases of this character? (2) Is an assignment of a judgment, made in good faith and without collusion, subject to an attorneys' lien upon the judgment, filed subsequent to the assignment? The facts are as follows: The Humptulips Driving Company brought a condemnation suit against Burrows and wife to condemn certain property owned by the latter. Upon the trial of the case to the jury, for

And it has also been held that an assignee of a judgment is protected against the lien of an attorney for services, where entry of notice of claim of lien, required by statute, is made upon the judgment docket after the assignment. Jennings v. Bacon, 84 Iowa, 403, 51 N. W. 15.

But in Davidson v. La Plata County, 26 Colo. 549, 59 Pac. 46, it was held that while the filing of notice of lien with the clerk, and entry thereof on the margin of the record of judgment, is not constructive notice of the lien, there being no statutory authority for such entry, yet where the attorney of assignee of the judgment, acting for assignee in the matter of assignment, read such notice, it was actual notice to assignee, and he was liable to the attorneys for their fees.

Necessity for personal notice to assignee of judgment.

If notice is required, it must be given to the adverse party, in order to protect the attorneys' lien, but need not be given to the purchaser of the judgment. 4 Cyc. 1009.

Assignment of judgment will not defeat an attorneys' lien, even though the assignee had no notice of the lien. Bent v. Lipscomb, 45 W. Va. 183, 72 Am. St. Rep. 815, 31 S. E. 907; Renick v. Ludington, 16 W. Va. 378; Orford v. Fleming, 18 Can. Law Times Occ. N. 142; Cole v. Eley [1894] 2 Q. B. 350, 63 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 682, 9 Reports, 552, 70 L. T. N. S. 892, 42 Week. Rep. 561.

Under statute, a notice of an attorneys' lien upon a judgment, duly acquired, is notice to all the world, and therefore personal notice to an assignee is not required. Peterson v. Struby, 25 Ind. App. 19, 56 N. E. 733, 57 N. E. 599.

In Sexton v. Pike, 13 Ark. 193, in holding that an attorney may, without previous notice to assignee, enforce a lien for his fees against an assignee of the judgment who has received avails and discharged the same, the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property, there was a verdict for the defendants for $4,500, and a judgment was entered in their favor for that sum with costs. The condemnner appealed. Pending the appeal in this court, the Burrows, without the intervention of counsel, assigned the judgment. Upon a stipulation between the appellant, the condemnner, and the assignee of the judgment, the appeal was dismissed, and the remittitur was transmitted to the trial court. The assignment was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court May 17, 1907. The appellant attorney filed his claim of lien in the same office on May 27th following. He was the attorney for the judgment creditors, both in the trial of the cause where the judgment was entered and upon appeal. The assignment was made for a valuable consideration, and without notice of a claim of lien upon the part of the attorney. The assignee knew the relation of the appellant attorney to the case when he took the assignment. There is no claim that the assignment was collusive. Upon these facts the right of lien is asserted by the appellants, and denied by the respondent.

The respondent had a right to injunctive relief if the assignee took the judgment freed from the claim of lien. Cline Piano Co. v. Sherwood, 57 Wash. 239, 106 Pac. 742; Grant v. Cole, 23 Wash. 542, 63 Pac. 263; Heintz v. Brown, 46 Wash. 387, 123 Am. St. Rep. 937, 90 Pac. 211.

The parties had a right to stipulate for the dismissal of the appeal without the aid or intervention of their counsel. Cline Piano Company v. Sherwood, supra.

the court said: "As against the assignee of the judgment, his equity is in no way created, nor is it easy to conceive why it should be necessary to enhance it by notice to him, either express or implied, to say nothing of the impracticability of such a duty in general, even when he might suspect that his client designed to assign the judgment. It already exists and adheres in, and is interwoven with, his clients' legal rights, and is asserted as against the defendant under their auspices, and needs not be enhanced as against the assignee of the judgment, because, being prior, it is already paramount to his equity,—the assignee's rights being equitable only, and not legal."

And in Heartt v. Chapman, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 102, the courts, in holding that an attorney is protected in his lien for services as against an assignee of the judgment, though the assignee is without notice of the claim, said: "If it is necessary for the security of the attorney as against the debtor, to give notice to him of his lien, this may be done with convenience, as the attorney must know who the debtor is, but it is apparent in case the debt is assigned, he may not, and most likely cannot, know who the assignee is. It is more reasonable to require the assignee, who takes the demand subject to the same equity, and in no better condition that it was in the assignor's hands, and who knows, or is presumed to know, the law as to the attorneys' lien, to make the necessary inquiry before he takes the assignment of a judgment; and notice to him from the attorney, which must frequently be impracticable, is not necessary."

In Marvin v. Marvin, 22 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 274, 19 N. Y. Supp. 371, in holding that personal notice to the assignee is unnecessary, the court said: "No claim can be made that the attorney should have given notice to these respondents. They were not parties to the action, nor interested in it until after judgment, execution, and levy had been made. They were perfect strangers to the record and to the plaintiff's attorney. . . . The judgment, its entry, and docketing the execution in the hands of the sheriff, all must have contained the name of the plaintiff's attorney, and thus, even after the assignment, put the respondents on the inquiry. If they proceeded before assignment, or after without doing this, they took at their peril and subject to all its imperfections." This case, although in accordance with the weight of opinion, was reversed in 21 N. Y. Supp. 1129, but as the reversal was a memorandum opinion, it is impossible to state the grounds therefor.

Assignments for creditors.

In Re Gates, 51 App. Div. 350, 64 N. Y. Supp. 1050, it was held that upon the assignment of a judgment for the benefit of creditors, the attorneys' lien attaches to the proceeds of such judgment on sale by assignee, though such sale was made subject to such lien.

And in Bruce v. Anderson, 176 Mass. 161, 57 N. E. 354, there is a dictum to the effect that an attorneys' lien on a judgment is not defeated by the judgment creditor's assignment for creditors.

Acquiescence of attorney in assignment.

Where judgment is assigned upon agreement by assignee to pay attorneys' fees out of the proceeds of the judgment, an attorneys' lien is not lost by his acquiescence in the assignment. Hutchinson v. Worthington, 7 App. D. C. 548.

Effect of attorney's taking assignment.

Where an attorney takes an assignment of the judgment, his lien for costs is merged. Dodd v. Brett, 1 Minn. 270, Gil. 205, 66 Am. Dec. 541; Bishop v. Garcia, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 69. J. H. B.

The second question must receive a negative answer. The statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 136), so far as pertinent here, provides that an attorney has a lien for his compensation upon the judgment to the extent of the value of his services, "from the time of filing notice of such lien or claim with the clerk of the court where the judgment is entered." The lien does not become effective as against a settlement between the parties, or a sale of the judgment made in good faith prior to the filing of the lien. In other words, there is no attorneys' lien until the claim is properly filed. The right to claim the lien exists before the filing, but the lien only exists from the time of filing. Cline Piano Co. v. Sherwood, supra; Wooding v. Crain, 11 Wash. 207, 39 Pac. 442; McRea v. Warehime, 49 Wash. 194, 94 Pac. 924. In the case last cited it was said that the statute "provides a specific manner for an attorney to assert a lien upon the subject-matter of an action." It is true that in the cases cited the parties to the action had settled the subject-matter of the litigation before the filing of the claim of lien. The fact that the case at bar involves the assignment of the judgment by the judgment creditors cannot change the rule. The cases necessarily proceed upon the assumption that the right to an attorneys' lien in this state rests upon the statute, and that there is no common-law or equitable right of lien. Hookway v. Thompson, 56 Wash. 57, 105 Pac. 153, is in point. In that case, in construing the words in the homestead statute, "from and after the declaration is filed," it was held that the declaration has no retroactive force, and that a mortgage executed by the husband upon his separate real estate took precedence of a homestead declaration thereafter filed by the wife. This view is supported by the following cases from other jurisdictions: Alderman v. Nelson, 111 Ind. 255, 12 N. E. 394; Ward v. Sherbondy, 96 Iowa, 477, 65 N. W. 413; Wagner v. Goldschmidt, 51 Or. 63, 93 Pac. 689; Elliott v. Atkins, 26 Neb. 403, 42 N. W. 403; Pirie v. Harkness, 3 S. D. 178, 52 N. W. 581. In the Alderman Case the right of an assignee of the judgment was upheld against a claim of lien upon the part of the attorney for the judgment creditor, which had not been perfected when the assignment was made. In considering the case, the court said: "It is not necessary to inquire whether an attorney had a lien on his client's judgment at common law; for the statute covers the entire subject, and creates the lien, and that is the only one that can be enforced. It was undoubtedly within the power of the legislature to abrogate a rule of the common law, so that, if it were conceded that the lien existed at common law, it would not avail the appellees. The statute is now the source from which the lien is derived, and it can only exist as the statute creates it." In the Ward Case it was held that a lien of a garnishing creditor is effective as against the lien of an attorney entered in the judgment docket subsequent to the garnishment; that the statute is not extended by the provisions of the common law, "but is in lieu of them;" that the attorney has no equitable lien; and that the statute provides for the only lien to which an attorney is entitled, and that, to obtain it, he must comply with its requirements.

The appellants argue, and cite authorities from other jurisdictions to the effect that the only purpose of filing the claim of lien is to protect the judgment debtor. Frink v. McComb (C. C.) 60 Fed. 486, is typical of a number of the cases relied upon for a reversal. It says, in substance, that the cases proceed upon three several theories: (1) That the attorney has a common-law lien upon a judgment recovered by him for his proper charges; (2) that he has a lien upon the theory of an equitable assignment of the judgment; and (3) that it is the duty of the court to protect its officers against the deprivation of their just reward. None of these grounds are applicable in this state. Other cases are cited by the appellants upon statutes somewhat similar to ours, which announce the rule that an attorneys' lien takes precedence of an assignment filed or a garnishment served prior to the filing of the attorneys' lien. We do not deem it necessary to point out the difference in the wording of the statutes, or to discuss the cases. Our statute is plain, and the interpretation heretofore given it is not in harmony with the cases relied upon by the appellants. If it be suggested that this interpretation works a hardship upon deserving counsel we answer: Ita lex scripta est.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARY A. KYLE, Admr., etc., of D. C. Kyle, Deceased, Appt.,

v.

J. D. CHESTER, Respt.

(42 Mont. 522, 113 Pac. 749.)

Attachment — implied contract — destruction of property.

No contract to pay for animals negligently driven in the way of a railroad train and killed can be implied so as to bring a demand for compensation within a statute allowing attachments in case of breach of contract, express or implied.

(February 2, 1911.)

The rule that one may waive a tort and sue on an implied contract only where the tortfeasor has derived some benefit from the tort seems to have been adhered to in the few cases found where it was sought to waive the tort and maintain an action on implied contract for damages resulting from negligent destruction of property.

Where damages have been committed by one's cattle to the crops or personal property of another, without the owner's participation in the trespass, or benefit therefrom, and in the absence of any promise, the party injured in his property cannot waive the tort and recover his damages in an action on contract. E. 570, where the defendant found a wagon in the street, and hitched his horses to it for the purpose of going upon a fishing excursion for one day, and upon starting to go the tongue of the wagon was broken by one of the horses, and he unhitched the horses and left the wagon in the street, and it was finally carried to his lot and left there; but there is no evidence that he ever made any claim to the wagon or any further use of it, nor was anything further proved tending to show that he intended to convert it permanently to his 37 L.R.A. own use, but on the contrary, the indications were that he was holding it for the use of the owner,—it was held that an action upon implied contract for damages to the wagon would not lie, but that the plaintiff must sue in tort for the damages to his property.

In Eads v. Pitkin, 3 G. Greene, 77, a barge was taken without authority or permission, for the purpose of conveying freight from one point to another, and after using same it was left in a place different from that from which it had been taken, and exposed in such careless and negligent manner that it was carried away by the current of the river and ice, and sunk and wholly lost; and it was held that an action of debt for damages resulting from the negligence could not be maintained either at common law, or by virtue of the provision of statute "to prevent and punish the owners and masters of steamboats committing trespass upon the property of persons living in the state, and for other purposes."

And in Page v. Babbit, 21 N. H. 389, there is a dictum to the effect that assumpsit will not lie for damages done to land by trespassing cattle.

This note has intended to include only cases where damage or loss of property was the result of negligence of one sustaining no contractual relation, either express or implied, with the owner of property.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

After this action was begun the plaintiff, D. C. Kyle, died, and Mary A. Kyle, as administratrix, was substituted.

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant negligently drove eight steers belonging to the plaintiff onto the inclosed right of way of the Great Northern Railway, where they were killed by a passing train. The last paragraph alleges that the defendant thereby became indebted to the plaintiff for the value of the steers. With his complaint the plaintiff filed an affidavit for attachment in the form required by statute, wherein he also alleged that he had sold and delivered the steers to the defendant at the latter's request. The writ was issued by the clerk, but the district court of Valley county afterwards, on defendant's motion, entered an order discharging the attachment. From that order an appeal has been taken.

We think the order was properly made. This is not a case wherein the plaintiff may sue as upon an implied contract, waiving the tort, as is the familiar expression. As long ago as 1810, in the case of Whiting v. Sullivan, 7 Mass. 107, Chief Justice Parsons said: "The law will not imply a promise of any person against his own express declaration because such declaration is repugnant to any implication of a promise." In Webster v. Drinkwater, 5 Me. 319, 17 Am. Dec. 238, the court said: "It is a principle well settled that a promise is not implied against or without the consent of the person attempted to be charged by it. . . . And where one is implied, it is because the party intended it should be, or because natural justice requires it, in consideration of some benefit received." Chief Justice Beardsley said in Osborn v. Bell, 5 Denio, 370, 49 Am. Dec. 275: "It was not shown on the trial of this case that the defendant had received any benefit from the seizure and sale of the property in question. No express promise to pay for the goods was pretended, and every feature of the transaction repels the idea that the defendant intended to have one implied from what he did. He may have been a trespasser, but I see no ground on which he can be held liable for these goods as sold to him. If he can be, such an action is, in almost every imaginable case, a concurrent remedy with trover, replevin, and trespass for personal property. It may be a concurrent remedy where the property has been appropriated by a wrongdoer to his own use, but unless that fact is shown, I think no case will be found in which it has been held that a promise to pay for the goods is implied by law." The supreme court of Wisconsin, in Norden v. Jones, 33 Wis. 600, 14 Am. Rep. 782, held that the rule laid down in Webster v. Drinkwater, supra, correctly embodies the governing principle upon which the law raises a promise to pay. In the case of Tightmeyer v. Mongold, 20 Kan. 90, the court held that where one's cattle, had damaged the crops of another, and there was no testimony showing that the owner of the cattle had benefited thereby, the owner of the crops had no right of election but must bring his action ex delicto. The court in the course of the opinion said: "The whole discussion of waiving the tort and suing on the contract is reduced to the single question, When is a promise implied by the law?" The case of Webster v. Drinkwater, supra, is then cited with approval. The same court in Fanson v. Linsley, 20 Kan. 235, said: "We do not think that the cause of action stated in defendant's third defense is a proper subject of either set-off or counterclaim. It does not appear from such defense that the plaintiff received or expected to receive any benefit from his wrongdoing, and the relief asked for by the defendant is not for the value of any benefit resulting to the plaintiff, but for damages sustained by the defendant. The cause of action therefore does not arise from any contract, express or implied." See also National Trust Co. v. Gleason, 77 N. Y. 400, 33 Am. Rep. 632; New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. v. Gleason, 78 N. Y. 503. The rule is well stated in Cooper v. Cooper, 147 Mass. 370, 9 Am. St. Rep. 721, 17 N. E. 892, as follows: "The same act or transaction may constitute a cause of action both in contract and in tort, and a party may have an election to pursue either remedy. In that sense he may be said to waive the tort and sue in contract. But a right of action in contract cannot be created by waiving a tort, and the duty to pay damages for a tort does not imply a promise to pay them upon which assumpsit can be maintained." Ordinarily when the conduct of a person is such as to raise a clear presumption that he does not intend to do a certain act, he will not thereafter be charged with such intention by implication. State Bank v. Forsyth, 41 Mont. 249, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 501, 108 Pac. 914. In the light of the foregoing authorities it is clear that the district court correctly held that the complaint did not state a cause of action in contract, either express or implied.

The case of Monroe v. Cannon, 24 Mont. 316, 81 Am. St. Rep. 439, 61 Pac. 863, is illustrative of that class of cases in which the defendant derived a benefit from his wrongful act; but we find nothing in the record of this case to indicate that defendant received any benefit from his act.

The affidavit for attachment does not set forth the same cause of action found in the complaint. This affidavit may have been sufficient on its face to warrant the clerk in issuing the writ (see Newell v. Whitwell, 16 Mont. 243, 40 Pac. 866), but the court must look to the complaint to ascertain whether it states a cause of action in contract, express or implied. The fundamental question is whether the complaint states such a cause of action. As this complaint does not, the attachment was properly discharged. Rev. Codes, §§ 6656, 6681, 6683.

The order is affirmed.

J. L. OWENS COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

VERN C. BEMIS et al., Respts.,

(— N. D. —, 133 N. W. 59.)

Evidence — paper in possession of adversary — notice to produce.

1. There is a well-recognized exception to the general rule that notice to produce must be given before secondary evidence will be received as to the contents of a letter or other written document in the possession of the adverse party. Where the pleadings clearly disclose that proof of such document will be necessary at the trial, notice to produce it is unnecessary.

Sale — order — countermand.

2. Until there has been an acceptance of a written order for machinery to be shipped to the purchaser at a future date, the latter is at liberty to countermand such order, as the same, until acceptance, does not constitute a contract, but merely an offer or proposal to purchase.

Same — sufficiency.

3. Defendants' letter to plaintiff, countermanding such order, was as follows: "Cumplings, N. Dak. 1/4, 1908. J. L. Owens Co., Mpls., Minn. Gentlemen:—Please cancel our order of Aug. 10-07. Resp. yours, Bemis & Wilsie." Held a sufficient cancellation of such order, and withdrawal of the offer or proposal to purchase therein contained.

(October 26, 1911.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Traill County in defendants' favor and from orders denying motions for judgments notwithstanding the verdict or for new trial in an action brought to recover the purchase price of certain machinery alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Turner & Murphy, for appellant.

Mr. P. G. Swenson, for respondents:

The contention of counsel for respondents, and the authorities cited, are fully set out in the opinion.

Fisk, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover the purchase price of certain grain-cleaning machinery claimed by plaintiff to have been sold by it to defendants in the fall of 1907. Such sale is expressly denied in the answer, and defendants' contention is that they merely gave to plaintiff's agent an order for such machinery amounting to a proposal to purchase, and that before the same was accepted by plaintiff they countermanded such order.

At the conclusion of all the testimony, both parties moved for a directed verdict, whereupon the trial court granted defendants' motion, and judgment was entered pursuant to the verdict directed by the court. In due time plaintiff caused a statement of the case to be settled, embracing proper specifications, and thereafter moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial, which motions were denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and also from the orders denying such motions.

Appellant's assignments of error all relate to the correctness of the rulings aforesaid, and the pivotal question in the case is as to whether the order for such machinery constituted a complete contract of sale and purchase, or merely, as claimed by defendants, an offer on their part to purchase the same upon the terms therein stated. Appellant also claims that there was prejudicial error committed by the trial court in the admission in evidence, over its objection, of Exhibit 1, being a copy of a purported letter claimed to have been sent by defendants to plaintiff on January 4, 1908, countermanding the order for such machinery.

Before noticing appellant's contentions, a brief statement of the facts will be made. In the fall of 1907, defendants, dealers in hardware, etc., at Cummings, gave to one Kuhnley, plaintiff's traveling salesman, the following order:

Such order was solicited from defendants by the said Kuhnley, and the same was signed by him and by defendants at the time the order was given. Thereafter, and until January 4, 1908, no communications took place between the parties regarding such order, but on the latter date defendants claim that they mailed to plaintiff a letter as follows:

Cummings, N. Dak. 1/4, 1908.
J. L. Owens Co.,
Mpls., Minn.
Gentlemen:—

Please cancel our order of Aug. 10—07.
Resp. yours,
Bemis & Wilsie, R. M. W.

It is conceded that on January 8th plaintiff wrote defendants as follows:

Minneapolis, Minn., Jan. 8, 1908.
Messrs. Bemis & Wilsie,
Cummings, N. D.
Gentlemen:—

We have yours of the 4th, desiring us to cancel your order of Aug. 10th, 1907, and will say, gentlemen, in answer that we have investigated this order and find that the order is a signed order, without any provision or condition under which you could cancel same, and we fail to see in what light we would be justified in doing so. Of course, we wish it understood that we desire to do all that is proper and right, and meet our 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

customers in their demands where we can possibly do so, but in this case we think it would be detrimental to yourselves as well as us, for we surely can prove to you that we have the goods that will do what we claim for them, and will get the business in spite of any competition that you might have. We know that we have a machine that can be sold at the right price, and that no machine, no matter what it is, can compete with it when it comes to doing the work in all kinds of grain and seed. And under the circumstances we cannot consent to cancel the order, but will consent to give you such help, with one of our travelers, as you desire in starting the machines and the trade in your territory, and proving to you what we claim above, which we believe you yourselves will agree is entirely fair, and that our stand in consequence of same is not more than what you could ask or would do were you in our position.

We beg to remain,

Yours truly,
J. L. Owens Company.

Notwithstanding defendant's attempt to countermand such order, plaintiff shipped such machinery to defendants from Minneapolis, on January 24, 1908, but, defendants refusing to receive the same, it was later sold by the common carrier to satisfy its lien for freight and storage charges.

In the light of the above facts, we are required to determine the correctness of the trial court's rulings complained of.

Appellant's first contention is that it was error to admit in evidence the copy of the letter claimed to have been written by defendants to plaintiff on January 4th, countermanding the order; the point being that no proper foundation was laid for the introduction of such secondary evidence. A notice to produce the original of such letter was not served on plaintiff's counsel until the afternoon of the day preceding the trial, and appellant's counsel contend that this was insufficient notice. We are agreed that there was no error in the ruling of the trial court. A notice to produce such letter was unnecessary. Defendants had a right to assume that plaintiff would have such letter at the trial. The answer furnished plaintiff with sufficient notice that the same would or might be required at the trial. Nichols & S. Co. v. Charlebois, 10 N. D. 446, 88 N. W. 80. In disposing of a similar question, this court there said: "The general rule is that notice to produce must be given before secondary evidence can be received as to the contents of a written document in the possession of the adverse party, but there is a well-settled exception to this rule. Where the issues framed by the pleadings necessarily disclose to the adverse party that proof of the document will be necessary at the trial, it is well settled that notice to produce the document is not necessary in order to admit secondary evidence of the contents of such document, in case the original is not produced. The adverse party is bound to take notice from the pleadings that the production of the document at the trial is required, and in case it is not produced secondary evidence must be resorted to. The answer in this case necessarily informed the plaintiff that the defense relied upon was a breach of the warranty, and therefore the plaintiff was bound to know that in proving such defense the defendant would necessarily be required to prove the contents of the notice sent in this registered letter. The reason for the rule requiring a notice to produce the original, therefore, did not apply. See 1 Jones, Ev. ¶ 24; Kellar v. Savage, 20 Me. 199." See 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1205.

Appellant's next contention is that the order for this machinery constituted a contract of sale between the parties, but we think such contention unsound. The fact that plaintiff's soliciting agent, as well as defendants signed their names at the bottom of the order, in no manner tends to lend support to appellant's theory. It is, we think, entirely clear that such instrument constituted a mere offer or proposal on defendant's part to purchase such machinery, and that, until accepted by plaintiff, the same would not become a binding contract. The plaintiff was in no manner obligated to accept such order, and until it did so in fact, and notified defendants thereof, the latter were at liberty to countermand the same. It is not contended that plaintiff, prior to January 8, 1908, notified defendants of its acceptance of such order, and it is conceded that such machinery was not delivered to the common carrier for shipment until long after defendants' letter had been received by plaintiff, countermanding the order. That defendants had the right to cancel or countermand such order at any time prior to its acceptance by plaintiff is abundantly supported by authority. See 1 Mechem, Sales, 252. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Richardson, 89 Iowa, 525, 56 N. W. 682; Reeves & Co. v. Bruening, 13 N. D. 157, 100 N. W. 241; Colean Mfg. Co. v. Blanchett, 16 N. D. 341, 113 N. W. 614; Hallwood Cash Register Co. v. Finnegan (Sup.) 84 N. Y. Supp. 154; P. J. Bowlin Liquor Co. v. Beaudoin, 15 N. D. 557, 108 N. W. 545; McKindly v. Dunham, 55 Wis. 515, 42 Am. Rep. 740, 13 N. W. 485; Merchants' Exch. Co. v. Sanders, 74 Ark. 16, 84 S. W. 786, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 955; Bauman v. McManus, 75 Kan. 106, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1138, 89 Pac. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Richardson, supra, action was brought upon a written order for twine given to plaintiff's agent. The court says: "It does not purport to be a contract between the parties. By it, the plaintiff was not obligated to do anything on its part. The plaintiff does not undertake, by the terms of the writing, to ship the twine on the proposed conditions. It is merely a request or a proposition from the defendant to the plaintiff that if the latter will ship certain goods he will pay a certain sum therefor at a fixed time. It may be said to be an order, but it lacks an essential element of a contract,—mutual assent. Being only a request or order, which required acceptance by the plaintiff to give it the force of a contract, it follows that it might be withdrawn or countermanded at any time prior to its being so accepted."

In McKindly v. Dunham, 55 Wis. 515, 42 Am. Rep. 740, 13 N. W. 485, the court said: "But the agent did not sell the goods, nor even contract to sell them. When the defendant had completed his transaction with Kilbourn, there had been no binding contract made, or any sale, absolute or conditional. The defendant could have countermanded his order at any time before the goods were shipped, and the plaintiffs could have refused to accept the order. Neither party had become bound by anything then done. The order of the defendant was a mere proposal, to be accepted or not as the plaintiffs might see fit, and he could have withdrawn it before its acceptance."

In speaking of the character of such an order as established by custom, the Kentucky supreme court, in John Matthews' Apparatus Co. v. Renz, supra, used the following language: "The custom of so doing business is of such long standing, so extensive, and so important in the commercial world, especially in the United States, that the courts will take notice of it. They have done so, and this court has. In the Charles Brown Grocery Co. v. Becket, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 394, 57 S. W. 458, we recognized in this state what appears to be the general rule in most or all of the states, quoting it in this language: 'In the absence of special authority to bind his principal, the drummer can merely solicit and transmit the order, and the contract of sale does not become completed until the order is accepted by his principal.' Any other construction of these transactions would tend to so materially hamper and cripple this important means of conducting mercantile business as to well-nigh destroy its effectiveness, now so generally understood, employed, and recognized."

We are entirely satisfied with the reasoning and conclusions announced in the foregoing authorities, and applying such rules to the case at bar requires us to overrule appellant's contention to the contrary.

But one other point remains to be considered. Appellant's last contention is, in effect, that defendants' letter of January 4th "does not show a distinct, unequivocal, and unconditional withdrawal of the offer." It is true, no doubt, that such letter must meet these requirements, but we are entirely clear that it does; and plaintiff's letter in reply thereto clearly discloses that its officers thus interpreted it.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

such train and the consequent wrecking and demolition of the car in which he was being carried. The accident occurred in defendant's yard at Colton, in San Bernardino county, and was caused by the train on which deceased was riding running from the main track into an open switch at a high rate of speed, estimated by the trial court to be between 45 and 55 miles an hour, when, being unable to traverse the curve of the side track, it was derailed. The switch had been left open by the switch foreman, who, with his crew, was working on the siding at the time, and who had neglected to keep himself advised of the whereabouts of the train, which was long overdue, and had left the switch open in violation of the rules of the defendant. Deceased was an employee of defendant, but at the time of the accident, and for some months next preceding the same, was absent on leave. At the time of the accident he was returning from a journey to an eastern state to his home in California. He was riding on a pass, good until March 31, 1907, which had been issued to him by defendant for the purposes of his journey. It was found by the trial court, in accord with a stipulation of the parties, that the pass was issued to him as an employee, "in accordance with the long-established practice of the company, and one well known to its employees, to furnish passes from time to time to its employees." There was no other consideration for such pass. It contained the following statements, subscribed by the deceased: "This is a free pass

In Rogers v. Kennebec S. B. Co. 86 Me. 261, 25 L.R.A. 491, 29 Atl. 1069, supra, holding that a condition in a free pass that the passenger will assume all risks of personal injury is not against public policy, the court said: "In what manner the public welfare or the safety of human life is involved, or any of the cherished interests of the law are invaded, by allowing one out of a hundred passengers to travel on a pass at his own risk, does not clearly and satisfactorily appear. In most instances, it is believed, free passes are solicited by the traveler, not proffered by the carrier. The fact that a gratuitous passenger must travel at his own risk will surely operate as an incentive to greater care and caution on his part, and tend to diminish the number of passes issued. The probability that the cases of free transit will be so numerous as to induce any relaxation of the rules of prudence and vigilance on the part of the carrier is too remote to have weight as argument. He is constantly, and it would seem sufficiently, reminded of his obligations to the public, in the most forcible and effectual manner, by the numerous claims and large verdicts in favor of those injured who travel for hire. Nor is the number of passes likely to be so great as to involve the public interest by an increase in the rates of fare."

In Knowlton v. Erie R. Co. 19 Ohio St. 260, 2 Am. Rep. 395, involving personal injuries to a person riding on a free pass, it was held that, while the rule was established in Ohio that a common carrier cannot, even by express contract, relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by his own negligence, or that of his servants in the discharge of the duties incident to their employment, the case must, in the circumstances, be determined by the laws of New York, which uphold such a stipulation.

And some cases uphold such a stipulation, at least so far as regards negligence on the part of the railroad company's servants. Kinney v. Central R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 265, affirming 32 N. J. L. 407, 40 Am. Dec. 675; Wells v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 181; Perkins v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 196, 82 Am. Dec. 281.

In other jurisdictions it is held that, even where the pass is a mere gratuity, the carrier cannot stipulate against liability for negligence, or at least that a stipulation in general terms does not embrace injuries resulting from negligence. *Mobile & O. based upon no consideration whatever. The person accepting and using this pass, in consideration of receiving the same, agrees that the Southern Pacific Company shall not be liable under any circumstances, whether of negligence—criminal or otherwise—of its agents or others, for any injury to the person, or for any loss or damage to the property, of the individual using this pass; and that as to such person the company shall not be considered as a common carrier, or liable as such." This action was brought by plaintiff to recover the damage caused her by the death of her husband, being based upon § 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, when the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, or, if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such person. In her complaint she alleged that the accident and the consequent death of deceased were caused by the "gross negligence" of defendant, and these allegations were found by the trial court, which tried the case without a jury, to be true. Damages were assessed at the sum of $8,000, and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff for that amount. This is an appeal by defendant from such judgment. The record on appeal was filed in this court on March, 29, 1910.

The ultimate question presented by this

S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, infra, III. a and II. b, was held to govern in the case of a private carrier, in Sullivan-Sanford Lumber Co. v. Watson, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 635, involving a stipulation in a free permit to ride on a logging road.

Where the pass is deemed not to be a gratuity, as for instance when it is issued as a part of a contract, to an employee or other person in a similar relation, it is agreed among the cases coming within the scope of this note, that the carrier cannot, or by a general stipulation does not, relieve itself from liability for negligent injuries. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. ed. 535; Whitney v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 50 L.R.A. 615, 43 C. C. A. 19, 102 Fed. 850; Dugan v. Blue Hill Street R. Co. 193 Mass. 431, 71 N. Supp. 941 (holding stipulation not so plain and unequivocal as to embrace negligence); Camden & A. R. Co. v. Bausch, 4 Sadler (Pa.) 518, 7 Atl. 731 (decided according to law of New Jersey); Buffalo, P. & W. R. Co. v. O'Hara, 3 Pennyp. 190; Nickles v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 74 S. C. 102, 54 S. C. 68.

It is also held that a provision in a pass exempting the railroad company from liability for injuries resulting from the negligence of its agents and servants is of no effect as against a statute by which damages are given to the widow and next of kin of a passenger whose death results from the negligence of the company or its servants, at least where the recipient is to be regarded as a passenger for the reason that the pass was not a mere gratuity, but was furnished as a part of the consideration by which he was induced to enter the employ- 37 L.R.A. ment of the company. Tingley v. Long Island R. Co. 109 App. Div. 793, 96 N. Y. Supp. 865, citing with approval Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. infra.

And it was held in Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 25 L.R.A. 157, 44 Am. St. Rep. 335, 37 N. E. 770, that conditions on the back of a ticket did not release the railroad company from liability for the penalty given by statute to the widow and children and next of kin of a passenger or employee injured by the gross negligence or carelessness of the servants of the company. In this case the ticket was being used by a railroad employee to whom was issued monthly a ticket good for more rides than necessary in attending to his work, and containing the express privilege of using them for his own private interest or pleasure, and at the time of the accident he was riding entirely for his own pleasure; and it was held that he was not at that time an employee, but a passenger within the meaning of the statute, the court giving as one reason why he should be regarded as a passenger that the ticket furnished a part of the consideration by which he was induced to enter the employment of the defendant. In Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 166 Mass. 492, 33 L.R.A. 844, 55 Am. St. Rep. 417, 44 N. E. 611, involving an action for personal injuries, based on the same state of facts, the court declared that in view of the former decision, the deceased must be regarded as having been a passenger, and held that therefore the condition on the ticket was ineffectual to exempt the railroad company from liability for the negligence of its servants.

It has been held that conditions on the back of a void pass are without effect upon the rights of the person attempting to use it for transportation. McNeill v. Durham & C. R. Co. 135 N. C. 682, 67 L.R.A. 230, 47 S. E. 765 (forbidden by statute). And see Buffalo, P. & W. R. Co. v. O'Hara, infra, III. a.

While, on the contrary, it has been held that a person who is bound by a stipulation on a free pass that the carrier shall not be liable for injury to him through the negliappeal is whether the provision in the pass purporting to exempt defendant from liability for the negligence of its agents precludes a recovery under the circumstances of this case.

Independent of statutory provisions, it is almost universally held that any contract purporting to exempt a common carrier of persons from liability for negligence of himself or his servants to a passenger carried for compensation is void, as being against public policy; and it is immaterial in such cases that the attempted limitation on such liability is agreed to by the passenger in consideration of special concessions in the matter of rate of fare or other departure from the rules applicable to passengers paying full fare. It is enough that there is any consideration for the carriage.

The person admitted to his vehicle by a common carrier, for the purpose of carriage, for any compensation, is a passenger, with all the rights possessed by any passenger so far as the exercise of care for his safe carriage is concerned. By the great weight of authority, however, in the absence of provision to the contrary, such a contract of exemption from liability for negligence is upheld, at least so far as any except what is called in the opinions wanton or wilful or gross negligence is concerned, in the case of a passenger who is carried solely as a matter of favor, and without any compensation, or advantage whatever to the carrier. See Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, negligence of its servants or otherwise is estopped to assert that the pass was issued to him in violation of law, as a means of escaping the effect of the stipulation. Muldoon v. Seattle City R. Co. 10 Wash. 311, 45 Am. St. Rep. 787, 38 Pac. 995.

II. Degree or nature of negligence.

a. Degree.

In this connection, see also Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. supra, 1.; Rose v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. and Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. infra, III. a.

As to the degree of care owed to a free passenger in the absence of a stipulation upon the subject, see the note to Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Lawson, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 721.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Read, 37 Ill. 484, 87 Am. Dec. 260, it is held that an agreement that the recipient of the gratuitous pass assumed all risk of accident, and that the company should not be liable in any circumstances, while not exempting the railroad company from the gross negligence of its employees, did exempt it from all other species or degrees of negligence not denominated gross, or partaking of the character of recklessness. This case was cited as controlling in Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs, 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 613.

And in Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 20 Minn. 125, Gil. 110, 18 Am. Rep. 360, it is held that a stipulation in a free pass that the recipient assumes all risk of accident, and agrees that the company shall not be liable for any injury whether through negligence of its agents or otherwise, does not protect the railroad company in case of gross negligence. The court in effect points out that since, in the absence of such a stipulation, a carrier owes the same care to a gratuitous passenger as to a passenger for hire, the rule that a carrier cannot exempt itself by contract from liability for injury to a passenger should with equal force apply to a gratuitous passenger. And although it appears in the case that the accident was caused through gross negligence, the court seems inclined to repudiate any distinction between different degrees of negligence, so far as regards the relation of carrier and passenger.

Likewise, in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Butler, 57 Pa. 335, it appeared that the lower court charged the jury that even if the deceased was riding on a free pass and had signed the release on the back of it, the company would not be excused if the death occurred from the gross negligence of any of the employees of the road; but the supreme court contented itself with merely saying that a stipulation by a common carrier that he shall not be liable for damages does not relieve him from responsibility for actual negligence of himself or servants, and cited, among other cases, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315, which, as elsewhere noted, involved the right of one riding upon a drover's pass.

In Nickles v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 74 S. C. 102, 54 S. E. 255, the court upheld a charge to the jury that a railway cannot make a binding contract with a free or gratuitous passenger to relieve itself from liability for injuries received by such passenger on account of gross negligence, as against the objection by the railway company that it could make a valid contract which would relieve it of liability for injuries resulting from negligence, gross negligence, and all other acts except such as were wilful or wanton in their nature. In upholding this charge, the supreme court cites a provision of the state Constitution that it shall be unlawful for any railway company to make any contract relieving it

We think that the question of public policy in regard to such contracts of exemption, even as to passengers carried gratuitously, has been settled in this state by legislative enactment. Section 2175 of the Civil Code provides: "A common carrier cannot be exonerated by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or wilful wrong of himself or his servants." Aside from the question of the meaning of the term "gross negligence" as used in this section, it is earnestly contended that the section has no application in the case of one carried without consideration of any kind, and that as to such a passenger the carrier is not a common carrier at all. We are of the opinion that the question of consideration cuts no figure in determining the applicability of the section. Section 2168 of the Civil Code contained in the same chapter, which is entitled "Common Carriers in General," declares that "every one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages, is a common carrier of whatever he thus offers to

of its common-law liability or limiting the same in reference to the carriage of passengers. But whereas the lower court in its charge seemed to regard the pass as gratuitous, the supreme court based its position principally upon the ground that the pass was not a free pass, but issued upon a consideration, it having been exacted from the company by the husband of the person injured, who was an employee of the company, as a condition of his going to the destination named in the pass to testify in an action in which the company was interested. So really this case holds only that a railway company cannot stipulate against liability for injury through gross negligence to a person whom it transports for a consideration.

It is held in Marshall v. Nashville R. & Light Co. 118 Tenn. 254, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1246, 101 S. W. 419, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 672, that wilful, reckless, or wanton neglect is necessary to render a carrier liable for injuries to a person riding upon a gratuitous pass in which he assumes the risk of injury.

In Jacksonville Southeastern R. Co. v. Southworth, 135 Ill. 250, 25 N. E. 1093, it was conceded that under a provision in a pass that the person accepting it assumed all risk of accident, the user could recover only by proving that he received his injury through the gross negligence of the defendant.

The last case was cited with approval in Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Keefe, 63 Ill. App. 102, which was reversed on other grounds in 168 Ill. 115, 39 L.R.A. 148, 61 Am. St. Rep. 68, 48 N. E. 294, the case involving a stipulation in a free pass providing that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, and agreed that the company should not be liable for injury in any circumstances.

And it is held in Wisconsin that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass that the user assumes all risk of accident, and agrees that the company shall not be liable in any circumstances whether of negligence of their agents or otherwise, relieves the company from liability occasioned by the negligence of its servants, unless such negligence amounts to recklessness which is dangerous to human life, or is punishable by law, or inconsistent with good morals. Annas v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 388, 30 N. W. 282. And the court further declared in this case that the carrier cannot stipulate against any negligence of its servants or agents which is expressly made a crime, even though such negligence may not be of that degree which is denominated gross carelessness or recklessness.

On the other hand, the Connecticut court takes the view in Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 53 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115, 4 Atl. 261, that public policy does not forbid a carrier from stipulating in a gratuitous pass that the person accepting it shall assume all the risk, and that the company shall not be liable in any circumstances, whether the accident occurs by the negligence of its agents or otherwise, and that such a stipulation includes gross negligence on the part of the servant, at least where the company is guilty of no actual fault. The court pointed out that this was not a case in which a party had stipulated for exemption from the legal consequences of his own negligence, but only one in which he stipulated against a liability for imputed negligence, when there was no actual fault on its part, or in other words, that, so far as the application to that case was concerned, the stipulation was merely for a waiver of the rule of respondent superior, which was not forbidden by public policy, and that, of course, the waiver of this rule applied as well to gross negligence on the part of the servant, as to the failure to exercise ordinary care. It may be well to note that in this case the person injured was the employee of the railway restaurant keeper, to whom the railway company issued a pass for the purpose of selling provisions on the train, but at the time of the injury, the person using the pass was not engaged in his business, but was riding for private purposes, and the court held that under the circumstances the pass should be regarded as a gratuity.

So, in Holly v. Southern R. Co. 119 Ga. 767, 47 S. E. 188, which upholds a stipula-carry," and, of course, the defendant was under this definition a common carrier of persons. As such, under other provisions of the same chapter and other chapters, it was entitled to refuse to carry any person except upon compliance with certain requirements, including the payment of a prescribed reasonable compensation, but at the time of this accident at least it could legally waive any of these requirements on the part of the passenger, and could receive and carry him for a reduced or different consideration, or altogether without consideration.

But, on whatever terms a common carrier of persons voluntarily receives and carries a person, the relation of common carrier and passenger exists. This is recognized by some of the authorities upholding the exemption from liability for negligence provision in the case of a passenger carried gratuitously. See Rogers v. Kennebec S. B. Co. 86 Me. 261, 25 L.R.A. 491, 29 Atl. 1069. The sole inquiry in this regard is, as has been said, whether the person was lawfully on the vehicle (see Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Muhling, 30 Ill. 9, 81 Am. Dec. 336), has been voluntarily received by the common carrier on any terms for the purpose of carriage, and is not, as was the case in Sessions v. Southern P. Co. 159 Cal. 599, 114 Pac. 982, a mere trespasser on the vehicle.

The voluntary waiver of all claim for compensation for carriage of a person does not take away from the status of the carrier as a common carrier so far as the person carried is concerned, any more than would tion in a gratuitous pass that it issued only on condition that the person accepting it assumes all risk of accident, and expressly agrees that the company shall not be liable under any circumstances, the stipulation is apparently regarded as relieving the company from liability even for gross negligence, for the court says that if, as has been held by other Georgia cases, a railroad company, acting in its public capacity as a common carrier, may, by special contract, relieve itself from liability for any but gross negligence, it may, as a consideration for doing something which it is under no obligation to do, and in the performance of which it would in no circumstances be liable for anything less than gross negligence, require that it shall in the event of loss or damage be held liable under no circumstances whatever.

In some jurisdictions the courts are inclined to deny that there is any distinction between "ordinary" and "gross" negligence, at least so far as the delinquency of the carrier's servant is concerned.

This distinction has been repudiated in England. Thus, it is to be observed that in McCawley v. Furness R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 57; 42 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 4, 27 L. T. N. S. 485, 21 Week. Rep. 140, 4 Moak, Eng. Rep. 218, involving a drover's pass, it was held that a provision that the recipient should travel at his own risk included all negligence for which the railroad company would be liable in the absence of a stipulation, it being said that negligence, even gross, was the very thing which the contract stipulated that the company should not be liable for. It was added that wilful negligence, whatever that might mean, could not carry the case any further, especially since the company would not be liable for a wilful act of commission by a servant, though it would be liable for his gross negligence, meaning doubtless in the absence of a stipulation.

Some of the American cases which look askance at this distinction uphold the stipulations in the passes, and therefore inferentially, at least, lean toward the position that the stipulation relieves the carrier from all negligence of servants.

Thus, in Wells v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 181, the court said that the terms "negligence," "ordinary negligence," and "gross negligence" had their origin in the rules of law as fixed in regard to bailments generally, and not in regard merely to the duty of common carriers, since they were held responsible for any and every degree of negligence. It was stated that a naked depositary without reward was responsible only for gross negligence, and that gross negligence in that use of the terms was considered as evidence of fraud. So, the court goes on to argue that the term "gross negligence" as used in the law has a technical meaning which is not properly applicable to those acts of servants of a corporation for which the corporation is responsible, though, as between their acts which are slightly negligent and those which are very negligent, there is no different rule of responsibility, and that it is the fact of negligence (mere negligence), and not its degree, which incurs the liability. In short, the view of the court is that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass, relieving a carrier from liability for injuries occasioned by the negligence of its servants, has reference to all negligence of servants, and that gross negligence means some delinquency of the master. Whether the stipulation against liability for negligence embraces gross negligence, as the term is thus used, is not decided. Perkins v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 196, 82 Am. Dec. 281, which also upholds a similar provision relieving the railroad company from liability for injuries through the negligence of its servants, holds that the term "negligence" is used in its generic sense, and that it embraces all negligence of employees. The court evidently takes a different view as to what the terms "ordinary negligence" and "gross negligence" as applied to this situation really mean, than that expressed in the Wells Case, for it is declared in the Perkins Case that the term "negligence" in the provision in the stipulation embraces gross negligence a special reduction in the amount of compensation charged, or a special concession as to some other authorized requirement, accomplish such effect. The carrier is still a common carrier as to such person, with all the obligations of a common carrier, except in so far as those obligations are limited by contract provisions which are not inhibited by law. Other sections of our Civil Code permit such limitations as to certain matters not here involved, but § 2175 expressly prohibits limitations of liability for gross negligence on the part of the common carrier or his servants, whatever, as we read the various sections bearing upon this matter, may be the terms upon which it receives and undertakes to carry a passenger.

This brings us to a consideration of the question of the meaning of the term "gross negligence," as used in § 2175 of the Civil Code, for under the views already stated the exemption provision in the pass of deceased was not effectual to free defendant from liability for damages resulting from "gross negligence" of the defendant or its servants, within the meaning of the term "gross negligence" as used in said section. The contention of learned counsel for defendant is that these words, in the connection in which they are used, imply something in the nature of wilful wrong, and do not include anything in the nature of a mere omission to exercise care, without knowledge that such omission will probably result in injury to others. Section 2175 was, as it now stands, a part of the original Civil Code adopted in the year as well as inferior negligence, the court assuming the propriety of making such a distinction, which at a later point in the decision is denied, the court saying that where negligence, as in this case, is expressly mentioned and stipulated against in the contract, no exemption can be made to the force and effect of the contract, based upon a distinction in the degrees of negligence. "The difficulty of defining gross negligence," says the court, "and the intrinsic uncertainty pertaining to the question as one of law, and the other impracticability of establishing any precise rule on the subject, renders it unsafe to base any legal decision on distinction of the degrees of negligence. Certainly before cases are made to turn by the verdict of juries, upon any such distinction, the judges should be able to define, with some precision, what they mean by gross negligence, slight negligence, and ordinary negligence." It should be noted that the court was discussing the negligence of servants, and it therefore, like the Wells Case, leaves open the question whether the stipulation would relieve the company from liability for its own negligence as distinguished from that of its servant.

In Kinney v. Central R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 265, affirming 32 N. J. L. 407, 90 Am. Dec. 675, it is said that the case was not burdened with any consideration of degrees of negligence, inasmuch as the jury found negligence upon the part of the servants of the company, as distinguished from that of the company itself, and that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the negligence of the servants must be presumed to be ordinary negligence; but nevertheless the court took occasion to express its doubt whether the matter of degrees of negligence was important in its legal effect, except so far as it might be evidence of bad faith. The holding of this case, as elsewhere shown, is that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass by which the recipient assumed the risk of accident, and agreed that the company should not be liable in any circumstances, whether by reason of the negligence of its servants or otherwise, was valid and binding, at least so far as concerned the ordinary negligence of servants. As shown by a quotation from the opinion of the lower court in this case in 32 N. J. L. 407, 90 Am. Dec. 675, set out infra, II. b, that court goes more fully into the discussion, and sees a possible distinction, so far as this question is concerned, between negligence of the company proper and negligence of its servants.

In Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 365, 5 L.R.A. 846, 23 N. E. 205, the court called attention to the fact that in some cases it has been held that while a carrier cannot limit his liability for gross negligence, which is said to have been defined as the carrier's own personal negligence, he can contract for exemption from liability for the negligence of his servants; but a doubt is expressed whether any such distinction in degrees of negligence in respect of the right of a carrier to exempt himself could be profitably made or employed. And again, in this case as in others, the court is careful to point out that the injury complained of occurred through the negligence of servants, and not through any failure on the part of the corporation to prescribe proper rules or to furnish proper appliances for the conduct of its business.

In a similar manner, other cases which also repudiate the distinction, but deny that the stipulation against liability is binding are to be regarded as actually or essentially supporting the position that the carrier cannot stipulate against liability for negligence of any kind or degree.

Thus, in Bryan v. Missouri P. R. Co. 32 Mo. App. 228, in which the court apparently deemed a free pass providing that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, as broad enough, if valid, to embrace negligence, the court held that it was against public policy for a carrier so to limit its liability for negligence even in the case of a free passenger, and said that whatever might be the rulings in other jurisdictions, it was settled in Missouri that any negligence of a carrier in respect of the transportation of a passenger was gross negligence, or in other words, that there were 1872. This Code contained two sections declaring that there are three degrees of care and diligence, "slight," "ordinary," and "great," and three degrees of negligence, "slight," "ordinary," and "gross." "Slight care" was defined as that "which is such as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of slight importance," and "gross negligence" was defined as that "which consists in the want of slight care and diligence." Sections 16 and 17. These sections were repealed outright in 1874, but such repeal cannot affect the question of the construction of the words "gross negligence" in § 2175 of the Civil Code, as it is the intention of the legislature at the time of the adoption of the latter section that must control.

We see no warrant for holding that the term "gross negligence" as used therein was intended to mean other than the "gross negligence" defined in § 17 of the same act "to Establish a Civil Code," which was simply "the want of slight care and diligence." This must necessarily have been the view of this court in Donlon Bros. v. Southern P. Co. 151 Cal. 763, 766, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 811, 91 Pac. 603, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1118, for an examination of the record shows that there could have been no other ground for the expression of opinion "that there was sufficient evidence in the case warranting the jury in finding that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence occasioning the loss and injury complained of." It was also recognized in Merrill v. Pacific Transfer no degrees of negligence where the passenger was without fault.

And in Pennsylvania Co. v. Purvis, 128 Ill. App. 367, the court inclines to the view that no distinction should be made between gross and ordinary negligence, stating that in every case the negligence, however it be denominated, is failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands, and is more accurately called mere negligence; and in respect of a stipulation in a free pass providing that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, which was evidently regarded by the court as intended to relieve the company from liability for negligence, the court stated clearly, although in general terms, that a railroad company cannot by contract exempt itself from liability for negligence; and little, if any, stress is laid upon the fact that the plaintiff was transported upon a free pass. But these general statements lose some of their force by reason of the fact that the real ground of the decision was that the recipient of the pass was an infant, who was therefore entitled to disaffirm the contract.

In Rogers v. Kennebec S. B. Co. 86 Me. 261, 25 L.R.A. 491, 29 Atl. 1069, holding that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass, that the recipient will assume all risk of personal injury, is effectual to exonerate the carrier from liability for the negligence of his servant, it was stated that the negligence of the carrier in the case could not reasonably be claimed to be gross, and that therefore the court had no occasion to draw distinction between the degrees of negligence, even if such a distinction is deemed legal and practicable in any case.

b. Carrier's and servant's negligence distinguished.

In this connection, see also Wells v. New York C. R. Co.; Perkins v. New York C. R. Co.; and Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co.,—supra, II. a.

In Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Grant, 86 Miss. 565, 109 Am. St. Rep. 723, 38 So. 502, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 556, the court indicated its opinion, that a provision in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a free-trip pass issued to an employee, that the recipient agreed not to hold the company liable for injuries under any circumstances, did not relieve the carrier from liability for injuries arising in consequence of its own negligence,—by citing, and following without discussion, the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Crudup, 63 Miss. 302, as holding that a release of the carrier from liability for negligence of its servants will not affect its liability for damages arising in consequence of its own negligence, and as basing its decision upon the ground of a want of consideration for the waiver of the damages, and the violation of public policy. It should be noted, however, that the latter case involved a pass issued to a mail clerk, and therefore does not come within the scope of this note.

In Kinney v. Central R. Co. 32 N. J. L. 407, 90 Am. Dec. 675, which is affirmed in 34 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 265, and holds that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass by which the recipient assumes all risk of accident, and agrees that the company shall not be liable in any circumstances, whether by reason of the negligence of the company's servants or otherwise, is valid and binding, at least so far as concerns negligence of employees, the court indicates the possibility of a distinction between negligence of the company and that of its servants, in the following language: "Nor does the objection that this contract is not consistent with good morals or sound policy appear to me of much weight. This consideration was urged on the argument in rather a wider form than the facts will warrant, for the proposition was that it is pernicious and immoral to allow a person to contract for a discharge from the effects of his own negligence. But the question to be decided is narrower, the case showing merely the presence of negligence in the servants of the defendants, but none whatever in the defendants themselves. Consequently, we have to do simply with the more limited proposition. Does the law prevent a person, in a matter not connected with any public employment, to stipulate for an immunity from the results of the

Co. 131 Cal. 582, 589, 63 Pac. 915, upon evidence that was utterly destitute of anything in the nature of a showing of wilful or wanton wrong, that the question whether or not the common carrier was guilty of gross negligence was one for the jury to pass upon under proper instructions. But regardless of these expressions of opinion, both of which were made under such circumstances that they may reasonably be claimed not to constitute binding authority on the question, we are satisfied that the definition of the "gross negligence" of § 2175 of the Civil Code must be found in §§ 16 and 17 of the Civil Code, as the same were adopted in 1872.

Accepting this definition of gross negligence, it cannot reasonably be contended that the evidence was not legally sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the deceased was killed by the gross negligence of defendant's servants. The question of the existence of such gross negligence was one for the trial court, and, the facts being legally sufficient to warrant the inference drawn, an appellate court cannot properly disturb the conclusion reached by that tribunal.

omissions or oversights of his own agents. Now I think it will be plain to anyone who will survey this ground, that there is nothing in natural justice which would hold the master responsible for the negligence of his servant. With relation to the moral code, a man performs, in this particular, his whole duty when he exercises proper prudence and care in the selection of competent agents to conduct his affairs. The rule of respondere superior is one of great severity, and has been adopted, not from its intrinsic equity, but from its general convenience. It subsists, incontestably, as an established legal technicality. Can it not be waived, and another rule adopted on any special occasion, between party and party? I confess to an entire inability to comprehend the force of the objections to this being done. The fallibility of all human agency is an imperfection not to be eliminated from any transaction dependent on the employment of such means. In the absence of an express contract, the law, in order to lay down a fixed rule, throws the liability on him who employed the agent; but what, in the nature of the transaction, is there, which should prevent any party contracting with such principal to take on himself the risk of the servant's misconduct. It was suggested that the tendency of any exemption of the principal would be to remove from common carriers one of their motives to exercise care in their business; but the two-fold answer is, first, that the present discussion does not, as has been already shown, relate to the contract of a common carrier; nor, second, does it involve any consideration of the misconduct of the principal. The whole question being whether the master may not avoid the consequences, not of his own, but of his servant's, omissions. The contract before us, so far as its terms are at present involved, did not contemplate the introduction into the affair of any element of danger which was not necessarily inherent in it,—that is, the fallibility of human conduct, over which the carrier had no control. The transaction is virtually this: The carrier says to the passenger, 'I have employed careful and skilful men to manage my locomotive and cars; but they are human, and they may fail in their duty, to your danger.' The passenger says: 'In consideration of a free passage, I will run that risk.' The bargain is struck on these grounds, and I am clear that it would be a great refinement to impeach it as being prejudicial to public interests."

But in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 640, involving a pass providing that free passengers assume all risk of accident to their persons and property, and invoking the principle that a carrier cannot so contract as to relieve itself from liability for injuries from its negligence or that of its servants in the course of their employment, the court declares that the distinction made in the New York and New Jersey cases, between negligence of the corporation and negligence of employees, has no solid foundation in reason or public policy, and argues that since, in the nature of things, every corporation must act solely through agents, and since, therefore, the negligence of the agent as to matters within the scope of his employment is the negligence of the corporation itself, it should make no difference in so far as duties and liabilities to persons transported is concerned, whether such person was transported free or for a consideration.

In Duncan v. Maine C. R. Co. 113 Fed. 508, holding that one cannot recover for injuries received while riding on a free pass issued to him upon the condition that he assume all risk of accident, and that the railway company should not be liable under any circumstances whether by negligence of its servants or otherwise, where he assented to such conditions, and the injury was due to the negligence of the railway company's servants, the court refused to state its opinion as to whether the condition would have covered negligence of the railroad company as distinguished from that of its servants.

III. Relation and status of parties.

One line of reasoning in the determination of this question involves the inquiry whether the relation of carrier and passengers exists in the transportation of persons

The conclusion we have arrived at upon the points already discussed renders it unnecessary to consider other questions argued in the briefs, and compels an affirmance of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

Beatty, Ch. J., dissenting (June 21, 1911):

I think this case deserves further consideration, not because I am convinced that upon passes containing stipulations against liability for injuries. There are numerous cases which expressly or essentially discuss this matter, and they are about evenly divided on the question.

On the one hand, it is held that the rule forbidding carriers to limit their liability for injuries caused by the negligence of their employees applies as well to free passengers as to passengers for hire. White v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 86 S. W. 962, citing Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, infra, this subdivision.

In a comparatively early Alabama case, it was held against public policy for a carrier to contract for exemption from liability by reason of the negligence of itself or its servants. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Hopkins, 41 Ala. 436, 94 Am. Dec. 607. The court said that it makes no difference whether the service is performed gratuitously or not, in regard to the obligation to perform it well after it is once entered upon, for it has been regarded a sound law that the confidence induced by undertaking any service for another is a sufficient legal consideration to create a duty in the performance of it, and that, in undertaking the performance of gratuitous transportation, the common carrier can no more stipulate for exemption from liability for damage occasioned by the negligence or wilful default or tort of itself or its servants, than he can when he receives a reward for the service, both alike being prohibited by a sound public policy which also forbids a gratuitous bailee, who is not bound by the consideration of public duty attached to the office of a common carrier, to stipulate that he may be fraudulently negligent or safely dishonest.

And in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Pitcock, 82 Ark. 441, 118 Am. St. Rep. 84, 101 S. W. 725, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 582, the court construed a provision in a free pass, that the person transported should assume all risk of accident and damage without claim upon the company, to have been intended to exempt the company from liability for accidents caused by the negligence of its servants or otherwise, and, as so construed, it was held to be against public policy. From the decision it is fairly clear that the court preferred to place its decision expressly upon the ground of the judgment of the superior court is erroneous, but because the decision here is based upon a ground which will include cases affected by considerations different from those which may properly be deemed controlling in this case. It is held in the opinion of the court that, no matter how entirely gratuitous the transportation of a passenger may be, he can never bind himself, in consideration of such transportation, to waive any claim for damages based upon the gross negligence of a common carrier or his servants. It is in my opinion unnecessary to lay down so broad a rule in order to sustain this public policy, rather than upon the ground that such a provision violated a clause of the state Constitution providing that all railroads operated in the state should be responsible for all damages to persons and property under such regulations as might be prescribed by the general assembly, and a statute providing that all railroads operated in the state should be responsible for all damages to persons and property done or caused by the running of its trains. In reaching this conclusion, the court disapproved of decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the following language: "We cannot agree with the court and the learned justice who wrote its opinions in Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, and Boering v. Chesapeake Beach R. Co. [see infra, this subdivision], that 'no public policy was violated' by a contract like the one under consideration, and that to so rule but conforms the law 'to that moral sense which justly holds those who accept gratuities and acts of hospitality to perform the conditions on which they are granted.' That view ignores the duty to the public which railroad corporations virtually undertake to perform when they receive their charters. By virtue of these, they have vast privileges of monopoly in transportation, and the absolute right of eminent domain. They owe in turn the duty to exercise ordinary care which, in the case of passengers, is the highest degree of care that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise, consistent with the mode of conveyance and the proper conduct and management of the business, to see that their passengers are furnished safe and comfortable transportation. They cannot escape this duty. They cannot buy immunity from liability for a failure to discharge it by reduced fare or free transportation. The passenger cannot relinquish the rights which the law gives him, in consideration of gratuitous passage. It is not a question of benevolence and hospitality on the part of the carrier in giving, nor the violation of moral obligation on the part of the passenger in receiving, without being bound by the terms of the agreement upon which the gratuity was judgment. The fact that the pass in question here was issued to an employee of the defendant, in accordance with its long-established and well understood practice, would warrant the conclusion that his transportation was not purely gratuitous; for it is reasonable to suppose that the privilege of free transportation to employees would in many, if not in all, instances, affect the terms upon which men would be willing to enter, or to continue in, the service of a railway corporation, and would in the long run result in a considerable pecuniary advantage to the company,—an advantage imposing a corresponding obligation to issue the pass when requested.

In this view the issuance of a free pass to a railway employee rests upon a valuable offered and accepted. The question is one of public duty, which the state as parens patriæ, having due regard for the lives and limbs of all her subjects, will not permit to be relegated to the domain of private contract. The interest which the commonwealth has in the comfort and safety of her citizens, to see that they are protected from injuries resulting through the negligence of the public carrier or his servants, is the same whether such citizen be a gratuitous passenger or a passenger for hire."

And in Rose v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. 39 Iowa, 246, it is held that a carrier cannot stipulate against liability for injuries, at least where they are caused by gross negligence, and the statute provides that every railroad company shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person in consequence of any neglect of the agents or other employees of the corporation, to a person sustaining such damage, "all contracts to the contrary notwithstanding." While the court does not expressly discuss the applicability of this statute to persons riding on free passes, the result indicated was nevertheless attained, although in a roundabout way. In the first place, it was contended that inasmuch as the statute provided that the company should be liable for all damages sustained by any person, "including employees of the company," it must be deemed to have been intended to place employees on the same basis as persons who were not employees of the company, and to protect employees from the effect of contracts exacted of them when they entered the employment. But the court held that passengers were entitled to the protection of the statute as well as employees; and it was declared that even if this were not so, the same result was demanded under another statute providing that in the transportation of persons by any railroad company, no contract should exempt the railroad from the full liabilities of a common carrier which would exist in the absence of contract. Then the railroad company made the point that the relation of carrier and passenger did not exist, but the court held that the payment of fare consideration. But there are many other classes of persons, as for example sick, destitute, or homeless, but deserving, persons, to whom railway companies and other common carriers are permitted to issue free passes, and for whom they do provide transportation for no consideration except the promptings of common humanity. Certainly there is no justice or sound policy in a law which sets a premium on inhumanity by warning a person otherwise disposed to extend relief to one in dire need of it, that he can only obey the promptings of compassion at the risk of serious pecuniary loss. But that is what our law of common carriers does if it has been correctly construed in the broad declaration that "on whatever terms a common carrier of persons voluntarily receives was not essential to create that relation, and that, as a matter of fact, such relation did exist. In support of this position the court cited Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502, holding that one who was injured while riding on a passenger train, through the negligence of the railway company's servant, was entitled to recover notwithstanding the plaintiff was a stockholder in the company, riding by invitation of the president, paying no fare, and not in the usual passenger car. The case cited did not involve any stipulation against negligence, but was cited merely in support of the proposition that the payment of fare is not necessary to the relation of carrier and passenger; but it cannot fairly be said that this position was taken by the United States Supreme Court, for it declared in that case that the liability of the defendant for the negligent and injurious act of its servant was not necessarily founded on a contract or privity between the parties, nor affected by any relation, social or otherwise, which they bore to each other, and that, on the other hand, the maxim of respondent superior, which makes the master liable for the act of his servant, applies entirely irrespective of contract, express or implied, or any other relation between the party injured and the master. And when the fact, as elsewhere shown in this note, is noted that the United States Supreme Court in a later case (Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, infra, this subdivision) declared that where the recipient of a gratuitous pass assents to the conditions therein described, the relation of carrier and passenger does not exist, the defection in Rose v. Des Moines Valley R. Co. is sufficient to warrant the statement that the question is still an open one in Iowa so far as that case is concerned.

In Jacobus v. St. Paul & C. R. Co. 20 Minn. 125, Gil. 110, 18 Am. Rep. 360, the court, in holding that a stipulation in a free pass, relieving the railroad company from liability for injuries through negligence or otherwise, does not protect the railroad company in case of gross negligence, points out in effect that since, in and carries a person, the relation of common carrier and passenger exists." This proposition is only partly true, and the particular in which it falls short of the truth is precisely that element in the ordinary relation of carrier and passenger which takes the case of purely gratuitous transportation out of the operation of § 2175 of the Civil Code. The definition of common carrier found in § 2168 of the Civil Code comes no nearer defining the relation of carrier and passenger than the definition of lawyer would to defining the relation of attorney and client. What the true relation is in either case is to be gathered from those provisions of the statute which prescribe the mutual rights and duties of the parties. It is the duty of a common carrier to provide transportation for passengers, and the right of the passenger to be transported, but only on condition that the passenger pays the regular fare. Civil Code, §§ 2168-2173. If the person desiring transportation cannot pay, and stands in no relation to the carrier which gives him a right to demand free transportation, the carrier owes him no duty, and in granting him free transportation as a mere bounty, he steps out of his character as a common carrier, and deals with him in a relation essentially different from the legal relation of common carrier and passenger. If, in such case, the carrier requires a waiver of claims for damage, it is absurd to suppose that he is craftily bargaining for exemption from any claim based upon his wilful torts or meditated fraud.

the absence of stipulation, a carrier owes the same duty to a gratuitous passenger as to a passenger for hire, the rule forbidding the company to exempt itself from liability for negligence should likewise apply to free passengers as well as passengers for hire.

And following the Jacobus Case, the court in Bryan v. Missouri P. R. Co. 32 Mo. App. 228, holds that, notwithstanding a provision in a free pass that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, the relation of carrier and passenger existed.

In Camden & A. R. Co. v. Bausch, 4 Sadler (Pa.) 518, 7 Atl. 731, which in the circumstances is controlled by the laws of New Jersey, and holds that a railroad company cannot stipulate against liability for injury to one whom it transports on a pass issued under a contract in connection with the maintenance, by the recipient of the pass, of a pleasure resort on the line of the railway company, since the pass, in such circumstances, is founded on a valid consideration,—the court takes occasion to say that in the circumstances of the case the stipulation would not relieve the railroad company from liability for negligence in Pennsylvania, even though the pass used was free in its fullest sense; and cites Buffalo, P. & W. R. Co. v. O'Hara, 3 Pennyp. 190, as holding that a stipulation in a pass providing that the recipient assume all risk of accident would not relieve a railway company from liability from negligence in Pennsylvania, though the pass was free in its fullest sense. As a matter of fact, the lower court in the O'Hara Case did instruct the jury that such a provision did not exempt the defendant from liability for injuries sustained in consequence of negligence of the defendant's servants, and the jury were also told, in respect of the fact that the recipient of the pass was the wife of an employee, that she herself was not an employee, but a passenger. In affirming the lower court, the supreme court used the following language, which is the entire opinion: "A common carrier cannot protect itself by special contract from liability for negligence. Against his extraordinary liability as a common carrier, he may protect himself by such a contract, but not from his liability as a simple bailee. Such is the well-settled law of this commonwealth. It may be well doubted whether the proviso in this pass, being against accidents, can be held applicable to all cases where the injury has resulted from negligence. If the free pass in this case was unlawful, the conductor should not have demanded the regular fare, and his not doing so did not make O'Hara or his wife trespassers, or destroy their rights as passengers." So it is not clear whether this case bases its decision upon the ground that, although the pass may have been invalid, it was too late for the railroad company to object, and that the plaintiff should be regarded as a passenger on a valid pass stipulating against liability for accident, and that the stipulation was void, or at least did not apply to negligence; or that, notwithstanding the invalidity of the pass, the plaintiff was rightfully on the train, and was to be regarded as a passenger, unaffected by any stipulation.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, 65 Tex. 640, involving a free pass providing that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, and holding that a public carrier cannot so contract as to relieve itself from liability for injury to a passenger by reason of its own negligence or that of its servants, it is declared that public policy forbids a railway company to lay down its character as a passenger carrier, which the law, as well as the nature of the employment in which it engages, fixes upon it, and become a mere private carrier. It is argued that while the relation of passenger and carrier is created by contract, express or implied, it does not follow that the extent of liability or responsibility of the carrier is in any respect dependent upon contract. "In reference to matters indifferent to the public," says the court, "parties may contract as they please; but not so in reference to matters in which the public has an interest. For the purpose of regulating such matters, rules have been established by statute or the common law, whereby certain duties have been attached to given

No agreement would shield him from such claims, and, since he could make no profit out of the free transportation of a passenger, a motive for such an elaborate contrivance is hard to imagine. But that he should desire to be exempt from claims based upon the mere forgetfulness, ignorance, or unskilfulness of himself or his servants, is natural and entirely justifiable. To say that a common carrier, merely because he is a common carrier, cannot in such circumstances stipulate as freely for exemption relations and employments. These duties attach as a matter of law, and without regard to the will or wish of the party engaged in the employment, or of the person who transacts business with him in the course thereof; and this is so for the public good. . . . They exist without it, and cannot be dispensed with by it. The violation of such a duty is a tort. The law declares that it is the duty of a public carrier of passengers to use the highest degree of care to insure their safety. Why was not this left to be settled by the contract of the carrier and passenger? Certainly for no other reason than that the employment itself was of such a nature as to make it a matter of public concern."

And it is declared in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Tanner, 100 Va. 379, 41 S. E. 721, that a common carrier is such by virtue of his occupation, and not by reason of his responsibility growing out of his occupation; that when a common carrier undertakes the carriage of a passenger, whether gratuitously or for hire, the contract involves not only their duties and obligations to each other, but such as are imposed upon them by the public policy of the state; that the recipient of a free pass is clothed with every right appertaining to a passenger for hire; and that the carrier, having undertaken to carry the passenger, becomes bound to transport her safely, and cannot escape that duty by contract.

The case of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Collier, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 278, 95 N. W. 472 (involving a free pass) was, so far as the question in this note is concerned, disposed of with the mere statement that it was conceded settled in Nebraska, that a stipulation relieving the road from liability for personal injuries to one whom it transported was void, and the court cites in support of the statement, earlier Nebraska decisions, which, as a matter of fact, involved drovers or passengers in the strict sense, but made no distinction between such cases and the one before the court. In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hambel, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 607, 89 N. W. 643, declaring that in an action against a railroad company for injuries sustained while being transported by it, the company cannot introduce evidence that the person killed was riding upon a free pass by the terms of which he assumed all risk of accident and agreed that the company should not be liable for injuries to his person, the court simply makes a statement to that effect upon the authority of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Collier, supra, which is stated to hold that a statute declaring that every railroad company shall be liable for all damages inflicted upon the person of passengers while being transported over its road, except in cases where the injury done arises from the criminal negligence of the person injured, or where the injury complained of shall be in violation of some express rule or regulation of said road actually brought to his or her notice, prevents any limitation on the liability of a railroad company for a passenger's safety, unless within the exceptions provided in the section. Thus, it seems that the Nebraska court either regards a person being carried gratuitously as a passenger, at least within the meaning of such statute, or else the question of the status of a person being transported free was not raised, for the court makes no distinction between drovers and passengers in the strict sense, on the one hand, and persons being transported gratuitously on the other.

And New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 827 (involving a drover's pass), was followed in Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 102 Fed. 17, holding that the fact that a person riding on a train was being transported on a free pass, by which he assumed all risks of accident whether occurring from negligence or otherwise, did not relieve the company from liability for injury to such person through its negligence. The argument of the court was that the company should not be permitted to contract against its own gross negligence, and that any negligence in the operation of such a dangerous agency as a railroad should be regarded as gross. It should be noted that the pass in this case was gratuitous, and therefore the case is no longer supportable since the decision by the United States Supreme Court in Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, infra, which permits a railroad company to stipulate against liability for negligence where the pass is a gratuity. Of course, there are cases which hold that a stipulation against liability for negligence has no application in a case of gross negligence, but the case of the Farmers' Loan & T. Co. cannot be differentiated on this ground, since the case does not declare that there was gross negligence in the particular circumstances of the case, but said that all negligence in the operation of a train was gross negligence.

In Annas v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 67 Wis. 46, 57 Am. Rep. 388, 30 N. W. 282, holding that a carrier may stipulate against liability for negligence of its servants when such negligence is not gross or made punishable by law, the court, although not expressly saying whether the relation of carrier and passenger exists, declares that a railroad company when carrying a passenger gratuitously is in a condition analogous to that of bailee for the sole benefit of the from claims for damages as any other person, is to ignore the fact that for the sole benefit of the passenger he has waived the rights, and in so doing divested himself pro hac vice of the character of a common carrier.

The decision of the court in my opinion goes too far in putting upon the same plane with employees of a railway company traveling upon passes issued in accordance with its general custom, those who are carried out of simple compassion.

bailor, who is usually held responsible only for gross negligence.

In Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, 192 U. S. 440, 48 L. ed. 513, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 408, the court said: "The railway company was not, as to Adams, a carrier for hire. It waived its right as a common carrier to exact compensation. It offered him the privilege of riding in its coaches without charge, if he would assume the risks of negligence. He was not in the power of the company and obliged to accept its terms. They stood on an equal footing. If he had desired to hold it to its common-law obligations to him as a passenger, he could have paid his fare and compelled the company to receive and carry him. He freely and voluntarily chose to accept the privilege offered, and, having accepted that privilege, cannot repudiate the conditions. It was not a benevolent association, but doing a railroad business for profit, and free passengers are not so many as to induce negligence on its part. So far as the element of contract controls, it was a contract which neither party was bound to enter into, and yet one which each was at liberty to make, and no public policy was violated thereby." To the same effect is Boering v. Chesapeake Beach R. Co. 193 U. S. 442, 48 L. ed. 742, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515.

And it is held in Sutherland v. Great Western R. Co. 7 U. C. C. P. 409, that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass that the acceptor assumed the risk of accident operated to relieve the company from liability for injury to him, at least where the injury was caused by ordinary negligence. Draper, Ch. J., in his opinion, said: "There is no obligation on the defendants to carry passengers free; and if they do so, it cannot be said they incur a greater obligation than the agreement to carry free expressed. I am therefore at a loss to understand the principle upon which it is contended that they are precluded from entering into a special contract with a party from whom they claim and receive no payment, as to the liabilities to him which they will or will not undertake. Admitting that if nothing more appeared than that they carried him free, they might still be liable to recompense him for an injury arising from their negligence, it does not follow that they may not stipulate with him that, in consideration [sic] they gave him a free passage, he shall assume all risks of accident without recourse against them. If he pays, or offers to pay, the usual fare, he has the right to compel them as common carriers to convey him, and to be responsible for any injury he sustains by their default, but he can have no right to be carried free but by agreement, and 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) then they have a right to say on what terms they will agree with him. The argument founded on defendants' liability as common carriers is therefore, I think, completely answered when it is shown that the passenger traveled by virtue of [such] a ticket."

In this connection it was said in Quimby v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 365, 5 L.R.A. 846, 22 N. E. 205; "The definition of a common carrier, which is that of a person or corporation pursuing the public employment of conveying goods or passengers for hire, does not apply under such circumstances. The service which he undertakes to render is one which he is under no obligation to perform, and is outside of his regular duties. In yielding to the solicitation of the passenger, he consents for the time being to put off his public employment, and to do that which it does not impose upon him. The plaintiff was in no way constrained to accept the gratuity of the defendant; it had been yielded to him only on his own solicitation. When he did, there is no rule of public policy, we think, that prevented the carrier from prescribing, as the condition of it, that it should not be compelled, in addition to carrying the passenger gratuitously, to be responsible to him in damages for the negligence of its servants. It is well known that, with all the care that can be exercised in the selection of servants for the management of the various appliances of a railroad train, accidents will sometimes occur from momentary carelessness or inattention. It is hardly reasonable that, beside the gift of free transportation, the carrier should be held responsible for these, when he has made it the condition of his gift that he should not be. Nor, in holding that he need not be, under these circumstances, is any countenance given to the idea that the carrier may contract with a passenger to convey him for a less price on being exonerated from responsibility for the negligence of his servants. In such a case the carrier would still be acting in the public employment exercised by him, and should not escape its responsibilities, or limit the obligations which it imposes upon him."

In reaching the conclusion that a stipulation releasing the carrier from liability for negligent injuries was not against public policy, the court in Payne v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 157 Ind. 616, 56 L.R.A. 472, 62 N. E. 472, said: "If express messengers and Pullman porters, who are on the trains in pursuance of their regular vocations, and whose transportation is paid for, cannot require railroad companies to carry them as a public duty, much less can holders of gratuitous passes. They are creatures of favoritism. They voluntarily separate themselves from the general public. They do not approach the companies as part of the general public, to be carried on the usual terms of service and compensation; and they are certainly under no compulsion to enter into the contract of exemption. The reasons on which is based the rule that public carriers will not be permitted to evade a public duty wholly fail, for railroad companies are under no obligation to transport the general public gratuitously." It should be noted that the court referred to earlier Indiana decisions involving stipulations in drover's passes and the like, but all statements in those cases to the effect that such a stipulation in a free pass was invalid were repudiated in the later decision as unnecessary to the decision of those cases.

In Kinney v. Central R. Co. 32 N. J. L. 407, 40 Am. Dec. 675, which is affirmed in 34 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 265, and holds that a stipulation in a gratuitous pass by which the recipient assumes all risk of accident, and agrees that the company shall not be liable in any circumstances, whether by reason of the negligence of the company's servants or otherwise, is valid and binding, at least so far as concerns negligence on the part of the company's employees, the view is taken that the relation of carrier and passenger does not exist in such circumstance. In this connection the court had this to say: "The question whether a common carrier can or cannot exempt himself by express agreement from the obligation which he takes from the law to conduct his business without negligence cannot have a controlling effect upon the present subject of inquiry. This conclusion is founded in the fact that I do not regard the contract now in controversy as one which the defendants have made in their character of common carriers. I think it plain they must, in this respect, be placed on the footing of gratuitous bailees. Every test which can be applied to the case will show that the defendants on this occasion, in this particular matter, were not common carriers. The deceased did not bargain with them on the basis of any such employment. If he had seen fit, he had a right to deal with them in their general character, but he did not do so. As a member of society, it was his right, upon paying his fare, to require of these defendants to carry him upon the terms which the law imposed upon them; but instead of exacting this right, he solicited a mere benevolence, the discharge of which it would not be reasonable to consider as any part of the business of the carrier. The legal existence of this contract, therefore, cannot be impugned on the ground so often advanced where common carriers are concerned, that it is unwise to permit those public employees to throw off any given part of their common-law liability. The question ventilated must be settled by such rules of law as are applicable to the ordinary class of gratuitous bailees, or of persons rendering an unbought courtesy."

In Washington, it is held that a carrier may properly stipulate in a gratuitous pass that it shall not be liable for injuries to the user of the pass through the negligence of its servants, the court saying that while the duty which the carrier owes to the public and to the individual is to perform the service faithfully without any limiting conditions, and while such conditions, when the imposition of them is attempted, violate an implied duty, and are justly held void, it is difficult to see why public policy should step in, and deny the right of the carrier to limit its chances of loss when an intending passenger proposes that it do something for him which it is not under any conceivable circumstances required by law or duty to do, that is, to carry him without any compensation whatever, and when the whole matter is at the option of either party to agree or not. Muldoon v. Seattle City R. Co. 7 Wash. 528, 22 L.R.A. 794, 38 Am. St. Rep. 901, 35 Pac. 422, subsequent appeal, 10 Wash. 311, 45 Am. St. Rep. 787, 38 Pac. 995.

One case goes a step farther, and holds that the relief from liability for personal injuries through the negligence of servants, secured to a railroad company by the provisions of a free pass, is not affected by the fact that the recipient of the pass had bought a ticket for a drawing-room car in which he was riding when injured. Ulrich v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 80, 2 Am. St. Rep. 369, 15 N. E. 80.

And it is held that the possibility that the presence of police officers on street cars may tend to preserve peace and good order is not sufficient to constitute a valuable consideration for a pass given by the carrier to such officer, so as to render invalid or inapplicable a stipulation by which the recipient of the pass assumed the risk of injury. Marshall v. Nashville R. & Light Co. 118 Tenn. 254, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1246, 101 S. W. 419, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 675. The court declares that in such circumstances the railroad does not occupy the position of a common carrier, but rather that of a mandatary so far as its liability for negligence is concerned.

In this connection it is to be observed that this note is confined to cases involving passes or free transportation in the stricter and more limited sense, and therefore excludes cases involving the right of the carrier to limit its liability to drovers or other persons accompanying freight without extra charge for their transportation, mail clerks, express messengers, news agents, and sleeping-car porters, and the like.

As to contracts exempting a railroad company from liability for negligent injury to sleeping-car employees or others sustaining a similar relation to the company, see the note in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 432.

In a comparatively early case, the United States Supreme Court held that a common carrier of passengers cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from liability for personal injuries caused by the negligence of its servants, where the transportation of the person injured, although not paid for by him in money, was not a matter of charity or gratuity. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Stevens, 95 U. S. 655, 24 L. ed. 535. In this case, the plaintiff was the owner of a patented coupling, and was seeking to have it adopted for use by the defendant company, and he was summoned to visit the headquarters of the company at its expense, and it was for this that the pass was issued. The court treated the case as precisely similar to that of a drover's pass, and held that therefore the plaintiff was a passenger for hire. The case also contains an express declaration of a want of an intent to intimate whether a different conclusion would have been reached, had the plaintiff been a free passenger instead of a passenger for hire. See, as to this, Northern P. R. Co. v. Adams, supra, III. a.

In Camden & A. R. Co. v. Bausch, 4 Sadler (Pa.) 518, 7 Atl. 731, in which a divided court affirmed a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for injuries to one who was riding on a gratuitous pass, notwithstanding a provision thereon that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, the circumstances of the case required that it be decided according to the laws of New Jersey, and the case of Kinney v. Central R. Co. 34 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 265 (see supra, III. a, and II. a), was cited as indicating the law in that state. The Bausch Case said that the New Jersey case was based not so much on the fact that the pass contained the stipulation, as on the fact that the recipient accepted and used the pass as a mere gratuity or accommodation; and that there was nothing to indicate that the stipulation would be regarded as binding by the New Jersey law if the pass were not a gratuity. One justification for the last statement is found in the fact that the Kinney Case distinguishes Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Pa. 315 (which is cited with approval in the Bausch Case), upon the ground that in that case the passenger was carried on what is called a drovers' pass, which the court held not to be a gratuitous pass, and to create the relation of carrier and passenger. It appeared in the Bausch Case that the pass was issued by the company in connection with the maintenance, by the recipient of the pass, of a pleasure resort on the line of the railway company, and it was held therefore to be founded upon an actual consideration. So, it is stated in the opinion, although as before noted the court is divided, that even by the laws of New Jersey as announced in the Kinney Case, the carrier cannot contract against immunity from liability for injury to one whom it undertakes to transport for a valuable consideration.

In Central Vermont R. Co. v. Franchère, 35 Can. S. C. 68, it is at least intimated that where a life pass is issued in pursuance of a deed granting the recipients the right to free transportation for life in consideration of a sale, they are not gratuitous passengers so as to be precluded from recovering for negligent injury by reason of a provision of the pass that they assume all risk of accident, and agree that the company shall not be liable in any circumstances, whether of negligence of the company's agents or otherwise; that persons to whom the recipients were empowered by the deed to assign the privilege of free transportation would be bound by the condition, since as to them the pass would be gratuitous; and that the persons first named had a right to agree with the company that if it would carry the other persons also free, all of them would agree to make no claim against the company for negligence.

In Dow v. Syracuse, L. & B. R. Co. 81 App. Div. 362, 80 N. Y. Supp. 941, holding that a provision in a pass book releasing the carrier from liability for injuries was not binding, since it was without consideration, and that the acceptance of the book did not indicate an intention to consent to the terms; and intimating that the language of the stipulation that the defendant should be released "from all claims for damages for personal injuries from whatever cause" was not so plain and unequivocal as to embrace injuries caused by negligent acts,—the pass book involved was issued to the plaintiff in consideration of a right of way given to the railway company, and the plaintiff was regarded as an ordinary passenger.

2. Employee's pass.

In this connection, see also Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. and Tingley v. Long Island R. Co. supra, I.; Nickles v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. supra, II. a; Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Grant, supra, II. b.

As to the more general question whether an employee being transported without charge is a passenger, see the note in 31 L.R.A. 321, and also subdivision IV. c, in 50 L.R.A. 417, dealing with the question as to what servants are deemed to be in the same common employment apart from the statutes, where no question as to vice principalship arises.

As to whether an employee of a railroad or street railway is a passenger while being transported to and from work, see the note in 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 717.

It is held in Dugan v. Blue Hill Street R. Co. 193 Mass. 431, 79 N. E. 748, that if the pass is issued to the employee as a gratuity, the clause providing that the holder assume all risk of accident is binding; but that where such a pass is issued to an employee as one of the terms of his employment, it is not binding.

And it is held in Peterson v. Seattle Traction Co. 23 Wash. 615, 53 L.R.A. 586, 63 Pac. 539, 65 Pac. 543, that an employee of a passenger railway company who accepts as a mere gratuity, and not in consideration for his services, a free ticket conditioned that the user shall assume all risk of injury, stands like anyone else traveling on a free pass containing such a condition, notwithstanding the transportation would probably not be bestowed in the absence of the employment; the court saying that under the rule of Muldoon v. Seattle City R. Co. supra, III. a, the plaintiff's transportation constituted a portion of the consideration for his services, he became a passenger for hire just the same as anyone else who gives a consideration, but that, if the consideration for his services was independent of his transportation, and the carriage was a mere gratuity, the condition was binding.

In Harris v. Puget Sound Electric R. Co. 52 Wash. 289, 100 Pac. 838, it is held, by the application of the rule of the last case, that where the transportation of an employee is not a gratuity, but constitutes a part consideration for his services, he is a passenger for hire, and entitled to protection as such, which public policy does not permit him to waive.

It was held in Williams v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 18 Utah, 210, 72 Am. St. Rep. 777, 54 Pac. 991, that a pass issued to a person who had been employed to begin work for the company at the place named as the destination was not a matter of charity or gratuity, but was issued upon a good and sufficient consideration, and that therefore a stipulation on the back of the pass that the recipient assumed all risk of accident, and agreed that the railroad should not be regarded as a common carrier nor liable to him for injury whether caused by the negligence of the company's agents or otherwise, could not be introduced into evidence by the railroad company for the purpose of escaping liability for injury to the person so transported. While this is the precise ground of the decision, the court goes on to indicate its belief that even if the ticket had been a gratuitous pass with the conditions printed thereon, still the defendant could not escape liability for negligent injury.

And expressly refusing to decide whether a carrier of passengers may lawfully contract that it shall not be liable for the negligent injury of a passenger carried gratuitously, the court in Eberts v. Detroit, Mt. C. & M. C. R. Co. 151 Mich. 260, 115 N. W. 43, held that where an employee of a railroad company in a town in which he resided was ordered to work in another town at the same wages, and was given a pass book which enabled him to ride upon the defendant's railway between his home and the place of work, it was to be inferred that the pass book was a part of the consideration for the plaintiff's services, and that therefore a stipulation exempting the company from liability for negligent injuries was not binding.

And it is held that conditions indorsed on an employee's pass, to the effect that he assumes all risks arising from the negligence of agents of the carrier or otherwise while using it, are invalid on grounds of public policy, where he is riding not in the course of his employment, or in going to or from his work, but is making a trip for his own convenience, and the pass is given him not as a gratuity, but in pursuance of an agreement in his contract of employment that he shall have such free transportation, and is therefore based on a valuable consideration. Whitney v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 50 L.R.A. 615, 43 C. C. A. 19, 102 Fed. 850. In this case the court followed the decision in New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, involving a drover's pass.

The case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, set out supra, III. a, and II. b, was referred to, and followed without discussion as holding that the provision in a pass that the person accepting it assumes all risk of accident was against public policy, in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Flood, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 70 S. W. 331, which was followed on subsequent appeal without discussion in 35 Tex. Civ. App. 197, 79 S. W. 1106. The impression is to be gathered from the Flood Case that the pass was an employee's pass, but no particular reference is made to this fact in either opinion.

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Bean, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 52, 99 S. W. 721, holding void a stipulation in a pass that the company should not be liable under any circumstances for injuries, whether by negligence of its agents or otherwise, the court follows Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGown, set out in subdivisions III. a, and II. b, and Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Flood, supra, this subdivision, without discussion further than to say that the fact that the pass was issued to the plaintiff by reason of services which he rendered the company as a state ranger was unimportant.

In Buffalo, P. & W. R. Co. v. O'Hara, supra, III. a, the recipient of the pass was, without any discussion of the matter, treated as a passenger, while the pass, which was issued to the wife of an employee, was apparently regarded as gratuitous, and was referred to in Camden & A. R. Co. v. Bausch, 4 Sadler (Pa.) 518, 7 Atl. 731, as free in its fullest sense.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

FLORENCIO SALAS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PEOPLE OF STATE OF COLORADO.

(— Colo.—, 118 Pac. 992.)

Evidence — res gestæ — recital of past events.

1. Statements by one injured in a quarrel, made some hours after the injuries were received and purporting to detail what occurred, are not admissible as res gestæ in a prosecution of the one who inflicted the injuries.

Same — dying declaration — impeachment.

2. Evidence of inconsistent statements made by one after receiving a mortal wound is admissible to impeach his dying declaration in a prosecution of one who is alleged to have inflicted the wound, although no foundation has been laid for it.

(Garrigues, J., dissents.)

(November 6, 1911.)

ERROR to the District Court for Bent County to review a judgment convicting defendant of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Admissibility of contradictory statements by declarant to impeach dying declarations.

The earlier cases on the point here annotated may be found in the note to Worthington v. State, 56 L.R.A. 441.

Ordinarily where a witness testifies to a fact it cannot be shown that he has on another occasion made statements inconsistent with his testimony, unless he is at first interrogated as to these statements and allowed to explain them; but when the declarant is dead, as in the case of a dying declaration, this cannot be done. And while there is some little conflict of authority on the question of the admissibility of such evidence, as appears in the earlier note, supra, the great weight of authority is in favor of its admissibility. Parker v. State, 165 Ala. 1, 51 So. 260; State v. Uzzo, 6 Penn. (Del.) 212, 65 Atl. 775; Pyle v. State, 4 Ga. App. 811, 62 S. E. 540; State v. Fuller, 52 Or. 42, 96 Pac. 456; State v. Mayo, 42 Wash. 540, 85 Pac. 251, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 881. And there is a dictum to this effect in Coyle v. Com. 122 Ky. 781, 93 S. W. 584.

Nor is it essential that such contradictory statements shall have been themselves dying declarations (Gregory v. State, 140 Ala. 16, 37 So. 259; State v. Charles, 111 La. 933, 36 So. 20); or part of the res gestæ (State v. Charles, supra).

The admission of a dying declaration is an exception to the general rule of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. H. L. Lubers and C. E. Sydnor, for plaintiff in error:

The testimony offered and tendered was admissible either as a part of the res gestæ, or as a statement contradicting and impeaching the dying declaration.

evidence, and, where the declarant has made other statements inconsistent with the dying declaration, this fact may be shown the jury, for it may enable them to put a juster estimate upon the proof before them. We therefore conclude that where a dying declaration is admitted in evidence, other statements of the declarant inconsistent with the declaration may be shown to impeach it. The deceased may have intended on both occasions to state the truth, and when all his statements are put together, the jury may better judge what he really meant by the dying declaration introduced on behalf of the commonwealth. Allen v. Com. 134 Ky. 110, 119 S. W. 795, 20 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 884, wherein the court seemed to think that the fact that the persons testifying to the dying declaration were relatives of the deceased accentuated the justness of the rule admitting the inconsistent statements.

In Pyle v. State, 4 Ga. App. 811, 62 S. E. 540, it was said: "The rule is general that a witness may be impeached by proof that he has made statements contrary to what he has testified. It is true there is a condition to the application of this rule, which requires that the attention of the witness be previously called to the particular occasion and circumstances under which the supposed contradictory statements were made, in order to give him an opportunity of making any explanation of the matter which he may have. This preliminary condition cannot be complied with where the contradictory statements offered are for the purpose of discrediting the testimony as to a dying declaration." After observing that the dying declarations of the deceased are admitted in evidence, ex parte, in the interest of public justice, the court asks why statements, made by the deceased, to other persons and at other times, that are contradictory of the dying declarations, should not also be admissible in favor of life and liberty, and says: "If, in the one case, the witness who is to be impeached cannot be given an opportunity to explain, in the other case neither can the accused have the benefit of the invaluable privilege of cross-examination, and the deprivation of the latter right probably works greater injustice than the deprivation of the former; for while the loss of the one may destroy the character of the witness for veracity, the loss of the other may, in many instances, deprive the accused of his life or liberty. That public justice which treats every man alike, the living as well as the dead, and which has as much concern for the protection of the innocent as it has for the punishment of the guilty, demands that where proof of a dying declaration has been allowed against the accused, proof of a contradictory statement made by the declarant should be allowed in his favor. There can be no justice, therefore, in any rule which would deprive the accused, under such circumstances, of the right to impeach the credit of the deceased by proof of his having made contradictory statements as to the homicide and its cause."

In State v. Fleetwood, 6 Penn. (Del.) 153, 65 Atl. 772, where the counsel for the defendant proposed to prove that the deceased had made statements to other witnesses which were contradictory of her dying declarations, the attorney general conceded the point, and the evidence was introduced without further discussion.

A statute prescribing the manner of laying a foundation to discredit the testimony of a witness can have no application to dying declarations, for no opportunity is afforded the party accused of the commission of a homicide to interrogate the deceased in respect to such controversial narratives. State v. Fuller, 52 Or. 42, 96 Pac. 456.

In People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794, the defendant's counsel, in cross-examining one of the witnesses who testified to what occurred at the bedside of the deceased, asked him in relation to some previous statements made at the time when the deceased was first discovered in his wounded condition,—statements which it is claimed would have contradicted or qualified the accusations he made in defendant's presence. Objections to these questions were interposed upon the ground, among others, that it was not proper cross-examination, and upon this ground the objections were properly sustained. But the court did say: "If the defendant had offered this evidence as part of his own case, to contradict the dying declarations of . . . it would have been clearly admissible, on the authority of People v. Lawrence, 21 Cal. 371 [set out in the earlier note in 56 L.R.A. 441], but the ruling of the court on the offer as made was correct."

Garrigues, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Plaintiff in error, Florencio Salas, was convicted of murder of the first degree for shooting and killing Domingo Balles, and sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. People's evidence shows: That, on July 24, 1909, deceased was floor manager at a dance in Las Animas. Shortly before midnight, Jayo, brother of the defendant, was very abusive and quarrelsome, and started to pick a fight with one Pedro, outside the dance hall. Deceased tried quietly to get him to go home, and in so doing placed his hand on Jayo's shoulder. Defendant said, "No son of a bitch can take my brother," and immediately fired, striking deceased in the abdomen; deceased grabbed the gun. In the struggle which ensued, defendant was overpowered by the assistance of others, and the pistol taken from him. Deceased went back into the hall, and he received medical attention, and stayed there until the next morning written declarations in evidence, he is entitled to prove by parol evidence other declarations made contemporaneously, and not reduced to writing, notwithstanding they may contradict the writing. Hunter v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 439, 129 S. W. 125.

In State v. Hendricks, 172 Mo. 654, 73 S. W. 194, the state, after the defendant had introduced statements of the deceased that were contradictory of his dying declarations, was not permitted to corroborate the dying declarations by showing further conversations of the deceased that were consistent therewith. Mr. Justice Fox said: "If these conversations are admissible as being corroborative, . . . they are just as competent in chief as they are in rebuttal. When once admitted, they have the same force and influence as though they were made under such circumstances as would in fact make them dying declarations."

Rather interesting is McCorquodale v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 344, 98 S. W. 879, where the court recognized the rule that "where dying declarations are admissible in evidence, other statements of deceased contradictory of the dying statements are usually admissible; that is, if they tend to impeach or contradict or depreciate the value of the dying declaration." It was night and the evidence circumstantial as to who fired the fatal shot. The dying declaration of the deceased was to the effect that he looked over his shoulder, and, as the pistol fired, he recognized the defendant as the one who fired it. Other evidence disclosed that a light was shining through a window of the deceased's home on the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

spot where the defendant is supposed to have stood when he fired. But since the deceased had not stated that he recognized the defendant by the light from the window or any other light, it was held that the court committed no error in not permitting a witness for the defendant to testify that the deceased told him he recognized the defendant by the flash of his pistol as it fired.

Where, in Wright v. Com. 109 Va. 847, 65 S. E. 19, the dying declaration of the deceased, that he did not know of any motive on the part of the prisoner for shooting him, except that he was angry because the deceased had refused to rent him a certain piece of land, was held to be admissible, though not conclusive evidence of the fact alleged, it was held competent for the accused to contradict it by showing that he was not informed of the purpose of the deceased with respect to the land, until after the homicide had been committed.

But in South Carolina the rule has always been against the admissibility of contradictory statements by the declarant, to impeach his dying declarations. Thus in State v. Mills, 79 S. C. 187, 60 S. E. 664, it was held that no error was committed, when the court refused to permit the defendant to introduce witnesses whose testimony would show that the deceased made statements to them that were contradictory of his dying declarations. The opinion expressly states that it follows State v. Taylor, 56 S. C. 360, 34 S. E. 939, and State v. Stuckey, 56 S. C. 576, 35 S. E. 263, both of which are fully set out in the note in 56 L.R.A. 441.

ing, when he was taken home, and died about 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 25th.

Defendant's evidence showed that he was a musician, playing for the dance, and going out during the disturbance, found his brother intoxicated, and in a quarrel or fight with Pedro. At deceased's request, he intended to take his brother home, but went back in the hall first, to get a pistol he had secreted there early in the evening. This he put on the inside of his trousers; and while standing by deceased and his brother, deceased put his hand on Jayo's shoulder, and asked him to go home. About this time, the pistol slipped down the inside of the leg of his trousers, and was coming out at the bottom; he reached down and pulled it out, when deceased grabbed it, and in the struggle which ensued over its possession it was accidentally discharged, killing deceased, but that he did not know who did it; in any event, the shot was unintentional.

People introduced, without objection, the dying statement of deceased, in which he said that Jayo and Pedro were fighting outside; that he went out and tried to quiet Jayo, when the defendant said he had something for any son of a bitch who wanted to take his brother, and immediately drew his revolver and shot him; that a scuffle followed over the possession of the weapon.

Defendant offered to prove by witness Taylor that, on the morning of the 25th, witness had a conversation with deceased in the dance hall before he was taken home, in which he said, in the presence of two other witnesses, that Florencio Salas shot him; that there were three or four persons scuffling for the pistol, and during the scuffle it went off, and he was shot. The people objected to this offer, on the ground that it was hearsay. The objection was sustained, and to the ruling error is assigned. Defendant claims the offered testimony was admissible upon two grounds: First, as a part of the res gestæ of the litigated fact; second, that it was a statement, made out of court by the deceased, inconsistent with his dying declaration, and tended to impeach him.

2. The record fails to show the time; also the events transpiring during the interval between the fatal shot and the alleged statement. While these do not determine the competency of a statement, made out of court, offered as a part of the res gestæ, still they should be shown, before the statement is admitted. One offering an oral statement, made out of court, as a part of the res gestæ of a litigated fact, must first prove the things necessary to qualify the statement as evidence; until this is done, it is hearsay, and not res gestæ. The statement itself is no proof that it is a part of the res gestæ. State v. Williams, 108 La. 222, 32 So. 402; Bradberry v. State, 22 Tex. App. 273, 2 S. W. 592; Ford v. State, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 280, 50 S. W. 350; Pool v. Warren County, 123 Ga. 205, 51 S. E. 328; State v. Pugh, 16 Mont. 345, 40 Pac. 861; Territory v. Armijo, 7 N. M. 436, 37 Pac. 1113; Vickery v. State, 50 Fla. 149, 38 So. 907.

3. Instinctive, voluntary, spontaneous words, said under the impulse of an event of which they form a part, are not hearsay. They are incident to or a part of the transaction litigated, and admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestæ; that is, as a part of all the circumstances making up the whole case. In the case at bar, the offered testimony is but a narrative of what had occurred. It and the fatal shooting are distinct, with no connection between them, and the statement is not an incident of the transaction. The court did not err in excluding the statement as a part of the res gestæ. Graves v. People, 18 Colo. 170, 32 Pac. 63; Herren v. People, 28 Colo. 23, 62 Pac. 833; T. & H. Pueblo Bldg. Co. v. Klein, 5 Colo. App. 348, 38 Pac. 608.

4. The people's evidence, without the dying declaration, showed that when deceased put his hand quietly on Jayo's shoulder, and tried to get him to go home, defendant shot him in the abdomen; that deceased grabbed the gun after he was shot, and there was a struggle over the weapon. Deceased's dying declaration is that when he placed his hand on Jayo's shoulder, defendant, with an ugly remark, instantly shot him, and that the scuffle for the possession of the weapon was after the shooting. Defendant testified that, when he took the pistol from the bottom of his trouser's leg, the deceased grabbed it, and during the struggle it was unintentionally discharged, striking the deceased. There is a sharp conflict in the evidence whether deceased was shot before the struggle over the gun, or whether it was unintentionally discharged by someone during the struggle. The offered testimony was that the deceased, in the dance hall, after the shooting, before he was taken home, and before his dying declaration, in a conversation with witness Taylor, said that there were three or four persons scuffling for the possession of the revolver, and during the scuffle it went off and shot him. This offered testimony is in conflict with and tends to impeach the dying declaration of the deceased. The district attorney objected to it, upon the ground that it was hearsay, and that the proper foundation had not been laid, and the objection was sustained. In this ruling, the majority of the court are of the opinion that the district court committed reversible error. It was competent for the defendant to introduce evidence tending to show that the deceased had made statements out of court, after he received the mortal wound, inconsistent with his dying declaration. That a dying declaration may be impeached, by showing that the person making it has made other statements inconsistent therewith, is held by the great weight of authority. McPherson v. State, 9 Yerg. 279; People v. Lawrence, 21 Cal. 368; Carver v. United States, 164 U. S. 694, 41 L. ed. 602, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228; State v. Blackburn, 80 N. C. 474; Battle v. State, 74 Ga. 101; Morelock v. State, 90 Tenn. 528, 18 S. W. 258; Green v. State, 154 Ind. 655, 57 N. E. 637; State v. Mayo, 42 Wash. 540, 85 Pac. 251, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 881; Hurd v. People, 25 Mich. 405; State v. Shaffer, 23 Or. 555, 32 Pac. 545; Com. v. Silcox, 161 Pa. 484, 29 Atl. 105; McCorquodale v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 344, 98 S. W. 879; Dunn v. People, 172 Ill. 582, 50 N. E. 137, 11 Am. Crim. Rep. 447; Wigmore, Ev. §§ 1033, 1446. Such is the opinion of this court upon the admissibility of oral statements, made out of court by a deceased person, contradicting or impeaching a dying declaration. The writer of this opinion, however, does not agree with the opinion of the court on this point, and I will now give my reasons for dissenting.

5. The law is thoroughly established that evidence cannot be introduced, showing that a witness, at some other time, when not under oath, made statements out of court inconsistent with his testimony, without first laying the foundation by calling the witness's attention, when on the stand, to the time and place and circumstances surrounding the making of the alleged statements, and affording an opportunity to contradict or explain the statements on re-examination of the witness. Such evidence is purely hearsay. Its admission is an exception to the general rule excluding hearsay evidence, and before it can be admitted under the exception the proper foundation, above stated, must be laid. Nutter v. O'Donnell, 6 Colo. 253; Rose v. Otis, 18 Colo. 59, 31 Pac. 493; Ryan v. People, 21 Colo. 119, 40 Pac. 775; Mullen v. McKim, 22 Colo. 468, 45 Pac. 416; Teller v. Ferguson, 24 Colo. 432, 51 Pac. 429; Jaynes v. People, 44 Colo. 535, 99 Pac. 325, 16 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 787; Michigan F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Wich, 8 Colo. App. 409, 46 Pac. 687. The majority opinion does not dispute this principle, but holds, in a dying declaration, there is an exception to it, because death has made it impossible to lay the foundation. I think the law, as well as substantial justice, does not and should not recognize such an exception; in other words, there is no such exception recognized by the best line of adjudicated cases. The death of the witness does not dispense with the general rule in such cases, requiring the foundation to be properly laid. Mattox v. United States, 156 U. S. 237, 39 L. ed. 409, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337; Ryan v. People, 21 Colo. 119, 40 Pac. 775; Stacy v. Graham, 14 N. Y. 492; Runyan v. Price, 15 Ohio St. 1, 86 Am. Dec. 459; Wroe v. State, 20 Ohio St. 460; State v. Taylor, 56 S. C. 360, 34 S. E. 939; Craft v. Com. 81 Ky. 250, 50 Am. Rep. 160. It necessarily follows, if there is no such exception, that such statements, not made under oath, or in extremis, are purely hearsay, and not admissible to impeach a dying declaration.

In the Mattox Case, 156 U. S. 237, 39 L. ed. 409, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337, defendant was convicted of murder. On the first trial, a witness by the name of Whitman testified for the government, claiming to be an eyewitness to the shooting. At the second trial, he having died in the meantime, a transcribed copy of the stenographic notes of his testimony was read by the government to the jury. For the purpose of impeaching this evidence, defendant offered to show that after the first trial Whitman said his testimony was false; that he did not witness the shooting, and told why he testified falsely. The district attorney objected to this offered testimony, because the proper foundation had not been laid, and an opportunity to explain or contradict it had been cut off by the death of Whitman. The objection was sustained, and error assigned thereon. After the case had been submitted, counsel were allowed to file further briefs upon the question of the admissibility of this offered evidence, and the case was resubmitted to the full bench. It was insisted that the rule did not apply, because Whitman was dead, and the alleged contradictory statements were made subsequent to the giving of his testimony at the first trial, and consequently no foundation could be laid. The court held that the authorities recognized no such distinction or exception. The case decides that the fact that a witness cannot be produced, because he is dead, does not dispense with the necessity of laying the proper foundation, before his evidence can be impeached. The opinion of the court is summed up in this forceful language: "While the enforcement of the rule, in case of the death of the witness subsequent to his examination, may work an occasional hardship by depriving the party of the opportunity of proving the contradictory statements, a relaxation of the rule in such cases would offer a temptation to perjury, and the fabrication of testimony, which, in criminal cases especially, would be almost irresistible. If it were generally understood that the death of a witness opened the door to the opposite party to prove that he had made statements conflicting with his testimony, the history of criminal trials leads one to believe that witnesses would be forthcoming with painful frequency to make the desired proof. The fact that one party has lost the power of contradicting his adversary's witness is really no greater hardship to him than the fact that his adversary has lost the opportunity of recalling his witness and explaining his testimony would be to him. There is quite as much danger of doing injustice to one party by admitting such testimony as to the other by excluding it. The respective advantages, and disadvantages of a relaxation of the rule are so problematical that courts have, with great uniformity, refused to recognize the exception."

In the Ryan Case, 21 Colo. 119, 40 Pac. 775, the people took and read to the jury the deposition of a witness named Dulin. Defendant offered to show that Dulin, since it was taken, made statements out of court, contradicting his deposition. The offer was rejected upon the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid. Defendant claimed it was impossible to lay the foundation, because the statement was made after the deposition was taken. We then said that the law recognized no such exception, and that the courts with great unanimity declared that a witness could not be so impeached, without first laying the foundation. I quote from the opinion to show that we were then in full harmony with the Mattox Case: "The opinion in Mattox v. United States, supra, contains an able and exhaustive review of the authorities upon the question. The exception there and here claimed was held to have been rightfully denied in that case, although the defendant was upon trial for a capital offense, which trial resulted in his conviction and sentence. We fully concur with the reasoning of the majority of the court in that case, and hold in this case that the evidence of the witnesses Coryell and Masterson, sought to be introduced for the purpose of showing that the witness Dulin had made statements out of court contradicting or differing from his deposition, was properly rejected, as no foundation had been laid for the introduction of such evidence." Ryan v. People, 21 Colo. 126, 40 Pac. 778.

It is difficult to reconcile the Mattox Case with Carver v. United States, 104 U. S. 694, 41 L. ed. 602, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228. The only attempt of the court to do so is by the statement: "That case [Mattox Case], however, was put upon the ground that the witness had once been examined and cross-examined upon a former trial." In the Mattox Case, it should be remembered Whitman was dead when his evidence was read at the second trial. The alleged statements were made after the first trial. He could not have been cross-examined upon them at the first trial, because they had not been made then. If the court in the Carver Case had explained how the defendant in the Mattox Case could, by cross-examination of the witness Whitman on the first trial, lay the foundation for impeaching him on account of contradictory statements by him after the first trial, I might understand how to distinguish the two cases. On the point involved, I think the two cases are practically the same, and cannot be distinguished in principle. We have gone on record in the Ryan Case, upholding the doctrine announced in the Mattox Case, and I do not think we should change the law there announced. I think the language of the supreme court of South Carolina very appropriate: "Counsel for appellant has cited the case of Carver v. United States, supra, in support of his contention that the testimony in question was competent for the purpose of contradicting and impeaching the statements made by the deceased in her dying declarations, and that case does so hold. But it seems to us, that in principle, the case is irreconcilable with the previous case of Mattox v. United States, 156 U. S. 237, 39 L. ed. 409, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337, which, while not a case of an attempt to impeach dying declarations, the whole subject was fully and elaborately considered,—much more so than in the case of Carver. In both of these cases, the court was divided, and we are not prepared to accept either as binding authority upon us, in a case of this character, where no Federal question is involved. On the contrary, it seems to us that the conclusion reached by the Ohio court, in Wroe v. State, 20 Ohio St. 460, is more in accordance with reason than the contrary conclusion. To hold that it is competent to impeach the dying declarations of a deceased person by testimony tending to show that she had made statements in conflict with those contained in her dying declarations, not under the sanction of an oath, nor under the shadow of impending death, would tend not only to afford a strong temptation to the fabrication of false testimony to save the life of the accused when death had rendered it impossible to rebut or explain such statements, but would also tend to absolutely destroy the efficiency of dying declarations as evidence. We do not think, therefore, that such testimony is competent." State v. Taylor, 56 S. C. 368, 34 S. E. 943.

The offered testimony is not a dying declaration, nor a part of the res gestæ. It is a dangerous kind of hearsay, and its admission, when the proper foundation has been laid, is an exception to the rule regarding hearsay evidence. The death of the witness does not create an exception to the exception. To admit it, without a proper foundation, on account of the death of the witness, would deprive the people of the opportunity to deny or explain, without any equivalent for the loss sustained. An exception to a general rule should never be created where it would simply shift the hardship from one party to another. If established, an impeaching witness could, with impunity, swear to any statement whatever, without fear of contradiction. Those with long practical experience in criminal trials know that to recognize such an exception will invite corruption, fraud, perjury, and subornation of perjury in our courts. The cases cited, sustaining the doctrine, present a striking example of the growth of an erroneous principle from the misconception or misapplication of some early case. The two cases universally quoted as foundational cases are McPherson v. State, 9 Yerg. 279, and People v. Lawrence, 21 Cal. 369. Every case and text I have been able to examine, sustaining this doctrine, is either based on these two cases, or on other cases based on them. I think it can be shown that these two cases are no authority for the doctrine, and that the decisions purporting to rest thereon have misconstrued or misapplied them, and are founded on a false basis.

In Morelock v. State, 90 Tenn. 529, 18 S. W. 259, the supreme court of that state, speaking of the McPherson Case, supra, says: "But in that case all the statements were made in extremis, and were clearly admissible as dying declarations." The case turned wholly on conflicting statements in the dying declaration itself. The point under consideration in the case at bar did not enter into that case in any way, and it is no authority for the contention.

In the Lawrence Case, 21 Cal. 368, is the following statement of fact: "After the evidence for the prosecution had closed, the defendant offered to prove that the deceased, after the shooting and at the primary examination of defendant before the 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

committing magistrate, swore to facts directly contradicting his dying declarations. The court refused to admit the evidence, and the defendant excepted." It appears in this case that after the shooting, probably before it was anticipated that the deceased would die from his wounds, there was a preliminary examination of the defendant, at which the prosecuting witness was sworn and testified. He died some time after this, and made a dying declaration regarding the shooting, which was admitted in evidence against the defendant on his final trial for murder. There was a material conflict between his dying declaration and his sworn evidence at the preliminary, and this evidence was offered for the purpose of impeaching his dying declaration. Under the circumstances of that case, his evidence at the preliminary was competent evidence at the final trial. It is universally held, where a witness has been duly sworn and examined in court, and an opportunity offered for cross-examination, that upon a subsequent trial of the same transaction between the same parties, if the witness is beyond the jurisdiction of the court and cannot be produced, that his evidence at the former trial may be read to the jury. Either party may use it. Not only this, the alleged contradictory statements were evidence, given under oath, in a court proceeding between the same parties, with all the right and opportunity of cross-examination. The case is no authority for allowing one, after the opportunity for contradiction or explanation had been cut off by death, to come into court and testify to an alleged oral conversation, had with a deceased witness out of court, for the purpose of impeaching his evidence. I do not think that purported oral hearsay statements, made out of court, not made under oath, and not in extremis, should be admitted for the purpose of impeaching a dying declaration.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

RATHBONE, SARD, & COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

CHAMPION STEEL RANGE COMPANY.

(110 C. C. A. 596, 189 Fed. 26.)

Trade — unfair competition — copying design.

1. The placing upon the market of a stove the design of which is copied from that of a rival manufacturer cannot be restrained as unfair competition, if the earlier design had been so recently produced that the public had not become familiar with it as designating the product of the designer, so as to be deceived into buying the copy as his, where the copyist uses his own name and trademark on his product, so that there is no attempt to palm it off as that of his rival.

Same — copying "parts" marks.

2. That private marks to designate "parts" of a stove are copied, together with the general design, when one manufacturer appropriates a rival's design for a product of his own, so as to give retailers an opportunity, which is embraced by some, to palm off the goods of the copyist as those of the designer, does not render the copyist liable to restraint as unfairly competing in trade, where the stove is put out under his own name and trademarks, so that no attempt is made by him to palm his product off as that of his rival.

Note. — Right to protection against use by rival of similar design, shell or pattern not protected by patent

This is the subject of a note to Rushmore v. Manhattan Screw & Stamping Works, in 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 269, but few cases decided subsequently thereto have considered the question. These cases, including RATHBONE, S. & Co. v. CHAMPION STEEL RANGE CO., serve to emphasize the doctrine of that note, to the effect that "the rule of unfair competition cannot be successfully invoked to abridge the freedom of trade competition, where the similarity complained of is with reference to necessary functional characteristics of the article simulated."

Thus in Rushmore v. Saxon, 95 C. C. A. 671, 170 Fed. 1021, a case very similar, as to the facts to the Rushmore Case the court by a per curiam opinion said that they could see no way to distinguish that case from the Rushmore Case, hence the doctrine of that case was followed.

In Keystone Type Foundry v. Portland Pub. Co. 186 Fed. 690, it is asserted that the basis of an action for unfair competition is not merely the ownership of a manufactured label, but also deceit or fraud on the defendant's part in the use of the label, which will deceive the purchaser or user of the article. And it is held not to constitute unfair competition, to make type similar to that manufactured by another which is not protected by patent, it appearing that the defendant had not sought to avail itself of the complainant's reputation as a founder, but of its taste and skill as a designer. This the court said it may do. "It may copy the complainant's type so long as it does not pretend that the copy is an original product of the complainant."

So, others may make and sell drawers constructed according to the design of a patent which has expired, and may make same with an elastic seam of the same color as the seam in the drawers as to which the patent has expired, where the color of the strip has not been artificially produced, but is the natural color of the undyed and unbleached yarn from which the strip is made. Knappen, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed its bill of complaint against appellee, alleging unfair competition by the latter in the manufacture and sale of a certain type of natural-gas heater. The bill prayed for a permanent injunction against such manufacture and sale, and asked for certain special relief incidental to the general relief asked. Upon a final hearing on pleadings and proofs, the circuit court made a decree dismissing the bill, from which decree this appeal is taken.

The important facts are these:

Complainant is one of the largest and longest established manufacturers of stoves, ranges, and heaters (both coal burning and wood burning) in the United States. It has been in business since the year 1830. Its factories are now at Albany, New York, and Aurora, Illinois. In the year 1835 it registered the "Acorn" as its trademark, and has used the same ever since upon its product, unless in the case of a few cheap stoves. Its product enjoys an excellent popularity, being known to the public generally under the name of the "Acorn." About the year 1900, with the development of natural gas in the territory hereafter mentioned, several stove manufacturers began making natural-gas ranges and heaters. This natural territory included western New York, western Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, and parts of Indiana, Oklahoma, Kansas, Missouri, and possibly some other territory. In 1903 the complainant began making natural-gas ranges. It made no natural-gas heaters until 1905. At that time there were upon the market and in use substantially two types of natural-gas heaters of the better class, one having a rounding and the other a tubular drum. In 1904 there was put out by another manufacturer a heater known as the "Reliable." In 1905 complainant prepared designs for a natural-gas heater called the "Solar Acorn." The appearance of complainant's "Solar Acorn" differs, generally speaking, from that of the "Reliable" only in certain features of ornamentation, the shape, style, base, foot rail, fire pot, reflector, drum, and top being substantially the same (except as hereafter stated), as well as the broad, general plan of ornamentation. Complainant made the ornamentation at the top of its "Solar Acorn" more elaborate than in the case of the "Reliable," apparently substituted a white for a black finishing rim above the drum, adopted a different design of ornamental pieces on the side of the drum, which were brought well forward, the ornamentation above the reflector being carried a little higher, and the foot rail and base ornamentation made somewhat more elaborate.

We do not intimate that complainant actually used the "Reliable" as a copy, or that it adopted features of ornamentation belonging peculiarly to that heater. The fact and extent of similarity are all that are material here. The "Solar Acorn," as exhibited in advertising cut and as manufactured, had in all cases the device of the acorn upon the scroll work above the reflector and upon the corners of the base constituting the legs, and the words "Solar Acorn" prominently upon the foot rail, the name of the manufacturer being shown upon the back side of the stove. Complainant sells its product only to dealers, not directly reaching the ultimate purchaser and user. The territory covered by its sales is divided by the Ohio river into the eastern and the western territory, respectively, headquarters for the former being at Albany and for the latter at Aurora. The method and extent of its advertising of the heater in question, and of its attempts to bring the same to the attention of the public prior to the defendant's coming into the market, are these: In September, 1905, it issued from 2,000 to 2,500 leaflets, which it distributed in approximately equal amounts through the Albany and Aurora headquarters, these leaflets being sent to dealers only, except as a very few were given to traveling salesmen, who did not call upon the user or consumer, but only upon the dealer. The latter distributed the leaflets only by handing them out to customers calling at the store, or by leaving them upon the counter accessible to customers. In February, 1906, 1,500 circulars were issued, and before April 1st of that year 2,000 catalogues. These circulars and catalogues seem to have been distributed in substantially the same way as the leaflets. In each of these three classes of literature the Solar Acorn was shown and advertised. Complainant has never advertised this heater in the newspapers, trade journals, or magazines. In December, 1905, complainant shipped twelve of these heaters to dealers in Ohio, and in the following January two more. As a general rule but one stove was sent to each dealer, the same being apparently intended to be used as a sample. From February 1, 1906, to August 1, 1906, three more deliveries were made to dealers in Ohio. In January, 1906, four were sent to dealers in Missouri and Kansas, no more being delivered previous to August of that year. In the eastern territory deliveries were begun in November, 1905. It is not definitely shown, so far as appears by references in briefs of counsel, that more than two stoves were actually delivered to dealers in that territory in 1905. The testimony of the extent of sales to dealers during that year is not explicit, but we infer that at least eleven were so sold. Our attention is not called in briefs of counsel or in argument to any evidence of sales of complainant's heaters to actual users prior to defendant's adoption of its heater and the putting of the same upon the market.

The defendant is a general stove manufacturer at Cleveland, Ohio, having been engaged in business under its present name, either as a firm or as a corporation, since 1893. It has apparently a good business standing and does a large business, although we assume less extensive than complainant's. It has used the name "Champion" as its trademark continuously since that organization, except during the first few months. Soon after complainant began such manufacture and delivery to dealers of its "Solar Acorn," the defendant brought out a natural-gas heater called the "Champion." In so doing it copied complainant's cut, except that it removed the acorn device from the reflector and base of the stove, and put the word "Champion" prominently upon the foot rail, and placed its own name upon the back of the stove in the same location where complainant puts its name upon its stove. Its patterns were prepared directly by the use of parts of one of complainants' "Solar Acorns," the changes referred to as made in the cut being also made in the patterns and in the stove as manufactured, except that as actually put out the letter "C" appeared conspicuously upon the reflector in place of complainant's acorn. Defendant has invariably manufactured the heater in the dress stated, except that in the case of heaters manufactured for three special dealers, who desired distinctive names, the words "Iron City," "Crown," or "Comfort," were placed upon the foot rails of the respective stoves; in each case, however, the letter "C" being prominently shown in the scrollwork of the reflector, complainant's trademark and tradename being likewise absent, and defendant's name being upon the back of the stove in the usual place therefor. The defendant completed its heater and put the same upon the market in February, 1906, publicly exhibiting the same at the Ohio Hardware Dealer's Convention at Canton, Ohio, the latter part of that month. It got out for that convention 20,000 descriptive circulars (five times as many as complainant had issued up to that time) advertising its heaters, part of which circulars were distributed at the convention, the remainder being sent out through the mail to other dealers and salesmen. Complainant had no exhibit of natural-gas heaters at the Canton convention, but had a representative thereat. Defendant exhibited this stove at the Ohio state and county fairs during the year 1906. "Right after the convention, or at the convention," defendant's salesman took orders for its heater, and immediately thereafter salesmen were sent out through the territory, deliveries being begun in July, 1906, the record showing that but a small proportion of the deliveries in the natural-gas heater trade are made in any year between January and July. Following the Hardware Dealers' Convention in February, 1906, and throughout that year, new circulars and advertising matter to the number of many thousand copies were circulated by defendant, which has since carried on its advertising in trade papers, catalogues, circulars, and to some extent in local newspapers, its advertising having been much more extensive than that of complainant. The complainant's sales in Ohio increased in 1906, dropping off after that time. In Kansas and Missouri, sales increased during 1907, over 1906. In the eastern territory sales increased through 1907, dropping off after that year. The evidence indicates that this falling off of sales of complainant's heater is due in large part to defendant's active competition. This suit was begun in January, 1909.

The late Judge Tayler, who heard this case in the circuit court, in the course of his opinion dismissing the bill, said: "It is perfectly apparent that these are the salient and influencing facts in this case: That late in 1905 the complainant brought out this 'Solar Acorn' stove in controversy, having previously advertised it by circulars sent to dealers. They sold a small number in the fall of that year. Some time in the winter of that year defendant took complainant's stove apart, and, except for the acorn and other marks which indicated the original, absolutely copied at least the external parts of the stove in every particular, so that, to look at it, it was an exact duplicate of the stove made and designed by complainant, with the descriptive exceptions referred to. At that time it is perfectly obvious that the 'Solar Acorn' gas heater had no reputation whatever. It had established no market. It was the expression of the idea of complainant as to the form which that type of gas stove should take. The defendant appropriated the design. Whatever may be said of the ethics of this act, the effect of this appropriation was not to deceive the public, for the public had no knowledge. It was not to affect the good will of the complainant, for the complainant had no good will established in respect to this stove. The defendant simply saw that somebody else had made something which it thought was good, and which was not protected by trademark or patent, and which the public had no general knowledge of, and proceeded to make an article like it, taking off from it the characteristic designations which complainant used, and putting on its own. Now, who could be deceived by any such operation as that? Certainly not the dealers, for they knew from whom they bought the stoves; certainly not the public, for the public did not know the stoves. In a word, the gist of the offense of unfair competition, to wit, the selling of the imitating thing as the imitated thing, does not exist in this case at all."

Judge Tayler was also of opinion that complainant's right of action was barred by laches, in failing for nearly three years to take action, while defendant was actively building up its own trade.

We do not find it necessary to pass upon the question of complainant's alleged laches, for in view of the lack of public reputation and popularity of complainant's heater, and even of any substantial knowledge, on the part of the using and purchasing public, of its existence, we agree with Judge Tayler that the copying by defendant of complainant's design of ornamentation did not deceive the public, by enabling the defendant to palm off its heater as that made by complainant. The latter has no patent upon either the method of construction or operation of the heater, nor upon its design with respect to ornamentation or otherwise. This action is not for infringement of trademark, for no trademark is infringed. Nor is it for pirating a tradename, for complainant's tradename is not used. This action is simply and solely for alleged unfair competition in the use of the special features of ornamental dress to which attention has been called.

The rule is well settled that nothing less than conduct tending to pass off one man's merchandise or business as that of another will constitute unfair competition. In Goodyear's India Rubber Glove Mfg. Co. v. Goodyear Rubber Co. 128 U. S. 593, 604, 32 L. ed. 535, 537, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 166, 168, Justice Field said: "The case at bar cannot be sustained as one to restrain unfair trade. Relief in such cases is granted only where the defendant, by his marks, signs, labels, or in other ways, represents to the public that the goods sold by him are those manufactured or produced by the plaintiff, thus palming off his goods for those of a different manufacturer, to the injury of the plaintiff. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828; Sawyer v. Horn (C. C.) 4 Hughes, 239, 1 Fed. 24; Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66; Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84."

In Howe Scale Co. v. Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict, 198 U. S. 118, 140, 49 L. ed. 972, 986, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609, 614, Chief Justice Fuller said: "The essence of the wrong in unfair competition consists in the sale of the goods of one manufacturer or vendor for those of another, and, if defendant so conducts its business as not to palm off its goods as those of complainant, the action fails."

In American Washboard Co. v. Saginaw Mfg. Co. 50 L.R.A. 609, 43 C. C. A. 233, 103 Fed. 281, it was held by this court in an opinion by Judge (now Mr. Justice) Day, that the fact even that the defendant deceives the public as to his goods by fraudulent means does not give a right of action, unless it results in the sale of such goods as those of the complainant.

In Newcomer v. Scriven, 94 C. C. A. 77, 168 Fed. 621, in which were involved alleged infringements of trademarks and tradename, as well as unfair competition, although it appeared that a certain advertisement was calculated to mislead a customer into believing that the product of defendant was that of complainant, this court, speaking through Judge (now Mr. Justice) Lurton, held that, as it was not shown "that any customer was misled into buying garments as made or sold by the Scriven Company which were made by others," no right of action in that regard existed.

The rule we have stated is recognized by numerous authorities, but those we have cited are sufficient for the purpose. So far as concerns the ornamental dress of the stove, it is clear that, as complainant had no patent on the design, it had no monopoly thereof, and that anyone was free to copy it so long as he did not attempt thereby to palm off his goods as those of complainant, and took due care to guard against any deception of the public into buying in the belief that it is purchasing complainant's goods. Fairbanks v. Jacobus, 14 Blatchf. 337, Fed. Cas. No. 4,608; Dover Stamping Co. v. Fellows, 163 Mass. 191, 28 L.R.A. 448, 47 Am. St. Rep. 448, 40 N. E. 105; Flagg Mfg. Co. v. Holloway, 178 Mass. 83, 59 N. E. 667; Heide v. Wallace (3d Circuit) 68 C. C. A. 16, 135 Fed. 346; Saxlehner v. Wagner, 216 U. S. 375, 54 L. ed. 525, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 298. And it results from this principle that the adoption by one manufacturer of the characteristic features of another's product, common to articles of that class, does not of itself amount to unfair competition. Globe-Wernicke Co. v. Fred Macey Co. (6th Circuit) 56 C. C. A. 304, 110 Fed. 696; Warren Featherbone Co. v. American Featherbone Co. (7th Circuit) 72 C. C. A. 571, 141 Fed. 513; Computing Scale Co. v. Standard Computing Scale Co. (6th Circuit) 55 C. C. A. 459, 118 Fed. 965, 971.

Complainant insists, however, that the unnecessary imitation by one manufacturer of the nonfunctional parts of the product of a competitor, to the extent that the two articles are substantially identical in appearance to a casual observer, and retail purchasers are thus likely to mistake one for the other, is chargeable with unfair competition, although each feature taken separately may have been open to appropriation, as announced in certain authorities, including three cases decided by the United States circuit court of appeals for the second circuit. Enterprise Mfg. Co. v. Landers, 65 C. C. A. 587, 131 Fed. 240; Yale & T. Mfg. Co. v. Alder, 83 C. C. A. 149, 154 Fed. 37; Rushmore v. Manhattan Screw & Stamping Works, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 269, 90 C. C. A. 299, 163 Fed. 939. We are not called upon to determine the correctness of the rule thus stated, as applied to appropriate facts. We content ourselves with saying that in our opinion it can have no application to the facts of this case, for the reason that, upon the record before us, taking into account the lack of public knowledge and reputation of complainant's heater in question, the absence of complainant's trademark and trade-name, and the fact, as shown, we think, by the preponderance of the proof, that purchasers more often identify stoves by their name or the name of the manufacturer, or both, than by appearance merely; that all of complainant's natural-gas heaters, including even its cheap products, have the acorn device prominently upon the front and are all advertised in catalogues under the name of "Acorn," in connection with the comparatively minor variations in the general appearance of the stove, including the style of ornamentation, from that of stoves theretofore upon the market, the retail purchaser exercising reasonable care could not well have been deceived into the belief that in buying defendant's heater he was purchasing complainant's stove.

It is further urged that in trademark cases the right to protection does not depend upon any particular period of usage, but that, once adopted in good faith and used, the right thereto will prevail against any subsequent user, although no public reputation or notoriety has been acquired; that the right of protection against infringement of trademarks and unfair competition respectively rest upon the same basis; and that therefore the rule in trademark cases, as stated, controls this case.

But, whether or not the rule in trademark cases is as stated (a question we are not now required to consider), the case before us is not a trademark or a tradename case, but one of alleged unfair competition, predicated upon the simulating of the dress of a competitor's product. And in such case it is clear that identification in the mind of the purchaser of such distinctive dress, as belonging to the complaining manufacturer, is necessary, and that such identification cannot well exist in the absence of knowledge or reputation of such characteristic dress.

In this connection it is urged that complainant's good will and reputation, connected with its general line of goods, attached to the heater in question immediately upon its being placed upon the market. But if we have correctly reached the conclusion that complainant's heater had acquired no appreciable public knowledge or reputation, and the dress of the heater was not identified in the public mind as the complainant's product, the suggestion loses point.

There is some evidence tending to show an actual deception of customers on the part of dealers by representing defendant's heater as that of complainant. It also appears that on the inside of some of the castings of defendant's heater, due to the use of parts of complainant's heater as patterns, the letters "A" and "Sol. A." are found, and that this fact would enable a dishonest dealer to misrepresent defendant's heater as a "Solar Acorn." This last consideration does not impress us as important, and there is no evidence of actual deception thereby. So far as concerns actual misrepresentation by dealers of the identity of heaters, not only is the proof thereof not highly convincing, but defendant is not responsible for the fact that tricky retailers represent its manufacture as that of complainant, knowing better, provided defendant has done its legal duty in distinguishing its own product from that of complainant. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Royal, 58 C. C. A. 499, 122 Fed. 345; Hall's Safe Co. v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1182, 76 C. C. A. 495, 146 Fed. 43.

We have no doubt that sales of complainant's heater have been materially lessened through defendant's competition. The effectiveness of this competition, in our judgment, has resulted from the activity with which defendant has pushed its heater, the publicity and extent of defendant's exhibitions and advertising, the advantage which the defendant has, especially in the large and valuable district of Ohio, in being a local manufacturer; and to complainant's advance of prices for 1907, before which time the prices of the two competing heaters were substantially the same. This competition was legitimate.

Our conclusion, then, in substance, is that complainant has failed to establish a case of unfair competition, for lack of proof that defendant has palmed off its goods upon the public as the goods of complainant. In our opinion, defendant's intent, as shown by the record, in copying complainant's cut and patterns, was not to derive a benefit from complainant's name and reputation, but to avail itself of a design which, by imitating it, defendant has confessed is attractive and desirable. Defendant's intent is, of course, not material where the necessary result of the act is to commit legal wrong. But, where neither such natural result nor such actual intent exists, unfair competition is not made out. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Royal, 58 C. C. A. 499, 122 Fed. 345; Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. 138 U. S. 537, 549, 551, 34 L. ed. 997, 1004, 1005, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 396; Globe-Wernicke Co. v. Fred Macey Co. 56 C. C. A. 304, 119 Fed. 703, 704.

We do not think that the fact that defendant entered the extreme western territory after complainant's goods had been introduced there justifies a differentiating of that particular territory from the remaining portions of it, or from the territory as a whole.

For the reasons stated, the decree of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

NATCHEZ, COLUMBIA, & MOBILE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

MRS. L. A. LAMBERT.

(— Miss. —, 54 So. 836.)

Carriers — carrying passenger beyond station — damages.

1. A railroad company is liable in nominal damages for carrying a passenger beyond his station, into its yards, without giving him an opportunity to alight at the station.

Same — duty to inform passenger of intention to return.

2. A railroad company which, for purposes of its own, runs a passenger train beyond a station where passengers are to alight, into its yards, is bound to inform them of its intention to return and give them an opportunity to alight at the station, and is liable for all damages proximately caused to them by its failure so to do.

Proximate cause — illness of passenger — exposure to storm — failure to stop at station.

3. The carrying of a passenger beyond his station, into the railroad yards, without giving him an opportunity to alight at the station, and failure to inform him of an intention to return to the station, is not the proximate cause of illness due to his attempt to walk back in a storm, where he was not pressed for time, and by remaining in the train a short time, would have been deposited at the station platform.

Note. — Duty upon running train past station to notify passengers of intention to return.

As a general rule a carrier of passengers, upon bringing the train to a full stop for any other purpose than for passengers to alight, owes a duty to avoid injury to passengers who may be misled as to the place of stoppage being the proper one for the purpose of alighting. 6 Cyc. 614.

Accordingly it has been held in harmony with NATCHEZ, C. & M. R. Co. v. LAMBERT that a carrier, upon running past the station, owes the duty to notify passengers intending to alight at that point, of its intention to return and give them an opportunity to alight at the station platform, especially where the name of the station has been announced. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 168.

Thus, running a train past the regular stopping place, on a dark night, after the customary signal has been given for stopping at that point, and coming to a full stop on a dangerous trestle bridge about 400 feet distant, near the time the train was due at the regular stop, without giving warning of the dangerous place or of an in-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for carrying her beyond her station. Reversed.

Plaintiff took passage on defendant's train at Topeka, Mississippi, to a junction point of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, intending to connect with the Illinois Central train due about four hours after the arrival of defendant's train. When the train reached the junction, instead of stopping, it passed the depot a distance of about 250 yards, intending later to back into it. It was raining, and plaintiff, without notifying the conductor, walked back to the station through the rain, which caused the injury for which she brings this action.

Messrs. T. Brady, Jr., and Herman Dean for appellant:

The original contract had been carried out in full. Under it plaintiff would have been compelled to alight where she did, but, in that event, she could not have been heard to complain.

tention to return to the regular stopping place is such negligence as to render the carrier liable for injuries sustained to a passenger by being thrown from the platform by the sudden backing of the train while attempting to alight, since there was an implied invitation to the passenger to alight. Ibid.

So, in Columbus & I. C. R. Co. v. Farrell, 31 Ind. 408, it was held that a carrier was liable for an injury sustained by a passenger in alighting at a dangerous place, in the darkness, after the train had come to a full stop after passing the station, and the station had been announced either from the usual place of making such announcement, or after the stopping of the train.

And in the following cases it has been held to be a question for the jury whether the failure to so notify passengers of an intention to return to the station, after coming to a full stop, was negligence under the circumstances: Gadsden & A. Union R. Co. v. Causler, 97 Ala. 235, 12 So. 439; Taber v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 489; Sherwood v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 82 Mich. 374, 46 N. W. 773; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. White, 88 Pa. 327; Hemmingway v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 72 Wis. 42, 7 Am. St. Rep. 823, 37 N. W. 804; Weller v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 9 C. P. 126, 43 L. J. C. P. N. S. 137, 8 Moak, Eng. Rep. 441, 29 L. T. N. S. 888, 22 Week. Rep. 302.

In Sherwood v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 82 Mich. 274, 46 N. W. 773, the court said that a carrier was bound to take notice that when a train is brought to a full stop along the station platform that passengers will attempt to alight, and if the stop is of sufficient length of time to allow it, some of them will be in the act of alighting when the train starts back, and that if the stop is of such duration it will be negligent in starting back without some warning, though the stop takes the engine past a water tank where it is customary for that particular train to take water, and it is impossible at all times to stop at the immediate point of taking water, and in the event of running past the point a short distance, the usual course is to back up immediately.

Accordingly, it was held that a request for an instruction that "the running of a railway train beyond the usual stopping place at the station, before coming to a standstill, is not of itself negligence, or not negligence as a matter of law; nor is the pause after it is brought to a stop for a period necessary to reverse the motion so as to back it to the usual stopping place, negligence,"—was properly modified by adding the following: "Unless the stop is so made and for such a length of time as to indicate that it is an invitation to passengers to alight, and the movement backward is made without warning, while they are alighting in response to such invitation." Ibid.

In Weller v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 9 C. P. 126, after holding that merely calling out the name of the station before the train has come to a stop is no evidence of negligence, and that merely overshooting the station platform is not negligence, Brett, J., said: "But if the porter has called out the name of the station, and the engine driver has overshot the station, and the train has come to a standstill, the company's servants are guilty of negligence if they do not warn passengers not to alight. At all events, the jury may from these facts infer negligence." And in the same case, Honyman, J., said: "But the train having overshot the platform, and the name of the station having been called out, the omission of the company's servants to caution the passengers not to alight until the train had been brought up at the proper place was evidence of negligence. Speaking for myself, I should say it was not only evidence of negligence, but negligence itself." Cited with approval in Englehaupt v. Erie R. Co. 209 Pa. 182, 58 Atl. 154.

And in Hemmingway v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 72 Wis. 42, 7 Am. St. Rep. 823, 37 N. W. 804, it was held that the failure of a conductor to notify an infant passenger, a boy eleven years of age, that the train would not stop at the depot, but would pass by some distance and then back up so that he might get off with safety, warranted a finding of negligence by the jury, so as to render the railroad company liable for an injury sustained to the boy by jumping from the moving train.

Likewise in Taber v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 489, it was held that the question of negligence in failing to announce to passengers desiring to alight at Wells v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 67 Miss. 24, 6 So. 737; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Stacey, 68 Miss. 403, 9 So. 349.

All defendant had to do was to put plaintiff off at the depot in accordance with its custom, and appellee was in duty bound to know this custom.

Southern R. Co. v. Kendrick, 40 Miss. 387, 90 Am. Dec. 332.

Punitive or exemplary damages should have been denied to appellee, yet damages for physical discomfort and inconvenience a station that the train had not come to a final stop, but would back up, is for the jury where, before reaching the station, it had been called out, and the night was dark, and there was no depot, nor a station light, or anything to indicate the stopping place to a person not familiar with it. The court said: "But the fact that the train over-shot the station, rendering it necessary after it came to a standstill to start it back to the usual stopping place, in connection with the other circumstances, made it a question for the jury whether, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, the defendant should not have given notice to passengers desiring to alight at the station that the train had not come to a final stop, and that it would back up."

And so the question of negligence of those in charge of a train, and the implied invitation to a passenger to alight from the train, are questions for the jury where, with knowledge of a passenger's intention to alight at a particular point, the train is driven to the next stopping place, about 200 yards distant, where it is brought to a full stop, and, without notifying the passenger of an intention to return and without warning or signal, the train was moved backward while the passenger was in the act of alighting, and caused the injury complained of. Gadsden & A. Union R. Co. v. Causler, 97 Ala. 235, 12 So. 439.

But in Lewis v. London, C. & D. R. Co. L. R. 9 Q. B. 66, 43 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 8, 29 L. T. N. S. 397, 22 Week. Rep. 153, it was held that the failure of a carrier to announce its intention to back the train to the station platform, after coming to a full stop, was not negligence, when the name of the station was announced before the train reached the station platform, and the passengers were not directed to leave the train, so as to render the carrier liable for an injury sustained to a passenger by being thrown from the car by the sudden backing of the train while she was attempting to alight, since, as a reasonable person, she must have believed that the train which had passed the platform would come back again; that it would not stop to let passengers get out upon the tracks, especially where the coaches immediately in front were standing upon a bridge, and she was familiar with the station and surroundings; and consequently she had no business to attempt to alight at a point beyond the platform, unless the servants of carrier told her to do so.

As to the right of a passenger to assume that car will stop at proper place for alighting, see notes to Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Mullen, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 115, and Farrell v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1113.

Stopping passenger train at point where trains are standing or moving on parallel, adjacent tracks, see note to Smith v. North Carolina R. Co. 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 179.

Liability of street railway company for stopping car at improper place for passenger to alight, see note to Melton v. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 467.

Contributory negligence.

It has been held that where the name of the station has been called out, and the train has come to a stop, no warning being given to the contrary, a passenger is not negligent in attempting to alight, since he has a right to suppose that the train has reached the spot where it is intended that he should alight. Weller v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 9 C. P. 126, 43 L. J. C. P. N. S. 137, 8 Moak. Eng. Rep. 441, 29 L. T. N. S. 888, 22 Week. Rep. 302; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 188; Sherwood v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 82 Mich. 374, 46 N. W. 773.

Proximate cause.

The carrying of a passenger beyond his station, onto a dangerous trestle bridge, on a dark night, without giving him an opportunity to alight at the station, and failure to inform him of an intention to return to the station, is the proximate cause of death caused by thypo-malaria fever, which was then prevailing in the community, where the injury sustained by alighting at the improper place was such as to render the system of the injured person more susceptible to disease and less able to resist it. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Buck, 96 Ind. 346, 49 Am. Rep. 158.

On the general question, what injuries may be deemed the proximate result of discharging passenger at improper place, or one not his destination, see note to Georgia R. & Electric Co. v. McAllister, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1177.

Co. v. Stacy, 68 Miss. 463, 9 So. 349; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Gibbs, — Miss. —, 12 So. 545.

Messrs. Magee & McGehee for appellee.

Mayes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the absence of some good reason therefor, it was the duty of this railroad company to allow Mrs. Lambert to get off of its train, at her proper depot, at the very first opportunity that was presented. In this case Mrs. Lambert should have been landed at her proper depot before the train was carried into the yards, and because this was not done she is clearly entitled to nominal damages only. If it was necessary, in any case, for a passenger train to be pulled way beyond the depot and into the yards of the company, it is certainly the duty of the company to notify the passengers of its purpose to return them to their proper landing place, and if it fail to do this it is negligence, and any damage occasioned any passenger as the direct result makes the company liable therefor.

In this case, however, the main injury complained of was not the direct, proximate result of negligence of the company in carrying Mrs. Lambert by the depot, or failing to notify her of their purpose to return the train to the proper depot. It had been raining, and was raining at the time the train pulled into the yards. Mrs. Lambert knew this, and although she had four hours to wait after she reached the depot before the train she was to take over the Illinois Central Railroad to McComb City would arrive, she got out of her coach into the rain and slush, and undertook to walk back some 200 or 300 yards to the depot. It was getting off of the train and going into the rain that made her ill and caused the damage for which she sues. When she got off, the train had only been there a few minutes, and in twenty or thirty minutes the train was carried back to the depot for the purpose of allowing passengers to get off there. She had ample time to wait, and made no effort to have the train carry her back. She was at the terminus of the road, and knew that she could not be carried further. We do not think she was entitled to recover more than nominal damages, and the court should have so instructed.

Reversed and remanded.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

C. W. McDONALD, Plff. in Err.,

v.

J. J. BAILEY.

(25 Okla. 849, 107 Pac. 523.)

Replevin — undivided interest in personalty.

Replevin will not lie for an undivided interest in personal property.

(March 8, 1910.)

Headnote by TURNER, J.

Note. — Replevin for undivided interest in personal property.

General rule.

The general rule is well settled, that replevin can be maintained only for specific property capable of identification and delivery, and will not lie for an undivided interest in personal property. 34 Cyc. 1359; D'Wolf v. Harris, 4 Mason, 515, Fed. Cas. No. 4,221 (obiter); Hart v. Morton, 44 Ark. 447; Stanley v. Robinson, 14 Ill. App. 480 (obiter); Spooner v. Ross, 24 Mo. App. 599; Schwarz v. Lee Gon, 46 Or. 219, 80 Pac. 110.

Thus, it has been held that replevin will not lie for an undivided interest in, or part of:

—horses. Balch v. Jones, 61 Cal. 234; Caldwell v. Sisson, 150 Mo. App. 547, 131 S. W. 140; Sharp v. Johnson, 38 Or. 246, 84 Am. St. Rep. 788, 63 Pac. 485.

—growing crop. Read v. Middleton, 62 Iowa, 317, 17 N. W. 532.

—mature crop (corn) standing ungathered in field. Jones v. Dodge, 61 Mo. 368; McDONALD v. BAILEY.

—gathered crop. Ward v. Worthington, 33 Ark. 830 (cotton); Hart v. Morton, 44 Ark. 447 (cotton); Moseley v. Cheatham, 62 Ark. 133, 34 S. W. 543 (cotton and corn).

—wheat (threshed). Bowen v. Roach, 78 Ind. 361; Gossett v. Drydale, 48 Mo. App. 430.

—fodder in stacks. Ellis v. Culver, 2 Harr. (Del.) 129.

—hay in stacks and oats in granary. Hoeffer v. Agee, 9 Colo. App. 189, 47 Pac. 973.

—cotton in bales. Jackson v. Stockard, 9 Baxt. 280.

—bales of hops, varying in weight and not necessarily of uniform quality or grade. Schwarz v. Lee Gon, 46 Or. 219, 80 Pac. 110.

—logs. Hart v. Fitzgerald, 2 Mass. 509, 3 Am. Dec. 75; Busch v. Nester, 70 Mich. 525, 38 N. W. 458.

—portable sawmill. Kindy v. Green, 32 Mich. 310.

ERROR to the Comanche County Court to review a judgment in defendant's favor in a replevin action to recover possession of a part of a certain crop of corn. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. W. McDonald in propria persona.

Mr. J. A. Fain for defendant in error.

Turner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On November 17, 1906, C. W. McDonald, plaintiff in error, sued J. J. Bailey, defendant in error, in the county court of Comanche county in replevin to recover the possession of "one half a crop of corn" grown on certain land in said county, of the alleged value of $200, claiming special ownership therein by virtue of a certain note, secured by chattel mortgage thereon, made, executed, and delivered by Chatoe-bitty and High-Weini to E. N. Joseph, and by him transferred to plaintiff for value and before maturity. For answer defendant filed a general denial. There was trial to the court. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant demurred to the evidence, which was sustained, and exceptions saved, and after motion for a new trial filed and overruled, plaintiff brings the —vessel. Hackett v. Potter, 131 Mass. 50 (even if the plaintiff owns a seven-eighths interest).

So, a mortgagee of a crop of cotton, consisting of 5 bales, cannot maintain a replevin action against the landlord, whose tenant raised and mortgaged the crop, for 2 bales thereof, admitting the landlord's superior title to an undivided interest in the cotton, equal in value to a certain amount, not greater than the value of 3 bales of the cotton, as the mortgagee has no superior title to any particular part of the lot of cotton, but is at most only an owner in common with the landlord, and cannot resort to replevin as a means of partitioning the property held in common. Tittsworth v. Frauenthal, 52 Ark. 254, 12 S. W. 498.

Nor can a mortgagee of a crop of cotton "to the extent of" a specified number of bales maintain an action of replevin for such number, until after a separation or designation of the specific property,—the mortgage being uncertain in the description thereof. Person v. Wright, 35 Ark. 169.

Likewise, the purchaser of a certain number of barrels of flour out of a large number stored in a warehouse cannot maintain replevin for the number of barrels purchased, unless the portion claimed has been severed and designated from the bulk out of which it was sold, as otherwise there is no mode of identification. Adams v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 68.

And replevin cannot be maintained for an undivided interest in, or share of, corn which the plaintiff has acquired by delivering to the defendant, a warehouseman, corn, which the latter, with the consent of the former, and for convenience and saving of storage, has put in mass with other corn, owned by himself and by others, with the understanding that a like quantity and quality of corn shall be delivered to the plaintiff out of the common mass in store, when required,—the identity of the corn delivered by the plaintiff and his property in that particular corn being lost by his consent. Low v. Martin, 18 Ill. 286.

Where a farm tenant and his landlord are joint owners of certain live stock which the tenant is to keep until the expiration of his lease; when division in kind is to occur, and the tenant sells his undivided half interest to a stranger, the latter cannot maintain an interplea, which is in the nature of a replevin for his undivided interest, in an attachment proceeding by the landlord against the tenant, before the expiration of the lease, to collect past due rent, in which proceeding a part of the live stock is attached. Spooner v. Ross, 24 Mo. App. 599.

But where one of two joint owners of cattle, which are to be divided equally between them, before such division, repudiates the ownership of the other, divides the cattle, and sells half of them, the other co-owner may maintain replevin for the remaining half. Cornett v. Hall, 103 Mo. App. 353, 77 S. W. 122.

And while the holder of a chattel mortgage upon 3 bales of cotton out of a tenant's crop of 11 bales cannot, while the crop remains on the premises where it was produced, and undivided, with the landlord's first lien upon it for rent, to the extent of one fourth of the crop, and a second mortgage on the whole crop, constituting a third lien, maintain replevin for three bales of the crop, or as much cotton as will make three bales, as he has no title to any particular part of the undivided crop; yet, after an agent of the landlord, with the assent of the tenant, has removed from the premises all of the crop except 3 bales, or enough to make 3 bales, the first mortgagee may obtain possession of such 3 bales by replevin, for the purpose of selling it under the power in his mortgage, to satisfy his debt, on refusal of the mortgagor to surrender it, and the latter cannot avoid replevin by wrongfully transferring possession to another. Washington v. Love, 34 Ark. 93.

In McLaughlin v. Piatti, 27 Cal. 452, a bill in equity to compel the specific performance of a contract to sell 500 head of cattle, to be selected and chosen by the purchaser out of a large herd, the court said: "On the facts of this case, the plaintiff had a speedy and perfect remedy at law. The plaintiff . . . had the right to the immediate possession of the whole herd for the purpose of making a selection of his 500 head. In pursuance of that right, the case here and says that the court erred in sustaining said demurrer.

To maintain the issues on his part, plaintiff introduced in evidence said promissory note for \$225, dated April 29, 1905, signed by Chatoe-bitty and High-Weini, payable to E. N. Joseph, or bearer, providing for 12 per cent interest from date, and for an attorneys' fee of \$25. He also introduced in evidence a bill of sale, without date, from the makers of said note to himself, purporting to convey "all of one half of crops grown 1906 on the S.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  and on the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the S. E.  $\frac{1}{4}$  sec. 11, Twp. 14 north, of range 9 west of the I. M., in Comanche, O. T., on Little Washita river," and indorsed as follows:

This instrument was filed for record on the 30th day of March, 1906, at 11 o'clock A. M., and duly recorded in Book 32, Mis. p. 461.

[Seal.] J. Robert Gilliam,
Register of Deeds.

Territory of Oklahoma, County of Comanche.

I, J. Robert Gilliam, register of deeds in and for the county, of territory above named, do hereby certify that the fore-defendants were requested to deliver the whole herd to the plaintiff, but refused so to do. We have here all the grounds upon which the action of detinue has been familiarly planted for ages. In that form of remedy, the plaintiff could have recovered possession of the whole herd—selected his 500 head from it, and returned the residue.

... Our action for the 'claim and delivery of personal property,' considered as a remedy, is at least commensurate with the action of detinue at common law."

And where one person has purchased from another a certain number of barrels of flour out of a larger number of storage in a warehouse, taking therefor an order on the warehouseman, and the latter has accepted the order and given the purchaser a storage receipt for the number of barrels purchased, the warehouseman is estopped from denying his liability to the purchaser, in a subsequent replevin action against himself and a sheriff who has seized the whole mass of flour under a writ of replevin in another suit against the warehouseman, although no segregation has been made of the flour claimed from the larger lot of the same brand and quality. Adams v. Gorham, supra.

In Crapo v. Seybold, 36 Mich. 444, an action of replevin for an undivided half of a crop of wheat in shocks, it was held, that, as the defendant did not have or claim any interest in the other undivided half, he had no right to raise the question whether such an action could be maintained.

And so, a transferee of a farm tenant's undivided interest in unthreshed wheat in stacks on the farm may maintain replevin therefor against a constable who has levied thereon an attachment on behalf of a creditor of the tenant. Pitman v. Baumstark, 63 Kan. 69, 64 Pac. 968.

Exception as to divisible property of uniform kind, quality, and value.

An exception to the general rule that replevin will not lie for an undivided interest in personal property is recognized in some jurisdictions, where the property sought to be recovered consisted of an interest in, or part of, goods of the same nature, quality, and value, which can be easily divided into aliquot parts of equal value, such as the cereal grains, of which an owner 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may recover, in an action of replevin, his own share of the bulk, kind for kind, and measure for measure. 34 Cyc. 1359; Kaufmann v. Schilling, 58 Mo. 218.

As said in Fines v. Bolin, 36 Neb. 621, 54 N. W. 990, while "it is well settled by the authorities that the owner of an undivided interest in a chattel cannot maintain an action against a cotenant to acquire its possession, for the reason that all joint owners, unless there is an agreement to the contrary, are equally entitled to the possession thereof, and neither has the right to the immediate and exclusive possession of the same as against the others," this doctrine, "that one joint tenant cannot sustain replevin against his cotenant, applies more particularly to a single piece of property, or to things in their nature so far indivisible that the share of one is not susceptible of delivery without the whole," and "it should not obtain . . . where the property is absolutely alike in quality and value, and is readily divisible by measurement or weight, such as corn in the crib or pile. When a person is entitled to half of 100 bushels of corn in a mass, he has a right to 50 bushels in severalty, and if his cotenant refuse a division, when properly demanded, he may recover his portion of the grain by replevin."

So, in the following cases, it has been held that replevin may be maintained for an undivided interest in, or share of, the kinds of property indicated, when uniform in kind, quality, and value:

—grains (threshed). Sutherland v. Carter, 52 Mich. 471, 18 N. W. 223 (wheat and oats, of which it was the defendant's duty to deliver one half to the plaintiff upon demand); Freese v. Arnold, 99 Mich. 13, 57 N. W. 1038 (wheat, of which the defendant unlawfully withheld the plaintiff's share); Johnson v. Stone, 111 Minn. 228, 126 N. W. 720 (small grains); Kaufmann v. Schilling, supra (oats raised by the plaintiff, a farm tenant, where he was entitled to the possession of the crop till a separation or measurement had taken place and he had delivered one half to the defendant, and the latter has taken possession of the whole crop); —railroad ties. Halpin v. Stone, 78 Wis. 183, 47 N. W. 177.

And where two tenants in common are going is a true and correct copy of a like instrument now on file in my office.

Dated this 30th day of March, 1906.

J. Robert Gilliam,
Register of Deeds.

He testified, in substance, that as agent for said Joseph on or about that date he took said note, and afterwards bought it from said Joseph for value and before maturity, and that no part of it had been paid; that a chattel mortgage was given at the same time, and later superseded by said bill of sale to secure said debt; that before suit demand was made on defendant for the corn in question, at which time defendant was feeding the same to some seventy five head of cattle and about as many hogs; that the same was standing in the field, which he drove and walked through, and found that it would make some 40 or 50 bushels per acre, and that there was some 120 acres of it; that at that time corn was selling in Fletcher, the closest market, at from 25 to 27 cents per bushel, and that one half of said crop was of the value of $500; that at the time the writ was served defendant said he had bought part of the corn from High-Weini and his squaw, mak-equally entitled to the possession of certain corn in a single pile or crib, which is in the exclusive possession of one of them, who refuses a division when properly demanded, the other may recover his portion by an action of replevin. Fines v. Bolin, supra.

Similarly, a statutory action of "claim and delivery" for the recovery of specific property may be maintained for a certain undivided fractional part of a certain specified quantity of wheat, oats, and barley, uniform in quality and value, and susceptible of a fair and equal division by measurement or weight,—the description and proof of the property sought to be recovered, as such undivided fractional part, being sufficiently specific. Ellingboe v. Brakken, 36 Minn. 156, 30 N. W. 659.

And replevin may be maintained for an undivided half of certain wheat in the stack, ready to be threshed, to the immediate possession of which the plaintiff is entitled,—and the wheat may be divided and one half thereof seized under the writ, as it is threshed. Wattles v. Dubois, 67 Mich. 313, 34 N. W. 672.

In Huff v. Henry, 57 Mo. App. 341, it was held that replevin may also be maintained for an undivided one-sixth interest in certain corn, matured and standing in the field,—especially where the defendant sets off to the sheriff when he goes to execute the writ, the plaintiff's one sixth of the corn, and the parties agree that the part so set off was the plaintiff's vendor's due and proper proportion of the crop.

And in Gardner v. Dutch, 9 Mass. 427, it was held that while a tenant in common of chattels cannot maintain replevin for his undivided share, an owner of a certain number of bags of coffee containing a certain amount may maintain replevin therefor against an officer who has attached it, under a writ against another person, as a part of a larger mass of coffee in the possession of the latter, although the bags belonging to the plaintiff have no distinguishing marks and have never been separated in any manner from the rest of the coffee.

As appears from some of the cases cited above, under the general rule, however, this exception is not recognized in all jurisdictions, or under all circumstances. And see, also, cases cited below, as to commingled goods of this class.

Commingled goods—in general.

Where the distinct and separate goods of two or more persons have been so intermingled as to be indistinguishable, the right of one of them to maintain replevin for his own share of the mass may depend upon either the circumstances of the intermingling, or the nature of the goods, or both. 34 Cyc. 1359, et seq.

—plaintiff's fault.

If the intermingling occurred through the fault of the plaintiff, it seems clear that he cannot maintain replevin. Thus, one who voluntarily marks logs of his own like those of another person, and piles them with the latter so that he cannot identify his own logs, cannot maintain replevin for a proportional part of the whole number of logs thus piled together. Dillingham v. Smith, 30 Me. 370.

So, in The Idaho, 93 U. S. 575, 23 L. ed. 913, a libel against a steamer for damages for the nondelivery of 165 bales of cotton which it had delivered to the true owner of 140 bales thereof, with which the other 25 bales had previously been intermingled, the court said: "All the authorities agree that if a man wilfully and wrongfully mixes his own goods with those of another owner so as to render them indistinguishable, he will not be entitled to his proportion or any part of the property. Certainly not, unless the goods of both owners are of the same quality and value."

And under the general rule that if a man wrongfully mixes his own goods with like goods of another person, so that they cannot be distinguished, the wrongdoer must lose his property, if a person having a license to quarry granite blocks has mixed and mingled blocks which he has taken out after a certain date with other blocks then at the quarry, the title to which is involved and can be determined only in an action pending in a state court, so that the two lots cannot be distinguished, he can recover none of the blocks in a replevin action in a Federal court. Williams v. Morrison, 32 Fed. 177.

—defendant's fault.

If the intermingling occurred through the fault of the defendant, it is equally clear ing the checks payable to the latter, and part of it from a white man, paying the Indian $80 and the white man $120 therefor.

The deputy recorded of deeds of Canadian county testified that the bill of sale, when brought to that office by plaintiff, was first indexed as a chattel mortgage, and when such was seen to be a mistake was, with his consent, on the same day, withdrawn from the chattel mortgage file and recorded in Miscellaneous Book No. 32, as a bill of sale; that such error is evidenced by an entry in the chattel mortgage record as follows: "Error C. 8220, Chatoe-bitty and High-Weini to C. W. McDonald, March 30, 1906 (.....) Error (Bill of Sale)." The reception book in said office evidenced the same to have been withdrawn from the files by plaintiff May 2, 1906. He stated that it had been in his possession ever since. The instrument itself appears to be without file mark of any kind. Plaintiff in his brief admits that the entire crop of corn in question was purchased by defendant some two or three weeks before this suit.

The most obvious ground on which the demurrer was properly sustained was that, assuming, but not deciding, that plaintiff was the owner of an undivided interest therein, replevin therefor will not lie. Wells, Replevin, § 154; Shinn, Replevin, § 206; Cobbe, Replevin, 2d ed. § 238; Sharp v. Johnson, 38 Or. 246, 84 Am. St. Rep. 788, 63 Pac. 485; Hoeffer v. Agee, 9 Colo. App. 189, 47 Pac. 973; Schwarz v. Lee Gon, 46 Or. 219, 80 Pac. 110; Moseley v. Cheatham, 62 Ark. 133, 34 S. W. 543; Hart v. Morton, 44 Ark. 447; Usry v. Rainwater, 40 Ga. 328; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 492. An exception to this rule, however, is made by some authorities where the property sought to be replevined consists of a part of a large mass of the same nature and quality, such as wheat in an elevator, corn in a crib, etc., easily divisible into aliquot parts. 2 Cobbe, Replevin, 2d ed. § 400. But this rule can find no application in this case, for the reason that the proof shows the corn was on the stalk in a large field, of unequal yield in spots, and being devoured by cattle and hogs. Plaintiff's interest, therefore, was almost impossible of identification and seizure under the writ, and of separation from defendant's interest in the mass, without loss or injury to one or the other of these contending parties.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

that the plaintiff may maintain replevin for at least his share of the mixed mass,—especially if it is all of the same kind, quality, and value. Thus, one upon whose land logs have been unlawfully cut and intentionally intermixed by the trespasser with logs of his own, so as to be indistinguishable therefrom, may maintain replevin for the amount of his logs out of the common mass. Stearns v. Raymond, 26 Wis. 74.

And replevin may be maintained for a quantity of staves made from timber wrongfully cut on the plaintiff's land, which staves the defendant has mingled with other staves of like character, so that it is impossible to identify and separate them (Peterson v. Polk, 67 Miss. 163, 6 So. 615),—especially if the mingled staves are all of the same kind, quality, and value, and if no advantage would result to either party by getting the identical staves owned by him (Rust Land & Lumber Co. v. Isom, 70 Ark. 99, 91 Am. St. Rep. 68, 66 S. W. 334),—and the plaintiff may recover from the whole lot a number of staves equal to the number so taken from his land.

Likewise, replevin may be maintained for a quantity of lumber manufactured from trees cut without authority on land belonging to the plaintiff, which the defendant has intermingled with other lumber of the same kind and value. Mine LaMotte Lead & Smelting Co. v. White, 106 Mo. App. 222, 80 S. W. 356.

mingled with logs of his own may maintain replevin to recover, out of the common mass of lumber of the same quality and value, the quantity which his logs have contributed thereto. Bent v. Hoxie, 90 Wis. 625, 64 N. W. 426.

So, in Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44, 22 L. ed. 551, affirming 2 Dill. 398, Fed. Cas. No. 12,486, it was held that where logs cut from lands of the state, without license, have been intermingled with logs cut from other lands, so as not to be distinguishable, the state is entitled, under the law of Minnesota, to replevy from the whole mass an amount equal to the logs cut on its lands. The court said: "The remedy thus afforded by the law of Minnesota is eminently just in its operation, and is less severe than that which the common law would authorize."

And replevin may be maintained for corn delivered by the plaintiff to a warehouseman, which the latter, wrongfully, or without the consent of the plaintiff, has put in mass with other corn, whereby identification has become impossible, and the defendant must bear the loss or inconvenience caused by his wrongful intermixture. Low v. Martin, 18 Ill. 286.

Where it does not appear that either party was at fault in causing the commingling of property, but the mixture was made innocently and in good faith, some courts simply follow the general rule that where property cannot be identified or separated, so as to be seized in kind, replevin will not lie. Thus, it has been held that replevin cannot be maintained for cotton so mingled with other cotton in bales as to be incapable of identification, as division in kind cannot be made without injury to the other party, for, if a bail or bails be torn to pieces, the cotton would have to be rebaled at additional expense. McKennon v. May, 39 Ark. 442.

And replevin cannot be maintained for 49 hogs belonging to the plaintiff, which have been intermingled with others, and cannot be identified, but are described merely as such number out of a drove of 68 hogs then in the defendant's possession. Guille v. Wong Fook, 13 Or. 577, 11 Pac. 277.

This rule is followed, also, in some cases, even where the commingled property is all of the same kind and quality. Thus, it has been held that replevin cannot be maintained for logs so mingled with other logs in driving, that the plaintiff is unable to identify his specific property (Ames v. Mississippi Boom Co. 8 Minn. 467, Gil. 417); and that replevin cannot be maintained for corn delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant, a warehouseman, which the latter, with the consent of the plaintiff and for convenience and saving of storage, has put in mass with other corn owned by himself and others, with the understanding that a like quantity and quality of corn is to be delivered to the plaintiff out of the common mass in store, when required. Low v. Martin, supra.

And in Hull v. Hull, 1 Idaho, 361, it was held that replevin cannot be maintained for grain which is mixed with other grain of the same kind, so that it cannot be designated or separated therefrom, or delivered to the plaintiff, if he has made no demand for judgment for any amount of money in case the property cannot be delivered.

But, by the weight of authority, where the commingled goods are all of the same nature and value, so that a fair division can easily be made, although an actual separation by identifying the specific property of each part owner is impossible, any owner may recover his share of the bulk in an action of replevin. Read v. Middleton, 62 Iowa, 317, 17 N. W. 532; Grimes v. Cannell, 23 Neb. 187, 36 N. W. 479.

Thus, replevin may be maintained for a quantity of grain placed on storage in mass, or mixed, by common consent, in a crib, warehouse, or mill, with other similar grain, although the identical grain so contributed to the mass cannot be distinguished. Piazek v. White, 23 Kan. 621, 33 Am. Rep. 211 (corn); Grimes v. Cannell, supra (corn); Henderson v. Lauck, 21 Pa. 359 (corn); Young v. Miles, 20 Wis. 615 (wheat).

Likewise, replevin may be maintained for a quantity of crude oil belonging to the plaintiff, which has been mixed by a third person with like oil belonging to the defendant. Wilkinson v. Stewart, 85 Pa. 255, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 1.

And one whose logs, without his fault, have been mixed with those of another so that he cannot identify them, may maintain replevin for a quantity of logs out of the common mass, equal to the quantity owned by him, in the absence of evidence that his logs differed in description, quality, or value from those of the defendant, with which they were intermixed. Eldred v. Oconto Co. 33 Wis. 133.

So, replevin may be maintained for a certain number of pieces of timber called "headings," which have been innocently mingled with other headings of a like description and value, although the plaintiff does not identify his property, as in such a case he may recover a like number out of the whole lot. Reid v. King, 89 Ky. 388, 12 S. W. 772.

And replevin may be maintained for lumber which the defendant has caused to be manufactured from timber cut from land owned by the plaintiff, although the defendant has, in good faith, mingled such lumber with lumber of his own, of the same quality and value; and the plaintiff may recover a proportional share of the mass. Keweenaw Asso. v. Niel, 120 Mich. 270, 79 N. W. 183.

But where printing cloths have been sent to a printing establishment, the owners of which have on hand large quantities of similar goods of their own, and all the goods in the establishment are subsequently seized upon execution against the printers,—while the owners of the cloths so sent to them may maintain replevin therefor, if the printers have actually confused the plaintiff's goods with their own, so that those of each cannot be distinguished, yet, if the printers have not actually confused, but have disposed of, the plaintiff's goods, even though they had, at the time, goods of like character of their own, which they intended to put in their place, the plaintiff cannot maintain replevin therefor. Wood v. Fales, 24 Pa. 246, 64 Am. Dec. 655.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (Division No. 1.)

CLINTON COUNTY, Resp't.,

ELIAS T. SMITH et al.
and

(238 Mo. 118, 141 S. W. 1091.)

Bond — for money borrowed — collateral.

1. That payments by one who has borrowed money belonging to a school district,

Note. — Limitation of action: payment or promise by principal as extending limitation period as to surety.

This note includes cases where the statute of limitations was set up as a defense giving as security a bond secured by mortgage, were credited to him individually on the books of the district, and not indorsed on the bond, does not render the indebtedness one merely on open account against him, with the bond as collateral, so that the payments will not affect the running of the statute of limitations against the sureties on the bond.

Limitation of actions — payment by principal — effect upon sureties.

2. Payments on account by one who has given bond with sureties to secure money lent him by a school district, before the limitation period has expired, will toll the statute as against the sureties.

Laches — failure to enforce bond — effect on liability of surety.

3. Delay short of the limitation period in enforcing payment of a bond from the principal will not release the sureties from liability thereon.

(November 29, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant Hall from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clinton County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a school bond. Affirmed.

Statement by Woodson, J.:

This was a suit brought by the relator against the appellants on a school bond, executed by E. T. Smith as principal and E. C. Hall and Daniel Smith sureties, to recover the amount due thereon. The bond was for $500, bearing 8 per cent interest, and was secured by a mortgage or deed of

by a surety, indorser, or guarantor, but it does not cover cases where the acknowledgment, new promise, or payment was made by the personal representative or agent of a co-contractor, nor by a partner after dissolution of the partnership, nor by a guardian as against his ward, nor by an assignee in bankruptcy as against the debtor.

In General.

The question whether a partial payment by the principal debtor will suspend the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the surety is part of the broader question, i. e., whether a partial payment by one of two parties jointly and severally liable upon an instrument suspends the running of the statute in favor of the other. Steele v. Souder, 20 Kan. 39.

Three distinct and irreconcilable theories relating to the power of one joint maker or joint obligor to deprive the other of the defense of the statute of limitations have been announced. The first of these theories is that such a power exists. The courts announcing this doctrine have followed the rule of Chief Justice Mansfield in Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Dougl. K. B. 652. The entire decision of Lord Mansfield on the subject is as follows: "Payment by one is payment for all, the one acting virtually as agent for the rest; and in the same manner, an admission by one is an admission by all, and the law raises the promise to pay when the debt is admitted to be due." This opinion of Lord Mansfield has not met with universal approval, and many of the jurists of this country have not hesitated to discredit it as unsound.

The second theory enunciated on this subject by some of the judges of England, subsequently to the decision of Lord Mansfield above referred to, and by many of the courts of this country, is that one joint maker of a note has no power to deprive another joint maker of the defense of the statute of limitations. This second theory is ably supported by the exhaustive opinion of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. 351, 7 L. ed. 174. Among 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the many opinions in harmony with that of Mr. Justice Story is that of Mr. Justice Bronson in Van Keuren v. Parmelee, 2 N. Y. 528, 51 Am. Dec. 322, wherein is found an elaborate review of all the authorities on the question, and a vigorous denial of the soundness of the doctrine announced in Whitcomb v. Whiting, supra.

The third theory announced is that there does exist such a power, but that it ends when the legal term prescribed by the statute of limitations has elapsed. This latter doctrine is based on the ground that a community of interest, which alone makes the admission of one debtor binding on another, ceases whenever the statute of limitations takes effect, and leaves both in the position of mere strangers, not answerable for each other's words or acts. In other words, that, after the statute has barred a debt, the persons who were the debtors are no longer jointly concerned, or, as Judge Lamar expresses it in the case of Brewster v. Harde-man, Dudley (Ga.) 138, "time has severed the ligament that bound them together as joint debtors, and it cannot be reunited but by the consent of all."

And in this connection, it is interesting to note that the decision of Lord Mansfield in Whitcomb v. Whiting, supra, was in direct conflict with the decision of an English jurist rendered ninety years previously, in Bland v. Haselrig, 2 Vent. 151. Most of the cases on all the theories are collated in the notes to Whitcomb v. Whiting, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. pt. 2, p. 642. This discussion as to the three theories is taken from McLin v. Harvey, 8 Ga. App. 360, 69 S. E. 123.

It is believed, however, that the difference between the first theory as thus stated, and the third, is more nominal than real, and that there are actually only two theories,—one that the payment by the principal before the bar of the statute will interrupt it as to the surety, and the other that such a payment will not interrupt the statute. In other words, it is believed that the line of cleavage in the cases lies entirely within that class of cases where the payment was trust upon certain real estate described in the pleadings.

The suit was brought after various payments of the principal and interest had been paid; also after the real estate had been sold under the deed of trust, and the proceeds thereof had been credited thereon. There was still due thereon at that time approximately the sum of $714.55. The trial was had before the court without the intervention of a jury, which resulted in a judgment for the respondent and against the sureties for the penalty of the bond, and 8 per cent interest thereon until paid. E. T. Smith, the principal, was never served, and Daniel Smith suffered a judgment by default against him. After unsuccessfully moving for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, Hall appealed to this court.

The bond sued on was in the following words and figures:

State of Missouri, County of Clinton.

Know all men by these presents, that we, Elias T. Smith, as principal, and —, as sureties, jointly and severally firmly bind ourselves and our respective heirs, executors, and administrators to the county of Clinton, state of Missouri, in the sum of $500, to be paid to said county for the use and benefit of the school fund of township 54, range 30, of said county, to the payment whereof we jointly and severally bind our heirs, executors, and administrators firmly by these presents. Sealed with made before the bar of the statute attached, and that never, in any jurisdiction, at common law or under the statutes, has it been held that a payment by the principal after the bar of the statute would extend the statutory period as to a surety.

The principles upon which the common-law rule rested have been variously assigned, and perhaps can be grouped under four heads: (1) Quasi partnership. (2) Agency. (3) Community of interest. (4) Part payment as benefiting all, and therefore binding all.

Common-law rule abrogated.

In a majority of the jurisdictions it is held that payment or promise by the principal will not extend the statutory period as to the surety, and comparatively few of the cases observe any distinction in this respect between a payment or a promise made before the bar of the statute and one made afterwards. Those in which this distinction is made will be hereafter cited. Often there is nothing in the case to show whether the payment was made before or after the bar. Underwood v. Patrick, 36 C. C. A. 330, 94 Fed. 468 (security on mortgage; decided under Colorado statutes); Lowther v. Chappell, 8 Ala. 353, 42 Am. Dec. 643; Dean v. Munroe, 32 Ga. 28 (indorser); McBride v. Hunter, 64 Ga. 655 (security); Davis v. Mann, 43 Ill. App. 301; Robinson v. Briscoe, 55 Ill. App. 131; Lash v. Bozarth, 78 Ill. App. 196 (although surety urged principal to pay); Kallenbach v. Dickinson, 100 Ill. 427, 39 Am. Rep. 47; Deaton v. Deaton, 109 Ill. App. 7 (security or mortgage); Mozingo v. Ross, 150 Ind. 688, 41 L.R.A. 612, 65 Am. St. Rep. 387, 50 N. E. 867; Koontz v. Hammond, 21 Ind. App. 76, 51 N. E. 506; Meitzler v. Todd, 12 Ind. App. 381, 54 Am. St. Rep. 531, 39 N. E. 1046; Dougherty v. Hoffstetter, 12 Ind. App. 699, 40 N. E. 278; Drake v. Stuart, 87 Iowa, 341, 54 N. W. 223; Root v. Bradley, 1 Kan. 437 (payment allowed by administrator of deceased principal, who was also surety); Steele v. Souder, 20 Kan. 39; McMillan v. Leeds, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

58 Kan. 815, 49 Pac. 159; Peru Plough & Wheel Co. v. Ward, 6 Kan. App. 289, 51 Pac. 805.

In Louisiana it seems that a payment or acknowledgment by the maker of a note does not interrupt prescription as to an indorser. Jacobs v. Williams, 12 Rob. (La.) 183; McCalop v. Newcomb, 2 La. Ann. 332; Hickman v. Stafford, 2 La. Ann. 792; Citizens' Bank v. Murdock, 22 La. Ann. 130.

But the rule in Louisiana seems to be otherwise in case of a surety. Bloom v. Kern, 30 La. Ann. 1263.

Also as to security on mortgage. Cucullu v. Hernandez, 103 U. S. 105, 26 L. ed. 322; Cockfield v. Farley, 21 La. Ann. 521; Collier v. His Creditors, 12 Rob. (La.) 398.

In none of these cases was there any reference to a distinction between payments before the bar of the statute and those after.

The rule in Maine would now probably agree with these decisions, although no case has been found under the Revised Statutes. For the common-law rule in Maine, see under heading "Common-law rule followed," infra.

The following decisions also repudiate the common-law rule: Faulkner v. Bailey, 123 Mass. 588; Stickney v. Eaton, 14 Allen, 108 (acceptor of draft). Both these Massachusetts cases were decided under the Revised Statutes. The rule there was different at common law. For the opposite holdings, see under heading "Common-law rule followed," infra. See also heading, "Distinction observed," infra. Home L. Ins. Co. v. Elwell, 111 Mich. 689, 70 N. W. 334; Borden v. Fletcher, 131 Mich. 220, 91 N. W. 145 (where surety urged principal to make the payments); Godde v. Marvin, 142 Mich. 518, 105 N. W. 1112 (where surety was present at time payment was made). But the opposite rule was adopted in Mainzinger v. Mohr, 41 Mich. 685, 3 N. W. 183, where principal and surety went together to the creditor and co-operated in making a payment, and nothing was said as to whose money it was; it bound the surety as well as the principal. Regan v. Williams, 88 Mo. App. 577, affirmed in 185 Mo. 620, our seals, and dated the 1st day of September, A. D. 1890. The conditions of this bond are: That whereas, the said Elias T. Smith, principal, has this day borrowed from said county the sum of $500, belonging to the capital school fund of township 54, range 30, of said county, which said sum of money the said principal and sureties agree to pay to said county for the use and benefit of the said township school fund, on or before the — day of —, A. D. 18 —, with interest thereon from the date hereof until paid, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, said interest to be paid annually on the — day of — of each and every year until the whole debt shall be paid off and discharged: Now, therefore, if the principal and sureties shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid the said sum of money borrowed and the interest thereon according to the tenor and effect of this bond, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise, it shall remain in full force. But it is expressly agreed and understood that all interest not punctually paid when due shall, when due, be added to the principal, and shall bear interest at the same rate as the principal until paid. And it is further agreed and understood as a condition of this bond that, should default be made in the payment of the interest when due, or should the principal of this bond fail to give additional security hereunto when lawfully required, in either case both the principal and interest shall become due and payable.

105 Am. St. Rep. 600, 84 S. W. 950, and the affirming decision expressly overruling Bender v. Markle, 37 Mo. App. 234. In this case the principal was the vendee of lands, who had assumed a mortgage upon the same, and the surety was the vendor, but they were held not to be joint promisors. State ex rel. Shipman v. Allen, 132 Mo. App. 98, 111 S. W. 622 (surety considered the instrument invalid, and had protested); Corbyn v. Brokmeyer, 84 Mo. App. 649 (guarantor); Maddox v. Duncan, 143 Mo. 613, 41 L.R.A. 581, 65 Am. St. Rep. 678, 45 N. W. 688, reversing 62 Mo. App. 474 (indorser); Monroe v. Herrington, 110 Mo. App. 509, 85 S. W. 1002 (indorser). But in Missouri the rule is different in the case of a surety on a bond. See under heading, "Common-law rule followed," infra. See also under heading, "Distinction observed," infra. Lang v. Gage, 65 N. H. 173, 18 Atl. 795 (payments made by surety for the principal); Newell v. Clark, 73 N. H. 289, 61 Atl. 555; Mason v. Kilcourse, 71 N. J. L. 472, 59 Atl. 21 (indorser); Gould v. Cayuga County Nat. Bank, 86 N. Y. 75; Littlefield v. Littlefield, 91 N. Y. 203, 43 Am. Rep. 663 (surety sent word to principal that he must pay as much as he could); Ulster County Sav. Inst. v. Deyo, 116 App. Div. 1, 101 N. Y. Supp. 263, affirmed in 191 N. Y. 505, 84 N. E. 1122; Akin v. Van Wirt, 124 App. Div. 83, 108 N. Y. Supp. 327 (surety told principal he must keep the interest paid); Fowler v. Wood, 78 Hun. 304, 28 N. Y. Supp. 976, affirmed in 150 N. Y. 584, 44 N. E. 1124 (security on mortgage); Re Petrie, 82 Hun. 62, 31 N. Y. Supp. 65; Re Sanders, 4 Misc. 343, 24 N. Y. Supp. 317; Lane v. Doty, 4 Barb. 530 (payment after death of surety); McMullen v. Rafferty, 89 N. Y. 456, affirming 24 Hun. 363 (guarantor, payments made with his knowledge); Harper v. Fairley, 53 N. Y. 442 (indorser). But the rule is different in New York when payment is made at the request of the surety. Munro v. Potter, 34 Barb. 358; Winchell v. Hicks, 18 N. Y. 558; or where the surety later ratifies the payment. First Nat. Bank v. Ballou, 49 N. Y. 155, affirming 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Huntington v. Ballou, 2 Lans. 120; Meade v. McDowell, 5 Binn. 195 (guarantor); Frazer v. D'Inwilliers, 2 Pa. St. 200, 44 Am. Dec. 190 (indorser); Furst v. Building & L. Asso. 128 Pa. 183, 18 Atl. 341 (guarantor). But it has been held that payment of interest made during the joint responsibility of both, i. e., before the death of either, is constructive acknowledgment as to the surety, and interrupts the statute as to him. Zent v. Heart, 8 Pa. 337; Browning v. Tucker, 9 R. I. 500 (guarantor). The rule seems to be different in Rhode Island, however, in respect to sureties. See under heading, "Common-law rule followed," infra. Walters v. Kraft, 23 S. C. 578, 55 Am. Rep. 44. See also South Carolina decisions under heading, "Distinction observed," infra; Bassett v. Thrall, 21 Wash. 231, 57 Pac. 806; Coleman v. Ward, 85 Wis. 328, 55 N. W. 695.

In a few cases following this rule, however, although the court makes no point of the distinction between payments before and those after the bar, yet the facts show that the payments were made before the bar attached. Branch Bank v. Lanier, 7 Ala. 595; Hunter v. Robertson & Robertson, 30 Ga. 479 (indorser); McLin v. Harvey, 8 Ga. App. 360, 69 S. E. 123.

And in one case under this rule the facts show that the payment was made after the bar. Christian v. State, 7 Ind. App. 417, 34 N. E. 825.

In several of the cases no importance is given the distinction, and the argument of the court seems to imply that the distinction does not matter; that the rule would be the same whether the payments were before or after the bar. Lowther v. Chappell, 8 Ala. 353, 42 Am. Dec. 643; Hunter v. Robertson & Robertson, 30 Ga. 479 (indorser); McLin v. Harvey, 8 Ga. App. 360, 69 S. E. 123; Kallenbach v. Dickinson, 100 Ill. 427, 39 Am. Rep. 47; Mozingo v. Ross, 150 Ind. 688, 41 L.R.A. 612, 65 Am. St. Rep. 387, 50 N. E. 867; Steele v. Souder, 20 Kan. 39; Jacobs v. Williams, 12 Rob. (La.) 183 (indorser); Mason v. Kilcourse, 71 N. J. L. 472, 59 Atl. 21.

Then followed the signatures of the parties. While the bond is not dated, yet the petition stated, and the evidence showed, that the bond was executed on September 1, 1890.

Counsel for appellant, Hall, asked the following declarations of law, which were by the court refused:

"(1) The court, sitting as a jury, declares the law to be that under the pleadings and evidence in this case the finding must be for the defendant E. C. Hall.

"(2) The court, sitting as a jury, declares the law to be that under the evidence the liability of the defendant E. C. Hall on the instrument sued on was a collateral liability, and that the payment of part of the interest thereon by the principal, E. T. Smith, did not prevent the running of the statute of limitations as to the said defendant E. C. Hall.

"(3) The court, sitting as a jury, declares the law to be that if the court finds that the defendant E. C. Hall was surety on the bond sued on, and further finds that by the laches of the plaintiff or its agent, the county court, the said E. C. Hall was injured, then such surety should be relieved from liability to the extent of such injury, if any."

The court made a special finding of facts and gave certain conclusions of law, which were as follows: "I have carefully considered the defense based upon the statute of limitations. The bond is dated September 1, 1890, and the penalty of $500. Mr.

Common-law rule followed.

In a few jurisdictions, however, the common-law rule is still adhered to, that a payment or promise by the principal will extend the statutory period as to the surety (Clark v. Sigourney, 17 Conn. 511; Caldwell v. Sigourney, 19 Conn. 37); so in Maine before the Revised Statutes went into effect (Pike v. Warren, 15 Me. 390, implied; Shepley v. Waterhouse, 22 Me. 497; Patch v. King, 29 Me. 448); and even since the Revised Statutes, where a surety made a payment on a note out of money received from the sale of property pledged to him by the principal debtor as an indemnification against loss to him, but did not inform the holder of the note that the money was not his own, the payment was held to have suspended the statute as to such surety (Holmes v. Durell, 51 Me. 201). But Gardiner v. Nutting, 5 Me. 140, 17 Am. Dec. 211, is opposed, where the guarantor was also commissioner of the estate of the principal, and as such allowed the note as a claim against such estate. The result would now probably be different in Maine, although no actual distinction has been found under the Revised Statutes.

In Massachusetts, the early cases were decided according to the rule at common law. Hunt v. Bridgham, 2 Pick. 581, 13 Am. Dec. 458; Frye v. Barker, 4 Pick. 382; Sigourney v. Drury, 14 Pick. 387. The rule in Massachusetts under the Revised Statutes is different. See under heading, "Common-law rule abrogated," supra, and infra, "Distinctions observed."

In Missouri, payments on a bond by the principal stop the running of the statute as to the surety. Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94; Lawrence County use of School Twp. No. 10 v. Dunkle, 35 Mo. 395; CLINTON COUNTY v. SMITH; but in Missouri the rule is different as to a surety who is not a joint promisor, or as to one who considers the instrument invalid, or as to a guarantor or an indorser. See under heading, "Common-law rule abrogated," supra, and infra, "Distinctions observed."

common-law rule. Green v. Greensboro Female College, 83 N. C. 449, 35 Am. Rep. 579; Moore v. Goodwin, 109 N. C. 218, 13 S. E. 772; Copeland v. Collins, 122 N. C. 619, 30 S. E. 315; Moore v. Carr, 123 N. C. 425, 31 S. E. 832 (indorser); Garrett v. Reeves, 125 N. C. 529, 34 S. E. 636. But it has been held that when both signed as comakers, in order to take advantage of the statute after payment by the principal, the surety must prove that the creditor had knowledge of the suretyship (Goodman v. Litaker, 84 N. C. 8, 37 Am. Rep. 602; Torrence v. Alexander, 85 N. C. 143); but he may show this by parol evidence (Welfare v. Thompson, 83 N. C. 276); he may also show by parol evidence the fact of the suretyship (Cole v. Fix, 83 N. C. 463, and cases cited). Also it has been held that giving a new bond for the balance due on the original was not such an acknowledgment as to take the case out of the statute as to an indorser on the original (Topping v. Blount, 33 N. C. [11 Ired. L.] 62); also payment upon a draft by an acceptor will not interrupt the statute as to the drawer; their contracts are wholly unlike (Wood v. Barber, 90 N. C. 76). See also under heading, "Distinction observed," infra.

The common-law rule is also adopted in Ohio. Glick v. Crist, 37 Ohio St. 388 (surety standing by at the time of the payment and making no statement); also in Partlow v. Singer, 2 Or. 307; Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 528, 35 L. ed. 843, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; Perkins v. Barstow, 6 R. I. 505; Woonsocket Inst. for Savings v. Ballou, 16 R. I. 351, 1 L.R.A. 555, 16 Atl. 144. The court states in this case that although the rule there announced is at variance with the rule now prevailing in the United States, yet it is too firmly settled in that state to be altered by anything short of a statute. The rule in Rhode Island seems to be different in respect to a guarantor. See under heading, "Common-law rule abrogated," supra.

The common-law rule is also followed in McConnell v. Merrill, 53 Vt. 140, 38 Am. Rep. 663, where the surety procured a sale

Smith, the principal, on January 7, 1891, paid $13.30; February 3, 1892, $40; October 5, 1897, $70; October 7, 1903, $20; December 9, 1904, $20; April 3, 1906, $200; and the sale of the mortgaged premises produced a net credit on the bond of $192.20, December 5, 1906. Mr. Hall has paid nothing on the bond, and has never acknowledged the debt. In this case Daniel Smith's and E. C. Hall's signatures appear at the foot of the instrument after Elias T. Smith's, and, although the recitals do not show in what capacity Daniel Smith and Mr. Hall acted, they are, beyond question, not principals, but sureties; but, being sureties, signing the bond with their principal, and at the same time, they made the identical contract which he made, and, under the issues here, are bound to the precise extent to which he is bound. They are all payors and comakers. There is therefore no escape from the conclusion that this case is governed by Vernon County use of School Fund v. Stewart, 64 Mo. 408, 27 Am. Rep. 250, the ten-year limitation (§ 4272, Rev. Stat. 1899) is not available to defendants, and the finding and judgment must be for plaintiff.

"Plaintiff has alleged that the amount due on the bond was on September 21, 1906, $714.55. A computation of principal, interest, and credits shows that on June 10, 1904, when action was brought, $685.92 was the amount of the debt. The best authorities are to the effect that the liability of the surety at the time recourse is had to the bond is limited to the penalty of the bond. If, after that, the surety fails or refuses to pay, he is liable for interest and damages for detention of the fund. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 453; Bank of Brighton v. Smith, 12 Allen, 243, 90 Am. Dec. 144; Pennsylvania Co. v. Swain, 189 Pa. 626, 42 Atl. 297; Folz v. Tradesmen's Trust & Sav. Fund Co. 201 Pa. 583, 51 Atl. 379; Thomas Laughlin Co. v. American Surety Co. 51 C. C. A. 247, 114 Fed. 627. Judgment, therefore, will go for the plaintiff for the amount of the penalty of the bond, with interest after service of summons, June 12, 1907, at 8 per cent per annum, the contract rate, $538.55."

Mr. W. S. Herndon, for appellant, and Mr. E. C. Hall, in propria persona:

The undertaking of the surety being collateral to the loan, a payment on the loan made by Smith could in no wise interrupt the statute of limitations as to such surety.

of the principal debtor's property, and at the same time promised to pay the balance on the note, and then had the proceeds of the sale indorsed on the note.

And in Green v. Morris, 58 Vt. 35, 4 Atl. 561, where the surety went with the creditor to the principal, and told the latter that something must be paid on the note; the principal handed the surety some money, the surety handed it to the creditor, and he indorsed it as from the surety.

Distinction observed between payments before and those after the bar of the statute.

In a few jurisdictions a distinction is observed between payments made before the bar of the statute and those made afterwards. In these jurisdictions a payment or promise made by the principal before the bar has attached will suspend the running of the statute as to the surety but payments or promises made afterwards will not. Schindel v. Gates, 46 Md. 604, 24 Am. Rep. 526; Hooper v. Hooper, 81 Md. 155, 48 Am. St. Rep. 496, 31 Atl. 508; Whitaker v. Rice, 9 Minn. 13, Gil. 1, 86 Am. Dec. 78; Northwest Thresher Co. v. Dahltorp, 104 Minn. 130, 116 N. W. 106 (the distinction is not made very prominent in this case); Smith v. Caldwell, 15 Rich. L. 365.

In some other jurisdictions this distinction very probably holds, though not often made emphatic. It clearly holds in 77 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the following cases: Sigourney v. Drury, 14 Pick. 387; Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94; Green v. Greensboro Female College, 83 N. C. 449, 35 Am. Rep. 579. See other decisions from these states, supra, where the distinction was not referred to.

In fact this distinction is likely observed in all those states where the common-law rule has not been changed by statute. This is stated as a fact in Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 528, 35 L. ed. 843, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67, but often there is no special stress laid upon it in the case, and very many times it is not even referred to.

England.

Several early English decisions follow Whitcomb v. Whiting, 2 Dougl. K. B. 652, and apply the rule to cases of principal and surety, holding that payment or promise by the principal interrupts the statute as to the surety.

An acknowledgment of a maker of a note was held to take it out of the statute as to the surety. Perham v. Raynal, 9 J. B. Moore, 566, 2 Bing. 306, 3 L. J. C. P. 271. This case was decided subsequently to Atkins v. Tredgold, infra, but it reinstates the authority of Whitcomb v. Whiting, supra, and holds it to be sound doctrine as to a judgment. Justice Best says in this case that two of the judges in Atkins v. Tredgold have thrown out dicta impugning the authority of Whitcomb v. Whiting, but that their expressions are only dicta, and

Woodson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Counsel for appellant make and discuss many legal propositions in their briefs, but, in the view we take of the case, it is only necessary to notice two of them, namely, the statute of limitations and the alleged laches of the plaintiff in not bringing its suit at an earlier date.

We will consider those questions in the order stated. The record shows that E. T. Smith, the principal in the bond, made the following payments at the dates stated, namely: January 7, 1891, $13.30; February 3, 1892, $10; February 6, 1893, $40; January 15, 1894, $40; October 5, 1897, $70; October 7, 1903, $20; December 9, 1904, $20; April 3, 1906, $192.20, the proceeds of the sale of the land under the deed of trust. This record shows that, instead of those payments being indorsed upon the bond, the clerk of the county court, whenever a payment was made, would give Smith, the principal in the bond, credit therefor on the records of the court.

From that course of dealing, counsel for appellant, Hall, seem to have reached the conclusion that Smith, the principal in the bond, was indebted to the county for the use of the school district on an open account, and that the bond sued on and executed by E. T. Smith and the sureties was only a collateral agreement to pay that account. Manifestly that is the view of appellant's counsel, as clearly appears from the second declaration of law asked by them. With all due respect for their ability and legal learning, we are constrained to take a different view of the transaction. The record nowhere shows that E. T. Smith was indebted to the county on account for any sum for any purpose, but it does show that he borrowed from the county on September 27, 1906, $100.00, for the purpose of paying the interest on the bond. That the two other judges abstained from saying anything to the same effect. He also says that Bland v. Haselrig, 2 Vent. 152, ought not to have weight, for one of the judges differed and the decision was erroneous, except that the verdict found precluded any other judgment.

To the same effect, see Burleigh v. Stott, 2 Mann. & R. 93, 8 Barn. & C. 36, 6 L. J. K. B. 232; Re Powers, L. R. 30 Ch. Div. 291, 53 L. T. N. S. 647; Re Frisby, L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 106, 59 L. J. Ch. N. S. 94, 61 L. T. N. S. 632, 38 Week. Rep. 65; Dowling v. Ford, 11 Mees. & W. 329, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 342.

The common-law rule has been changed in England by several limitation acts. An early act of great consequence was the so-called Lord Tentenden's act (Act 9, Geo. IV, chap. 14), providing that an acknowledgment or promise must be in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby, and that no joint contractor shall be bound by such an acknowledgment or promise made by another, but that payment shall have the same effect as before the act. This forms the basis of most statutes of limitations in the United States.

The mercantile law amendment act (Act 19 & 20 Vict. chap. 97, § 14), went farther, and provided that no co-contractor should lose the benefit of the statute of limitations, so as to be chargeable because of any payment made by another.

(Act 37 & 38 Vict. chap. 57), applies to mortgagors, mortgagees, and persons holding other interests in real property.

Under these statutes English decisions have generally departed from the rule laid down in Whitcomb v. Whiting, supra. Thus, where, after the death of the surety, the principal paid interest upon the note, it was held not to take the case out of the statute as to the executors of the surety. The doctrine of Whitcomb v. Whiting cannot be extended to a case like this. In the former case, all parties were alive when the payment was made. Atkins v. Tredgold, 2 Barn. & C. 23, 3 Dowl. & R. 200, 1 L. J. K. B. 228, 26 Revised Rep. 254.

To the same effect, see Cockrill v. Sparke, 1 Hurlst & C. 699, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 118, 9 Jur. N. S. 307, 7 L. T. N. S. 752, 11 Week. Rep. 428; Wolmershausen v. Wolmershausen, 62 L. T. N. S. 541, 38 Week. Rep. 537.

—Ontario.

After the death of a surety on a promissory note, a payment was made upon it by the maker out of his own money and on his own behalf, and he was sole executor of the deceased surety; the court held that this payment did not take the debt out of the statute as regarded the estate of the latter. Paxton v. Smith, 18 Ont. Rep. 178.

H. C. Sh.

tember 1, 1890, $500 of the school district mentioned, and that he executed the bond in suit therefor with Daniel Smith and E. C. Hall as sureties. In so far as the county is concerned, all three are to be considered as joint promisors, and the payment of any sum on the bond by the principal before the statute of limitations runs is binding upon all of them alike.

This is fully settled by this court by the case of Vernon County use of School Fund v. Stewart, 64 Mo. 408, 27 Am. Rep. 250. There, as here, the suit was one of these school bonds, and the defense was the statute of limitations, the same as here. The bond in that case was executed January 15, 1860, and some four or five years thereafter the principal in the bond died, and the administrator of his estate was duly appointed and qualified. The bond was duly presented to the probate court for allowance, and was by that court allowed June 7, 1867, and assigned to the third class of demands; and on December 2, 1869, the administrator of said estate paid on said demand the sum of $44.33. Some time after January 15, 1870, and prior to December, 1874, suit was brought on said bond against the sureties to recover the balance remaining due thereon. As before stated, the ten-year statute of limitations was interposed as a defense by the sureties.

In discussing that question, on page 410 of 64 Mo. the court, in speaking through Sherwood, Ch. J., said: "Repeated decisions of this court have settled the matter beyond controversy that the payment of a portion of a debt evidenced by a promissory note or similar obligation, by one of the payors before the expiration of the statutory period, would prevent the operation of the statute against the comaker as well as the party paying. Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94; Lawrence County use of School Twp. No. 10 v. Dunkle, 35 Mo. 395; Block v. Dorman, 51 Mo. 31. And no reason is seen why the same principle is not applicable where, as in the present instance, the legal representative of one of the makers makes a similar payment. The statute, after treating of new promises and acknowledgments in writing, and the effect to be given them, explicitly provides: 'Nothing contained in the two preceding sections shall alter, take away, or lessen the effect of a payment of principal or interest by any person' [Wagner, Stat. 1872, chap. 89, art. 2, § 30],—thus clearly showing that the legislature intended to make, and did make, a marked distinction between the attendant results of promises or acknowledgments on the one hand and the partial payments on the other. And if that language just quoted will not comprehend the payment by an administrator, it is difficult to see what language, short of a direct designation of the administrator, would be sufficiently comprehensive to accomplish that result. Had Clinton, the principal in the bond, remained alive and made the payment referred to, no doubt could arise, under the foregoing decisions, but that such payments would effectually prevent the operation of the statute as to the defendant. Can it alter the nature of the case, because the duty of paying the debt is devolved upon the administrator, rather than, and instead of, the decedent? We are clear that it cannot. If the defendant, instead of the administrator, had made the payment, could it be seriously doubted that he would have recourse against the estate of his principal? Upon what theory would such recovery be founded, except that of the continued existence of the mutuality and privity incident to the contract at the time of its formation? In McClurg v. Howard, 45 Mo. 365, 100 Am. Dec. 378, it was held that, although the partnership was dissolved, yet a partial payment before the statute had run by Howard's former copartners would take the case out of the statute as to him. And it would seem obvious that the dissolution of a partnership could accomplish no less towards sundering existing relations than the death of one of two or more joint obligors. The cases of Chrisman v. Irwin, 37 Mo. 169, 90 Am. Dec. 375, and that of Cape Girardeau County use of Road & Canal Fund v. Harbison, 58 Mo. 90, have not the slightest applicability here; because in neither case had any payment been made by the administrator. In the former an allowance was had against the estate of one of the makers, after the statute had attached, and in the latter case the administrator had, in making a deed of trust, acknowledged, after the claim was barred, the existence of the debt. Any remarks, therefore, in those cases, which are dehors the controlling facts incident to each, cannot be deemed as possessed of any authoritative value."

In the case at bar we are not required to go to the same length that this court did in that case. Here E. T. Smith, the principal in the bond, made the payments on the bond in person, before the statute had run, and not by his administrator, as was done in the case cited. By the case of Regan v. Williams, 185 Mo. loc. cit. 628, 105 Am. St. Rep. 600, 84 S. W. 960, the rule in the case last cited is somewhat limited, and rightfully so, in my opinion, yet that limitation does not affect the case at bar, but restates the rule more clearly than any case which I have been able to find. In that case the court said: "2. In reply to the defense that the statute of limitations had run against the note before this action was begun, plaintiff asserts that the payments of interest by the Scott Investment Company and Carey to March 21, 1892, prevented the running of the statute, not only in favor of said parties, but of the defendant as well. The ruling that payment by a principal will suspend the statute as to a surety is invoked as applicable, because, by operation of law, the subsequent grantees of the land covered by the deed of trust became principals and the defendant a surety. The proposition contended for is sound enough, generally speaking. Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94; McClurg v. Howard, 45 Mo. 365, 100 Am. Dec. 378; Block v. Dorman, 51 Mo. 31; Vernon County use of School Fund v. Stewart, 64 Mo. 408, 27 Am. Rep. 250; Bennett v. McCanse, 65 Mo. 194. These payments were made while the note was still alive, and the rule is well established that payments made by the principal, or by one of several joint obligors, before the debt is barred, will stop the statute. But the reason why a payment by the principal stops it as to a surety is not because one is principal and the other surety, but because both are usually joint promisors; that is, the surety is affected by the act of the principal in his capacity as a joint promisor. The idea is that persons who jointly bind themselves are all liable to the promisee by virtue of their original agreement, so that performance or part performance by one is the act of all. Sigourney v. Drury, 14 Pick. 387; Brandram v. Wharton, 1 Barn. & Ald. 463, 19 Revised Rep. 354, 357; Atkins v. Tredgold, 2 Barn. & C. 23, 3 Dowl. & R. 200, 1 L. J. K. B. 228, 26 Revised Rep. 254. The principle only applies where the payment was made by one originally liable. Sigourney v. Drury, supra." And in Maddox v. Duncan, 143 Mo. loc. cit. 621, 41 L.R.A. 581, 65 Am. St. Rep. 678, 45 S. W. 690, this court said: "In Craig v. Callaway County Ct. 12 Mo. 94, it was ruled that the payment of interest by one of several joint obligors in a bond before the statute of limitation attaches takes it out of the statute of limitations as to the others. So it was held in Vernon County use of School Fund v. Stewart, 64 Mo. 408, 27 Am. Rep. 250, that part payment made upon a bond by the administrator of one of the joint makers within the statutory period would prevent the running of the statute of limitation in favor of the other makers of the bond. And in Bennett v. McCanse, 65 Mo. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

194, it was intimated that part payment of a note by a comaker will arrest the running of the statute as against all the parties to the note. The same rule was announced in Bender v. Markle, 37 Mo. App. 234. When this case was before the St. Louis court of appeals (Maddox v. Duncan, 62 Mo. App. 474), Rombauer, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In Leach v. Asher, 20 Mo. App. 656, and Zervis v. Unnerstall, 29 Mo. App. 474, we reviewed the decisions in this state on that subject, and were forced to conclude that the rule as stated in Craig v. Callaway County Ct., supra, was the rule prevailing in this state, whatever the rule may be in other jurisdictions." If we follow the rule announced in the foregoing cases, then we must hold in the case at bar that the respondent's cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations, for the reason that the payments were made by E. T. Smith, the principal in the bond, which is binding upon his sureties or joint promisors; and the mere fact that the payments were entered upon the records of the county court, instead of the bond itself, does not change the legal effect of the payments.

We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court properly refused the second declaration of law asked by counsel for appellant.

2. It is finally insisted by counsel for appellant that respondent should be debarred of a right of recovery for the reason that it has been guilty of laches by the great delay in bringing this suit. This claim is clearly devoid of all merit, for the simple reason that the record shows that, in so far as the respondent is concerned, the principal in the bond, E. T. Smith, and the sureties, Daniel Smith and E. C. Hall, were joint promisors, and, under those facts, it was no more the duty of the respondent to sue E. T. Smith, one of the makers, in the absence of the statutory notice, than it was to sue the other two joint promisors, Hall and Smith, and the mere delay, short of the statutory period of limitation, in suing any one of them, will not release the others.

Moreover, in so far as the respondent is concerned, it was just as much the duty of appellant, Hall, to go and pay off and satisfy the bond as it was the duty of E. T. Smith. This is elementary, and has been so frequently adjudicated by this and other courts of the state, that it would be a useless waste of time to cite additional authorities in support thereof.

If appellant objected to delay of respondent, why did he not pay off and discharge the bond as he agreed to do, and then look to E. T. Smith, who as between themselves were not joint promisors? By so doing, the school district would have lost nothing, nor would the appellant, for the reason that he could by proper proceedings have subjected the real estate conveyed by the deed of trust to the county to secure the loan, and thereby have reimbursed himself for the money so paid by him on the bond, which was more than ample for that purpose, if the evidence offered upon that point by appellant is true.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

All concur.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

RE CITY OF NEW YORK, Relative to Opening Decatur Street.

RE PETITION OF FRANK B. WALKER, Appt.,

v.

JOHN SCHAUF et al., Respts.

(196 N. Y. 286, 89 N. E. 829.)

Eminent domain — fee of street.

1. Nominal damages only should be awarded the owner of the fee and the abutting owners, in case of the taking by the city of the fee of a street which had been platted by the owner, who had sold all the lots upon the street, so that a perpetual easement in it had been dedicated to the lot owners.

Same — excessive damages — distribution.

2. The court of appeals will not participate in the division of a fund which had been awarded for opening a street, where none of the claimants are shown to be entitled to more than nominal damages.

(November 9, 1909.) *

APPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming an order of a special term for Kings County directing payment to the abutting owners of certain awards made for lands taken by the city in condemnation proceedings. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. John M. Perry, for appellant:

The court below erred in holding as matter of law that the fee had only a nominal value.

Osborne v. Auburn Teleph. Co. 189 N. Y. 397, 82 N. E. 428; Trowbridge v. Ehrlich, 191 N. Y. 364, 84 N. E. 297; Re 11th Ave. 81 N. Y. 436.

Note. — Damages on condemnation of the fee of land over which there is an existing highway.

In the note to Re New York (Briggs Ave.) 36 L.R.A. 273, the right to allowance for improvements made with knowledge property would be required for public use is discussed.

The question whether the owner of an easement of way over another's land is entitled to compensation where the land is taken for the purposes of a public highway is discussed in the note to Clayton v. Gilmer County Court, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 598.

The point here annotated has been the subject of discussion heretofore in a note to Re Buffalo, 15 L.R.A. 413, to which attention is directed for the earlier cases.

In the earlier note the conflict in the New York cases was noted.

Where owner of fee is not abutting owner.

Now, however, it seems to be well settled, according to the decision in RE NEW YORK (DECATUR STREET), that when the owner of the fee of the street has sold all the property abutting thereon, retaining in himself only the naked, unproductive fee, he is only entitled to nominal damages when this naked fee is condemned.

Re Schneider, 199 N. Y. 581, 92 N. E. 791, affirming on the point 136 App. Div. 444, 121 N. Y. Supp. 9, although reversing it on others, specifically states that "the determination of all the substantial questions involved on this appeal is controlled by our decision in RE NEW YORK (DECATUR STREET), and that substantial damages were erroneously awarded in the condemnation proceedings when, as now appears, no claimant was entitled to more than nominal damages."

In Re Johnson Ave. 135 App. Div. 630, 120 N. Y. Supp. 798, affirmed in 198 N. Y. 505, 92 N. E. 1087, and following RE NEW YORK (DECATUR STREET), where property owners pending proceedings by the city to condemn their property for street purposes began partition proceedings for a considerable tract of land, including the land named as an avenue on the city map, and filed a map showing the property "as divided into lots fronting and abutting on Johnson avenue, as laid out on the city map," but the avenue itself was not indicated as a portion of the property to be partitioned, but was retained by the owners in common, it was held that the purchasers of abutting lots, whose deeds recited and recognized the avenue as a boundary, were entitled to an easement of passage over the avenue, and that upon the passage of the title to the land to the city only nominal damages should be awarded the owners of the fee. In this case it was said: "It is not important that the common owners and the referee so bounded the abutting property as to retain title to the street. The only effect of that was that the abutting owners took no absolute title to the street, and that the common owners retained the right to receive whatever compensation should be legally awarded. It did not affect the amount of the award. The resolution of the board of public improvements directs that the whole cost be assessed back upon the property benefited, which means in effect that the abutting property must bear it. The presumption is that the abutting owners or their predecessors in title have already paid, and the common owners have already received in an enhanced price paid for the lots, compensation for the use of the street. 'It was the street that gave a character and recommendation to the lots, and enhanced the value of the adjoining property. This is the natural consequence of opening streets in the vicinity of a city, where population is increasing and constantly extending itself over a greater space of territory.'

The court below erred in assuming to import an irrelevant equity in favor of the abutter.

Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 606; 2 Desty, Taxn. 1237, 1238; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 496; Re Mead, 74 N. Y. 221; 1 Hare, Am. Const. Law, 310; French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 181 U. S. 324, 45 L. ed. 879, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625; Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 43 L. ed. 443, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187.

Where a street was laid out on a city map, and was not inclosed or subjected to any private use, but was used by the public as a means of access to the lots on either side of it, although not formally opened, it was held in Re West 177th Street, 135 App. Div. 520, 120 N. Y. Supp. 354, order affirmed on later appeal in 130 N. Y. Supp. 1134, where the owner of land in the street had himself put in pipes and conductors commonly put under the surface of streets, and had sold the property in question in contemplation of the opening of a street by the city, to parties who were to build thereon and reconvey to the grantor, that the grantees acquired an implied right of way over the street to the property, notwithstanding the grantor reserved to himself the land within the lines of the street and any award which might be made therefor; and that when the street was formally opened by the city, the grantor was only entitled to nominal damages for his naked fee.

An owner of land on a proposed mapped street "named Beverly Road," who conveys lots as bordering thereon, is entitled to nothing but nominal damages for the fee of the street when it is formally opened by the city, since by reason of his previous dedication of it as a street it is of no remaining use to him. Re Beverly Road, 131 App. Div. 147, 115 N. Y. Supp. 208, on other points in 132 App. Div. 897, 116 N. Y. Supp. 1131, and 133 App. Div. 927, 118 N. Y. Supp. 1095. Gaynor, J., distinguishes the case from Buffalo v. Pratt, 131 N. Y. 293, 15 L.R.A. 413, 27 Am. St. Rep. 592, 30 N. E. 233 (set out in RE NEW YORK) 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The appellant has no interest in the (DECATUR STREET), on the ground that in the Buffalo Case the abutting owner owned the strip in the city which the city was taking the fee of, whereas in the Beverly Road Case the strip never passed by the conveyance to the abutting owner, but remained a nominal and useless thing in the original tract proprietor. And the same learned justice said: "Moreover, it is an open question, if it be a question at all, whether by the taking, even where the abutting owner owns to the center of the street, of the fee by the city, but only 'in trust' for street uses, by the present charter of the city (§ 990), anything more is taken than by a taking of an easement for all street uses. The difference in substance between the two takings seems to be imperceptible. The fee is not taken absolutely, but only in trust for, and limited to such street uses. Re New York, 45 Misc. 162, 91 N. Y. Supp. 894."

There is strong dictum in Re Carroll Street, 137 App. Div. 39, 121 N. Y. Supp. 435, to the effect that one owning nothing but a naked fee in a street which has been thrown open to the use of abutting owners is only entitled to nominal damages when the fee is taken for street purposes. Thus: "Assuming that the appellant acquired title to the street by her deed, she was, after she conveyed to . . . the owner of the naked fee only. She owns no property abutting on that portion of the street, and for that reason is not subject to assessments for benefits. Her fee was subject to the right of ingress and egress over the land in the street, and in view of these facts a case is not presented in which substantial damages should have been awarded her. The city took from her a naked, unproductive fee, incapable of pecuniary advantage, useless, bereft of enjoyment and incapable of earning; and in the absence of reliable evidence establishing the contrary, the land must as to her be held to have possessed nominal value only."

Where owner of fee is abutting owner.

But where the fee owner is also an abutting owner he is entitled to substantial damages where the fee is actually condemned for a street, notwithstanding there may be existing private easements over the street.

Thus in Re 173rd Street, 78 Hun, 487, 29 N. Y. Supp. 205, where the ownership of the fee in land was taken from the adjoining owner by legislative authority, it awards directed to be paid to the respondents Schauf and Jung.

The determination of the special term was held that the owner was entitled not merely to nominal damages, but to such substantial damages as may be ascertained by measuring the effect upon the value of his remaining property by the loss of the fee in the street, notwithstanding the fact that the fee taken was subject to an easement of passage in favor of abutting owners; the rule being based upon the fact that the ownership of the fee of the land in the street by an adjoining owner vests in him certain rights of which he is deprived by the taking of the fee of the land, even for street uses. In this case an attempt was made to have the court distinguish it from the case of Buffalo v. Pratt, supra, in that there the city was vested with an absolute fee, whereas, in the proceeding taken in the city of New York (the case at bar) for acquirement of property for street purposes, there is vested in the city simply a qualified fee, the city taking it for street purposes only. But the court said: "An examination, however, of the section of the charter which is referred to in the opinion in the case cited indicates that the fee taken in the two proceedings is substantially the same; in the one, there being an express declaration in the statute authorizing the condemnation, that the property shall be held for street uses; and in the other, the authority to take is only for public streets, etc., and hence impressed with the same implied trust as is expressly impressed upon the land taken in the city of New York. We do not think, therefore, that the question is open for discussion, in view of the principles laid down in the case of Buffalo v. Pratt."

In Re 94th Street, 22 Misc. 32, 49 N. Y. Supp. 600, where the owners of the fee in the street which the commissioners of a city had mapped to be opened were abutting owners, and had dealt with the fee in the street among themselves in such manner as to retain the title thereto, but had, among themselves, subjected the fee to private easements, it was held, in the absence of clear and unequivocal proof of a dedication of the land in question to the public use, that when the city actually condemned the fee for street purposes, the owners were entitled to more than a mere nominal award; that the measure of the damage should be the value of the property taken, subject to the private easements.

"While an owner abutting upon an existing highway, to the center of which he has title, is entitled to substantial damages for the taking of the fee of the highway by the city (Re 173d Street, 78 Hun, 487, 29 N. Y. Supp. 205), still the requirement of substantial damages is fulfilled by the awarding of a comparatively small sum." Re Westchester Ave. 126 App. Div. 839, 111 N. Y. Supp. 351, wherein award was held to be grossly excessive and the order allowing it reversed.

And in other cases it has been held that it is well settled that the owner of land which is subject to easements vested in adjoining owners is entitled to substantial damages, where the fee is sought to be acquired under legislative or municipal authority for the purposes of a public street. Re Trinity Ave. 35 Misc. 56, 71 N. Y. Supp. 24, reversed on another point in 81 App. Div. 215, 80 N. Y. Supp. 732; Re Summit Ave. 35 Misc. 59, 71 N. Y. Supp. 207, modified on another point in 84 App. Div. 455, 82 N. Y. Supp. 1027.

In Re Avenue "D," 200 N. Y. 536, 93 N. E. 498, after certain commissioners had adopted a permanent plan for laying out streets, avenues, and public places, the owner of a farm through which one of the avenues would run sold portions of the farm, reserving the part lying within the lines of the proposed avenue, and each of the portions sold adjoined another avenue, and was not entirely surrounded by the land retained, so that the purchaser could sell the lands he bought, in separate lots facing upon the other avenues to suit prospective buyers,—it was held that the covenants in the grant of the original farm owner were plain, and granted no easements by implication in the land which he reserved, and that upon its condemnation by the city he was entitled to substantial damages therefor.

In Gamble v. Philadelphia, 162 Pa. 413, 29 Atl. 739, the court held that the trial judge committed no error in submitting to the jury the question as to the damages the property owner was entitled to for the taking of the street, when he had conveyed his property on both sides of the street, designating the sides of the street as a boundary, after the property had been mapped as a street by the city, but before it was actually taken. The jury found the land was worth nothing, since it was subject to easements of passage, and the appellate court refused to reverse.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The courts below had much difficulty in dividing a substantial sum of money between parties, not one of whom was regarded as entitled to more than a nominal amount thereof. They found division difficult, as there was no equitable principle upon which it could be founded. The leading facts out of which the controversy arose were found by the referee in substance as follows: Van Voorhis street, which was laid down on a map made about 1862, pursuant to chapter 296, p. 437, Laws 1852, is identical with Decatur street, the subject of this proceeding. One Ivins soon after the street was thus laid out acquired title to the fee thereof and of the property adjoining, and prior to his death in 1863 he caused a map to be made of the property on which Van Voorhis, now Decatur, street appeared as it had previously been laid out on the map of the commissioners. Mr. Ivins from time to time conveyed various parcels of land on both sides of the street, but so described it in the deeds as to retain title to the fee of the street.

In 1903 the city of New York instituted proceedings to acquire the fee of the land embraced in Decatur street, and the commissioners awarded a substantial sum to unknown owners. The record does not contain the report of the commissioners, nor show for what interest or interests the award was made, except as it states that "the said awards in our report represent the full value of the parcels taken." The awards were confirmed without opposition. "The commissioners took testimony as to the value of the land so taken only, and no testimony was introduced before them as to damage (if any) done to the easements as to the abutting owners on each side of Decatur street." The evidence taken by the commissioners tended to show that since 1884, Decatur street, although not graded or paved, was opened and used for travel, with water mains therein, a roadway for vehicles through the center, a row of trees on either side, and a path between the trees and the fences bounding the property on both sides. The appellant, who has acquired the rights of Ivins to the fee of the street, claims the entire award, which is also claimed by the abutting owners. The referee to whom the matter of division was referred reported that the appellant was entitled to the whole amount, but both the special term and the appellate division were of a different opinion, and gave all to the abutting owners. The learned judge at special term said in his opinion: "Walker, a typical owner of the fee in the street, had and could have no benefit accruing from such ownership, for he owned no adjoining property that could be helped thereby, and the street itself, in the very nature of the case, could never produce any valuable thing. A naked unproductive fee, incapable of any pecuniary advantage, existed. Walker owned some barren interest,—that was all. The city took from him this land, as to Walker useless, bereft of enjoyment, and incapable of earning. In the absence of reliable evidence that it had value, every consideration shows that it had only nominal value. Hence the owner of the fee should share nominally in the award. But what was the value of the property interest taken from the abutting owners, and what did they receive in return? . . . The city took the servient estate and the easements, and eo instanti the street came into full legal life, with all the present advantages and all expectable opportunities and facilities, and there accrued to the abutting owners servitudes in the street that in every regard and to full degree replaced what the city had taken. By operation of law the abutting owners had all or more than had been received by the grant. The subject of the easements, light, air, and access was not for an instant interrupted or impaired. What the city actually did was to change the legal status and relation of the abutting owners. What damage then did the abutting owners suffer? Clearly none. Hence their participation in the award should be nominal. . . . It is most equitable that the abutting owners should have this award. It ought not to have been awarded to them, . . . but the award exists although it ought not to exist. . . . I order it paid to them, not because the damage belongs to them, but because they must pay the same."

On the record as now presented to us we agree with the learned special term that no party was entitled to more than a nominal award, but we do not agree with that court, or with the appellate division, in giving the entire fund to the abutting owners upon the ground that they were assessed to pay the damages for opening the street, and thus created the fund which is the subject of division. The return does not show that the abutting owners were so assessed, but the special term assumed it, and the learned judge who wrote for the appellate division went to the office containing the record, and there learned it. The statute does not require it, but authorizes the assessment to be spread over a large area, and provides that a part may be imposed on the city. Greater New York Charter (Laws 1901, p. 411, chap. 466) § 980, as amended by Laws 1906, p. 1690, chap. 658. The appellate division was of the same opinion as the special term that each of the claimants "was entitled to only a nominal award and should have been given no more." One of the justices dissented in an elaborate opinion, and recommended a reversal of the order, with instructions to the court below to return the report to the referee for a further hearing "as to the value of such easements as related to the entire award."

Two cases are cited to show that substantial damages were properly awarded,—Re 11th Ave. 81 N. Y. 436; Buffalo v. Pratt, 131 N. Y. 293, 15 L.R.A. 413, 27 Am. St. Rep. 592, 30 N. E. 233. In both of these cases this court was hampered by a decision below, not appealed from, and therefore binding upon it, that an award of nominal damages only was improper. It also appeared in the later case that the owner of the fee of the street owned adjoining property, which is not the fact here, and it was held that such ownership gave him "the right to defend against and to enjoin a use of, or an encroachment upon the street, under legislative or municipal authority; for purposes inconsistent with those uses to which streets should be, or have been ordinarily, subjected." Accordingly it was held that the owners "of the fee of the land in the street in front of their premises" were entitled to "such substantial damages as would be ascertained by measuring the effect upon the value of their property of such a deprivation."

In the earlier case the court said (page 448 of 81 N. Y.): "The most plausible of the objections taken is that, the award being intended to compensate for the loss or damage sustained by the parties interested in the land taken, the owners of the easement should not participate, because they are not deprived of their easement, but retain their right of way over the avenue in an improved form. This argument, however, applies with equal force to the owner of the fee. The land was, before the opening of the avenue as a public highway, subjected to a perpetual easement which deprived the owner of the beneficial enjoyment of the land. There would be manifest injustice in awarding the whole compensation to the owner of the fee, in view of the fact that such compensation is ultimately payable by the owners of the adjacent lots in the form of assessments, while no part of these assessments is chargeable to the owners of the fee of the land taken. The adjacent owners would thus be compelled to pay full value for a right of way which they already possessed. . . . If the compensation paid to the owners of the fee had been merely nominal, it would have been equitable to adopt the same rule in respect to the owners of the easement. . . . The rule of apportionment adopted by him [the referee], viz., one fourth to the owner of the barren fee and three fourths to the owners of the easement or right of way, it is difficult for us to review. It was adopted with reference to all the circumstances and equities of the case, in the exercise of a sound judgment by a referee who evidently had a thorough comprehension of the case, and was eminently qualified to decide such a matter. With his determination we see no reason to interfere."

The embarrassment of the learned judge who wrote the opinion in that case is obvious, and the embarrassment of the judges who have written more than twenty printed pages of opinions in the case at bar is equally apparent. We are unwilling to take part in the division of a fund to which none of the claimants are justly or equitably entitled, so far as now appears. In order that complete justice may be done, we reverse the orders below, without costs to either party, and remit the proceeding to the special term, with leave to any party, or to the city of New York, to move to set aside the award and assessment, if any, and for a rehearing before the commissioners, or others to be appointed in their stead. If such motion is not made within thirty days, or if made is denied, application may be made by either party for a rehearing before the same or another referee, to the end that further evidence may be presented, especially as to the proportionate value of the respective interests and as to the amount, if any, assessed upon the abutting owners to pay for the improvement.

Statement by Fisk, J.:

From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. The complaint is as follows:

"(1) That on or about the 4th day of April, 1906, for value received, this plaintiff executed and delivered to the Blaisdell-Bird Company, a corporation, his certain promissory notes payable to the Blaisdell-Bird Company or order, one for $100, due November 1, 1907, and one for $180, due November 1, 1908, said notes bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum. That at said time and place he also executed and delivered to Grace Cochrane his two certain promissory notes, payable to Grace Cochrane or order, one for $200, due November 1, 1906, and one for $100, due November 1, 1907, said notes bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum.

"(2) That on or about November 26, 1906, this plaintiff paid one John W. Cochrane $200, same to apply on his indebtedness to the said Grace Cochrane, and the said John W. Cochrane, having possession of the said note in favor of the said Grace Cochrane for $200, returned the same to this plaintiff, and that thereupon the total indebtedness of this plaintiff to the said Grace Cochrane was $100, and his total indebtedness to said the Blaisdell-Bird Company $280. That thereupon this plaintiff executed and delivered to the said John W. Cochrane his certain promissory note, dated November 26, 1906, due November 1, 1907, payable to the said John W. Cochrane or order for $380, and interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, said note representing this plaintiff's total indebtedness to said Grace Cochrane and said the Blaisdell-Bird Company, and said John W. Cochrane thereupon having possession of the said notes in favor of said the Blaisdell-Bird Company, but which had not been transferred by said the Blaisdell Bird Company, returned same to this plaintiff. That this plaintiff at said time believed that the said John W. Cochrane had authority to return said notes in favor of the Blaisdell-Bird Company and take in settlement thereof the note payable to himself, hereinbefore mentioned. That said John W. Cochrane in fact had no authority to do such act, and the same was done without the knowledge or consent of the Blaisdell-Bird Company.

"(3) That subsequently the said John W. Cochrane transferred the said note for $380 to the said Grace Cochrane, receiving no consideration therefor except that she owned an interest in said note to the extent of $100. That the said Grace Cochrane being indebted to one T. E. Fox as security, transferred the said note for $380 to said

T. E. Fox. That some time about the fall of 1907 this plaintiff learned, and was informed by the Blaisdell-Bird Company, that the said John W. Cochrane had no authority to deliver the said notes in its favor, and take in settlement thereof the note payable to himself, and that the Blaisdell-Bird Company was the owner of an interest in said note to the extent of $280 and interest, or the indebtedness thereby represented, and that the said notes in favor of the Blaisdell-Bird Company, executed by this plaintiff on April 4, 1906, were still unpaid and a good claim against this plaintiff.

"(4) That on or about February 6, 1908, this plaintiff paid to the said T. E. Fox the sum of $146, which was the total indebtedness of the said Grace Cochrane to the said T. E. Fox, and also was the total amount of the interest in said note for $380 owned by the said Grace Cochrane, and the entire balance of indebtedness from this plaintiff to said Grace Cochrane, including interest on the two original notes from date to payment. Thereupon the said T. E. Fox returned to the said Grace Cochrane the said note for $380. That subsequently the said Grace Cochrane returned said note for $380 to the said John W. Cochrane, her entire interest in the same having been paid, and that the balance of said note for $380 was entirely without consideration. That $280 thereof, or the indebtedness represented thereby, was the property of the Blaisdell-Bird Company, and the Blaisdell-Bird Company had the sole right to release the same.

"(5) That some time in the spring or middle part of the year 1908 the said John W. Cochrane transferred the said note for $380 to this defendant, said transfer taking place long after the maturity of said note, and long after this plaintiff had been apprised of the facts hereinbefore set forth. That about the latter part of July or the first part of August, 1908, this defendant was informed of the facts hereinbefore set forth, and had full knowledge that he was not the owner of said note for $380 or the indebtedness represented thereby. That he could not release the same, and that he could not legally enforce a collection thereof. That with full knowledge of said facts, and without the right or authority to release the balance of said note for $380 or the indebtedness represented thereby, he went to this plaintiff and returned to him said note for $380, taking in settlement thereof this plaintiffs' promissory note, dated August 6, 1908, payable to this defendant or order, for $290.08, due October 1, 1908, bearing interest at the rate of 12 per cent per annum. That the said note in favor of this defendant was entirely without consideration. That this defendant was not the owner thereof or the indebtedness thereby represented, and had no right to transfer same.

"(6) That subsequently this plaintiff was compelled to and did settle with the Blaisdell-Bird Company in full his indebtedness to it, paying in full the notes in favor of the Blaisdell-Bird Company, described in paragraph 1 hereof.

"(7) That, before the maturity of said note in favor of this defendant, this defendant, in the usual course of business, indorsed and transferred the said note for value to the Second National Bank at Minot, a corporation, the said Second National Bank purchased the said note for value before maturity and without any knowledge of the facts hereinbefore set forth, or any knowledge that the said note was without consideration or in any way void or defective, or any knowledge that said defendant was not the owner of said note or the indebtedness thereby represented, or any knowledge that he had no right to transfer same. That by reason of the facts hereinbefore set forth, and that the said Second National Bank was a bona fide purchaser before maturity, in the usual course of business, for value, of the said note in favor of this defendant, this plaintiff was compelled to pay said note to said Second National Bank of Minot, and on or about the 29th day of October, 1908, did pay said note, amounting, with interest, to $297.80, to the said Second National Bank, paying in cash $7.80, and the balance in this note for $290, due October 1, 1909, with interest at 12 per cent per annum, payable to the said bank or order.

"(8) That by reason of the facts hereinbefore set forth this plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $297.80, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent per annum from October 29, 1909.

"Wherefore this plaintiff demands judgment against this defendant for the sum of $297.80, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent per annum from and since October 29, 1908, besides his costs and disbursements herein."

The sole ground of the demurrer is that the complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Order reversed.

The note given by plaintiff to defendant was absolutely without consideration, and therefore void in defendant's hands.

McGlynn v. Scott, 4 N. D. 18, 58 N. W. 460; Rudolph v. Hewitt, 11 S. D. 646, 80 N. W. 133; Taylor v. Weeks, 129 Mich. 233, 88 N. W. 466.

By the act of defendant in transferring the note, plaintiff was compelled to pay what he was not entitled to pay, and can therefore look to defendant for reimbursement. He has suffered a wrong, and therefore has his remedy, under the general principle that there can be no wrong without a remedy.

Flisk, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The allegations of the complaint, admitted by the demurrer, may be epitomized as follows: Plaintiff voluntarily, and with full knowledge of the facts, executed and delivered to defendant his negotiable promissory note without consideration, and the 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

latter, with such knowledge accepted the same. Thereafter, and before its maturity, defendant transferred the same in due course and for value to an innocent purchaser, to whom plaintiff was obliged to and did pay the sum due thereon. Do such facts create any liability on defendant's part under any theory of law to reimburse plaintiff for the money which he was thus required to pay? The question thus presented is somewhat novel. Neither party has cited any authority directly in point, and we have been unable to find that the identical question has ever been before the courts for decision. As we view the matter, it is not a question involving a voluntary payment, as appellant's counsel seem to think, although somewhat analogous thereto. While the note was voluntarily given, it paid nothing, as there was concededly nothing to pay. It merely amounted to a voluntary promise on plaintiff's part to pay to defendant or order a sum of money at a future date. Such note was not voluntarily paid by plaintiff. He was compelled to pay it to such bona fide purchaser because of a legal duty so to do arising from the negotiable instrument law. On principle, we can discover no sound reason why defendant is under any obligation to plaintiff to reimburse him for the sum thus paid on such note. If, instead of voluntarily giving to defendant such negotiable note, plaintiff had given to defendant the face value thereof in cash, under the like circumstances, no one would contend that defendant would owe any legal duty to repay such sum to plaintiff. The act of defendant in transferring such note cannot be deemed an actionable wrong, as by the giving of the note, negotiable in form, it must be held that plaintiff contemplated that the same might be negotiated, and thereby consented thereto. As was said by the court of appeals of New York: "The plaintiff cannot complain because the defendants negotiated the note, so as to shut out the defense which he would have had to it in the hands of the defendants. The negotiation of the note was contemplated when it was given, as the words of negotiability show. It is possible that the plaintiff, while the note was held by the defendants, might have maintained an action to restrain the transfer, and to compel its cancellation. Jackman v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. Jr. 581, 9 Revised Rep. 229, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 321. But it is unnecessary to determine that question in this case. The plaintiff having paid the note, although under the coercion resulting from the transfer, the law leaves him where the transaction has left him." Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y. 393.

If, prior to the negotiation of such note by defendant, plaintiff had elected to repudiate any liability thereunder, and had communicated his election so to do to the defendant, demanding a return and cancellation thereof, a different question would arise. Under such a state of facts, it might properly be said that the defendant's negotiation of the note would constitute an actionable wrong, entitling plaintiff to recover. But under the facts alleged in the complaint and admitted by the demurrer in the case at bar, we fail to see how defendant owes to plaintiff either a legal or moral duty in the premises. Neither in good morals nor in good conscience is defendant called upon to reimburse plaintiff for the loss suffered by him solely as a result of his own folly.

On the argument in this court, respondent's counsel requested that permission to amend the complaint be given in the event a decision is reached adverse to his contention. Such application must, of course, be addressed to the district court after the remittitur has been filed in that court. Permission to make such application is hereby granted.

For the above reasons, the order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY EX
REL. J. R. LAYMAN, Appt.,

v.

DENNIE SHEERAN.

(145 Ky. 361, 140 S. W. 568.)

Office — deputy sheriff — rival candidate.

The appointment by a sheriff as his deputy of one who withdrew from candidacy for the nomination in consideration of the promise of a deputyship is not obnoxious to a statute forbidding the sale or letting to farm or deputation of any office.

(November 14, 1911.)

APPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Breckinridge County sustaining a demurrer to the petition in a proceeding to oust defendant from the office of sheriff for an alleged violation of the statute prohibiting the sale or letting to farm of any office of trust. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Murray & Murray, Gus Brown, and J. R. Layman for the Commonwealth.

Mr. Claude Mercer, for appellee:

A promise made by a candidate for a party nomination for the office of sheriff, that, if another aspirant for the same nomination would withdraw and lend his aid in securing his nomination, in the event of the election of the promisor, the candidate thus withdrawing would be appointed deputy sheriff, is not a violation of the statute inhibiting the sale of a public office or a deputation thereof.

Field v. Chipley, 79 Ky. 260; Combs v. Brashear, 6 J. J. M. 631; Baldwin v. Bridges, 2 J. J. M. 7; Commonwealth v. Chinn, 110 Ky. 527.

Mr. N. McC. Mercer also for appellee.

Clay, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Dennie Sheeran, was elected sheriff of Breckinridge county at the general election held in November, 1909. He subsequently qualified, and is now the acting sheriff of that county. This proceeding was brought by the Commonwealth of Kentucky, on relation of its attorney for the ninth judicial district, for the purpose of ousting appellee from his office for an alleged violation of § 3740 of the Kentucky Statutes (§ 4842, Russell's Stat., prohibiting the sale or letting to farm of any office of trust or honor under the commonwealth, or deputation thereof, in whole or in part, upon penalty of ouster.

It is averred in the petition that, when prospective bidders for positions like that of mail carrier.

As far as actual decisions upon this point go, the weight of authority is to the effect that an agreement in consideration of the withdrawal of candidacy for office is void as against public policy; and it matters not whether it is a withdrawal from the race for nomination, or, after nomination, from the race for election.

Note. — Validity of agreement made in consideration of withdrawal of candidacy for office.

This note does not include cases of the sale of a deputyship or other office for a consideration other than withdrawal from candidacy, nor does it include cases of resignation from office as consideration for an agreement, nor agreements to withdraw by

appellee was elected sheriff, he was elected as the candidate of the Republican party, and received his nomination at a convention held by that party. Prior to the convention, one Gabe Taul, who was eligible to hold the office of sheriff, was a candidate for the nomination at the hands of the Republican party. A short time prior to the holding of the convention of said party in the county of Breckinridge, for

Two men being applicants to the constitutional appointing power for the office of inspector of flour in the city of New York, and considering their chances of obtaining the appointment about equal, made an agreement by which one was to withdraw his application and aid the other in procuring the appointment, in consideration of which the other, if appointed, was to allow the first one to receive one half the fees and emoluments of the office as long as he held it. The offer seemed also to intimate, and the conduct of the parties justified a suspicion, that the one withdrawing was also to be appointed deputy of the other; but the decision was not placed on that ground. The agreement was held to be void because it stipulated for pecuniary compensation for aid in obtaining an appointment, and also because it stipulated for a dangerous influence over a profitable office which was not intrusted to the one profiting thereby, and for the performance of the duties of which he was under no pecuniary or official obligation, and because it stipulated for a pecuniary compensation for withdrawing an application by which he had probably driven off competition, and had contributed to reduce the number of applicants to those two. Gray v. Hook, 4 N. Y. 449.

An agreement whereby a nominee for the office of mayor of a city was to withdraw from the candidacy and run for another office, and another candidate was to be substituted on the ticket for mayor, and pay all the campaign expenses of the former, was held illegal; and a subsequent promise by the substituted candidate to pay money in accordance with that agreement was held void. Robinson v. Kalbfleisch, 5 Thomp. & C. 212.

An agreement between two applicants for the office of Assistant Assessor of the United States, that one should withdraw his application, and if the other should receive the appointment, they would perform the duties jointly and share the receipts equally, is illegal as against public policy, and cannot be validated after the appointment is received, by mere confirmation. Hunter v. Nolf, 71 Pa. 282.

Where a nominee for the legislature withdrew from a ticket and permitted another nominee to be substituted in his place, and accepted in consideration a judgment note for $500 as reimbursement for "expenses" incurred in obtaining his nomination, the whole transaction was corrupt, immoral, and within the prohibition of the act then in force (substance of the act not stated), and no collection could be had upon the note. Ham v. Smith, 87 Pa. 63.

Also, where there was a contract between a candidate for the office of auditor of a county and the then incumbent of that office, to the effect that if the latter would support such candidate for the nomination, and not be a candidate for the same office himself, the former would, if nominated and elected, employ the other as deputy and clerk during the term of said office, the contract was held illegal and void as in contravention of public policy. Stout v. Ennis, 28 Kan. 708.

It will be observed, however, that Comt. EX REL LAYMAN v. SHEEHAN holds that the appointment by a sheriff to the deputyship under him of one who withdrew from candidacy for the nomination, in consideration of a promise that he should be so appointed, is not obnoxious to the statute forbidding the sale or letting to farm of any office. There seems to be no reference in the decision to public policy.

And in Woodworth v. Wilson, 11 La. Ann. 402, an applicant for the curatorship of an estate withdrew upon the promise of another applicant to deliver lumber to him sufficient to pay off two notes outstanding against him, and this agreement was enforced by the court by granting judgment in favor of the one who withdrew for the difference between the amount of the notes and the value of the lumber actually delivered. But a memorandum is filed by a dissenting judge, expressing a doubt as to whether it is not against the policy of the law to enforce any contract which directly or indirectly has for its consideration the withdrawal of the applicant for the office of executor, administrator, or curator of a succession, in order to secure the appointment of another.

In Gulick v. Ward, 10 N. J. L. 87, 18 Am. Dec. 389,—a case not within the scope of this note, as it involved an agreement not to bid for a public contract,—the court refers to the case of Parker v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 612. In the latter case, the parties were both applicants for the office of under-sheriff, and the defendant, in consideration that the plaintiff would desist, promised if he obtained the office to pay him a sum of money. The court held the consideration to be lawful and the promise valid; but there is a query in Gulick v. Ward, whether that decision would now be the same; and that the court attempts to justify said decision in these words: "Neither the sheriff nor the public were, or could be, prejudiced by the withdrawal of one of the applicants; no competition was to be fostered; public policy did not require the anxious rivalry of candidates; perhaps, indeed, was best promoted by leaving the sheriff to unbiased and unsolicited selection; there was no interest, either public or private which could suffer from the absence of competition."

the purpose of nominating candidates for county offices, including the office of sheriff, the appellee solicited the said Gabe Taul to withdraw from the race before the convention for said nomination, and not oppose him. The appellee and said Taul then entered into a contract and bargain whereby it was agreed and contracted between them that the said Taul would withdraw from said race for said nomination, and would not further oppose appellee, but would use his influence and efforts to secure appellee's nomination by the Republican convention for the office of sheriff, and would also use his influence and efforts to secure the election of appellee to said office at the regular election. In consideration of said Taul's withdrawing from said contest, and of his influence and efforts to secure the nomination and election of appellee as sheriff, appellee agreed and contracted with said Taul that when elected and qualified as sheriff he would appoint said Taul as a deputy sheriff of the county of Breckinridge for a period of one year, and that said Taul was to have the right and privilege of holding said deputyship for the whole period of appellee's term of office as sheriff, and that he would pay to said Taul the sum of $40 per month for the first year of his deputyship, and such sum as might be further agreed upon for the remaining three years. In pursuance of said agreement and bargain said Taul withdrew from the race, and did use his influence to secure the nomination and election of appellee, and the latter did, after his election and qualification as sheriff, appoint said Taul a deputy sheriff of Breckinridge county, and said Taul qualified as said deputy and held said deputyship for a time thereafter. The petition further avers and charges that the appellee did sell and let to farm a deputation of the office of sheriff of Breckinridge county; that at the time said contract with said Taul was made the appellee expected to hold the office of sheriff, and, when he fulfilled said contract by appointing said Taul as deputy, he did hold said office. The petition concludes with a prayer asking that appellee be adjudged to have forfeited the office of sheriff and his right to hold the same, and that he be expelled from said office.

To this petition the appellee interposed a demurrer, which was sustained. The commonwealth having declined to plead further, the petition was dismissed. From that judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

Section 3740 of the Kentucky Statutes is as follows: "No office or post of profit, trust, or honor under this commonwealth, whether civil or military, legislative, executive, ministerial, or judicial, nor the deputation thereof, in whole or in part, shall be sold or let to farm by any person holding or expecting to hold the same. Such person so selling or letting, and the person so buying or receiving the letting, or with whose knowledge the same has been bought for him by another, shall be disqualified from holding such office or post, or the deputation thereof, and, upon conviction, shall be expelled therefrom." The question of the validity of the contract by which appellee agreed to appoint Taul deputy sheriff, in consideration of the latter's support and influence, both before the Republican convention and at the general election, is not now before us. The sole question is: Is such contract a sale of the office or a deputation thereof within the purview of the statute?

It has long been the custom, where persons were candidates for an office attached to which are one or more deputyships, for one or more of the candidates to withdraw and give their support and influence to the strongest candidate, upon the assurance of an appointment to one of the deputyships. Whatever may be the moral quality of the act by which such support and influence are thus obtained, such an agreement is not a sale of the office within the meaning of the statute. It is nothing more than an agreement to appoint one to a deputyship at a certain salary. In the case before us the deputyship in question had to be filled, and for the services performed by the incumbent compensation had to be provided. In doing this the appellee never surrendered control, either of his own office or of the deputyship referred to. We therefore conclude that the trial court properly sustained the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

CHARLES S. BLACKETT, Appt.,

v.

(— Iowa, —, 133 N. W. 901.)

Will — establishment by codicil.

1. A paper signed and executed as a will, requesting the appointment of a certain person administrator, which is attached to a will, and does not refer to or identify it in any manner, cannot be regarded as a codicil which will revive a canceled will, under a statute providing that if a codicil is duly executed to a will defectively executed and clearly identified in such codicil, the will and codicil shall be considered as one instrument, and the execution of both sufficient.

Same — revocation — execution of subsequent will.

2. The mere execution of a revocatory will effects a cancellation of a prior one, although it is never probated, under a statute providing that wills may be revoked by the execution of subsequent wills.

Same — destruction of revocatory will — effect.

3. The destruction of a will which expressly revoked a prior one, which had been retained in existence, will revive the prior one, if such was the intent of the testator found by the jury from all the circumstances of the case.

Evidence — re-establishment of will — declarations of testator.

4. Upon the question of the revival of a will by destruction of an instrument purporting to revoke it, declarations of testator at the time of destroying the latter instrument are admissible in evidence.

(December 18, 1911.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Fayette County in defendants' favor in an action brought to set aside the probate of the will of Elizabeth W. Lewis, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. V. T. Price and C. S. Blackett, for appellant:

A will may be revoked by the execution of a subsequent will.

Schillinger v. Bawek, 135 Iowa, 131, 112 N. W. 210; Re Dunahugh, 130 Iowa, 692, 107 N. W. 925; Re Brown, 143 Iowa, 649, 120 N. W. 667; Peck's Appeal, 50 Conn. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 685.

The republication of a revoked will cannot be shown by parol evidence of testator's declarations, or of testator's intentions. Such evidence is incompetent.

Carey v. Baughn, 36 Iowa, 540, 14 Am. Rep. 534; McCarn v. Rundall, 111 Iowa, 406, 82 N. W. 924.

Messrs. Ainsworth & Hughes and Clements & Estey, for appellees:

A will is ambulatory, and takes effect only at the death of the testator; hence, to have any force, it must exist at such decease, and, if not, it has no effect and cannot revoke a previous will.

Bates v. Hacking, 28 R. I. 523, 68 Atl. 622, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 937, 125 Am. St. Rep. 759, 68 Atl. 622; Marsh v. Marsh, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 77, 64 Am. Dec. 598.

The revoking will must be a valid one which the contestant can "bring forward, . . . and demand probate thereof," because, unless it is a valid will surviving the testator and capable of probate, it never has, or has had, any force or effect whatever.

Re Dunahugh, 130 Iowa, 695, 107 N. W. 925; Stephenson v. Stephenson, 64 Iowa, 537, 21 N. W. 19.

Parol evidence of the declarations of the testator are admissible to sustain the will.

Lorieux v. Keller, 5 Iowa, 196, 68 Am. Dec. 696.

The common-law rule is that the destruction of a second revocatory will revives the first.

Pickens v. Davis, 134 Mass. 252, 45 Am. Rep. 331; Taylor v. Taylor, 2 Nott & M'C. 482; Randall v. Beatty, 31 N. J. Eq. 643.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Elizabeth W. Lewis, now deceased, made a will in the year 1895. Thereafter, and in 1904, she made another which disposed of her estate, and contained a clause revoking the will of 1895. She retained both wills until the year 1905, when she destroyed the one of 1904 by burning it, and about the same time executed the following paper:

To the Judge of the District Court of Fayette County, Iowa:—

I hereby request you in case of my death to appoint S. B. Ziegler, of West Union, Iowa, as administrator of my estate without giving bonds.

This she signed, and her signature was witnessed by two witnesses. The will of 1904 was left in the possession of a Mr. Preston, who drew it, until December of that year, when testatrix requested Mr. S. B. Ziegler, who had drawn the first will and had it in his possession, to get the revocation does not operate to reinstate the former will.

In Re Wear, 131 App. Div. 875, 116 N. Y. Supp. 304, the court recognizes that a second will containing a revocation clause, and shown to have been in the possession of decedent, but which cannot be found, is presumed to have been destroyed by him with the intention of revoking it, but that such 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

However, where a testator destroyed her later will by burning it, at the same time declaring orally that the former will should count, it was held that this re-established the former will. Kerchner's Estate, 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 112.

second one from Preston, which he did, and Ziegler took both wills to Mrs. Lewis's home, where each one was read to her, clause by clause, in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Caldwell, the persons who witnessed the paper which we have heretofore set out, and after some discussion Mrs. Lewis said that she wanted the first will to stand, and she directed Ziegler to destroy the second one, which he did in her presence, and in the presence of the Caddells. After the destruction of the second will, Mrs. Lewis said to Mr. Ziegler: "There is no executor in this will that stands. . . . I want you to act as my executor; you have always done my business for a great many years, and I want you to act." Mr. Ziegler made the objection that he did not care to act as executor of the will, because of the necessity of giving a bond, whereupon Mrs. Lewis said that he did not need to give a bond. The writing was then prepared by Mr. Ziegler, and was executed and witnessed as shown. This so-called codicil does not seem to have been attached to the will, but it was kept by Mr. Ziegler, and was presented for probate with the will. The first will was admitted to probate, and this action is brought to set aside the order. The trial court denied the relief asked, and plaintiff appeals.

The questions presented are new to this court, and some of them are the subject of many conflicting and irreconcilable decisions. In the absence of statute governing some of the matters arising upon the appeal, it may be said that there is no general rule, and that each court for itself has found it necessary to fix the rule for that jurisdiction. The relevant statutes of this state are as follows:

"All other wills, to be valid, must be in writing, signed by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his express direction writing his name thereto, and witnessed by two competent persons; but if a codicil is duly executed to a will defectively executed and clearly identified in such codicil, the will and codicil shall be considered one instrument, and the execution of both sufficient." Code, § 3274.

"Wills can only be revoked, in whole or in part, by being canceled or destroyed by the act or direction of the testator, with the intention of so revoking them, or by the execution of subsequent wills. When done by cancellation, the revocation must be witnessed in the same manner as the making, of a new will." Code Supp. § 3276.

Section 3274 is quoted because of its bearing upon the claim that the paper heretofore set out is a codicil to the first will, and having been executed after the destruction of the will of 1904, it amounted to a republication of the first will. As to that, more hereafter.

It is admitted that the first will was never destroyed by the maker, and it is also conceded that the second will contained an express revocatory clause of the first will, and that this second will was absolutely destroyed by burning. These being the undisputed facts, the questions involved are: (1) Was the first will republished by the paper hitherto quoted, which, it is claimed, is a codicil to that will? (2) Did the destruction of the second will under the circumstances disclosed amount to a revivor of the first will?

Everyone concedes that a will expressly revoked by a subsequent will or other instrument of revocation may be republished or revived by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in accordance with statutory requirements for the execution of wills, showing an intention to revive the same. When done by a codicil, an intent to republish or revive the former will must be shown, and this may be inferred from any reference which makes such intent obvious, as, by reference to "my will," or to the will by date. Crosbie v. Macdougall, 4 Ves. Jr. 610, 4 Revised Rep. 301; Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 291. And the codicil need not be attached to the will. Van Cortlandt v. Kip, 1 Hill, 590; Pope v. Pope, 95 Ga. 87, 22 S. E. 245; Wikoff's Appeal, 15 Pa. 281, 53 Am. Dec. 597. But, if not attached, there must be such reference to the will intended to be republished as to identify it, or to furnish the means for identification, without resort to any other testimony, save to show that the document sought to be incorporated is identical with that referred to in the will. The codicil itself must refer to the paper sought to be incorporated, if it be then in existence. Newton v. Seaman's Friend Soc. 130 Mass. 91, 39 Am. Rep. 433; Damon v. Bibber, 135 Mass. 458; Parrott v. Avery, 159 Mass. 594, 22 L.R.A. 153, 38 Am. St. Rep. 465, 35 N. E. 94; Re Soher, 78 Cal. 477, 21 Pac. 8; Crosby v. Mason, 32 Conn. 482; Booth v. Baptist Church, 126 N. Y. 215, 28 N. E. 238; Allen v. Maddock, 11 Moore, P. C. C. 427, 6 Week. Rep. 825, 4 Gray's Cases, 198; Sunderland's Goods, 4 Gray's Cases on Property, 217; Re Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 Pac. 1011; Re Andrews, 162 N. Y. 1, 48 L.R.A. 662, 76 Am. St. Rep. 294, 56 N. E. 529.

This is doubtless the rule intended to be announced by Code, § 3274, hitherto quoted. In other words, all wills must, as a general rule, be in writing, duly signed and attested; and if a codicil is relied upon for a publication, it must clearly identify the will, and parol testimony is not admissible in the absence of any attempt to identify the will in the codicil. These being the rules announced by all of the authorities, it is apparent that the written instrument executed by Mrs. Lewis, either contemporaneously with or after the destruction of the second will, cannot be treated as a codicil to the first one, because it was not attached to, nor did it refer in any manner to, the prior will.

Moreover, the paper itself does not indicate any intent on the part of the maker to revive a former will. Construed without reference to the other testimony, it indicates a thought on the part of the maker that Ziegler should act as administrator of her estate without bond. If it means anything, this would seem to indicate that the maker wished her estate to be administered upon according to law, and not under any will. Manifestly this so-called codicil cannot be considered a republication of the first will.

The second question presented is much more difficult of solution. Shortly stated, it is this: Does the destruction or cancellation of a second will, containing an express revocation of a former one, in itself, revive the first or former one? Upon no subject relating to the law of wills are the authorities in such hopeless and irreconcilable conflict. A learned text writer has thus stated the law of England as it existed prior to the adoption of the statute known as 11 Vict. chap. 26, § 22.

"The English law prior to statutes upon this difficult question was in great confusion. The ecclesiastical courts seem disposed to hold, in cases of testaments, that no presumption arose, either for or against the validity of the first will, upon such a state of facts, and that the question was to be settled by the intention of the testator as disclosed by the evidence. The common-law tribunals, in dealing with wills, were inclined to adopt the theory that the revocation of the second will raised a presumption that testator thereby intended the first will to be in full force and effect. This was a prima facie presumption only, and might be rebutted by evidence of a contrary intention. The two sets of tribunals thus seemed to agree that the testator might revive his first will by the revocation of his second, if he intended to do so. Further doubt, however, arises upon attempting an analysis of the earlier English cases for two different reasons: First, it is not always clear whether the English courts are discussing a case where the second will expressly revoked the first, or where it was merely inconsistent with it. Second, in many of the cases, especially in the ecclesiastical courts, the declarations of the testator might have been sufficient to republish his first will, as no set form was required for the execution of wills of personal property. It is therefore at times hard to determine whether the first will is valid because it has been republished after the revocation of the second will, or whether the mere revocation of the second will, with intent to revive the first, revived it without republication.

"This condition of uncertainty upon an important and often-occurring question was ended in England by the statute 1 Vict. chap. 26, § 22, which provides in substance that a will once revoked can be revived, but by a new codicil or re-execution. This statute has always been held to apply with equal force to a will revoked either by a later will containing a clause of revocation, or by a later inconsistent will. There such a statute is in force, the revocation of a later will by a testator who intends thereby to revive his earlier will, and who so declares his intention, has no effect to revive his earlier will, unless there is a re-execution or republication, as contemplated by the statute." Page, Wills, §§ 271, 272.

The same writer, in speaking of the law in this country, said: "In the United States, in the absence of a statute on this subject, the decisions are by no means uniform. The better line of authority make a distinction between the cases where the latter will contained an express revocation clause, and where it was merely inconsistent with the earlier will. 'There seems to have been material distinction, and on good ground, between the state of a former will after a second one merely inconsistent with it, and its state after a second one with a declaration expressly revoking it. In the first case, the only chance for the second to operate in revocation of the first, according to the prevalent theories of the courts, was by its coming to a head as an active will, which it could do only by surviving its author. Being the last expression of the decedent, and at the same time practically inconsistent with the prior one, the intent to repeal the first by it was to be implied. In case, however, of its being recalled by the testator in his lifetime, it could not, on the theory referred to, be taken to have the effect to do away with its predecessor. Being cut off before having its disposition of property awakened into life, it could have no affirmative operation through its dispositions upon the estate.' Where such distinction is recognized, the destruction of a later will inconsistent with an earlier will, but containing no clause of express revocation, revives the first will. Where the second will contains a clause of revocation, it is held in many jurisdictions in the United States, in accordance with the distinction already given, that the destruction of the second will does not revive the first [will]." Page, Wills, § 273.

Authorities are cited in support of these views which need not be reproduced here, for we regard the statements of the text a correct exposition of most of the cases cited. See also Gardner, Wills, pp. 271-274. Any reference to the authorities upon the subject would be incomplete without incorporating therein a citation to two cases which may well be regarded as leading ones upon this perplexing problem. These are Pickens v. Davis, 134 Mass. 252, 45 Am. Rep. 322, and Williams v. Miles, 68 Neb. 463, 62 L.R.A. 383, 110 Am. St. Rep. 431, 94 N. W. 705, 96 N. W. 151, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 306. Opinion by Pound, C. This latter opinion carefully reviews all the decisions, both English and American, and finally adopts the rule of the ecclesiastical courts, making revivor of the former will a question of testator's intent, to be deduced from all the circumstances of the case. There is a valuable note to the case in 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. commencing at page 313. We may remark, parenthetically, that the English statute referred to, which was passed in the year 1837, is no part of our written law, and cannot be considered as a part of the common law which we inherited at the time of the Revolution.

It should also be noted that we have no local statute upon the subject of the effect to be given the destruction of a second will upon a former one which is yet preserved. We have already copied the section of our Code with reference to the revocation of wills, and it is deemed proper, in view of some claims made by counsel, to indicate our views with reference to the proper interpretation of that statute. In the first place, it indicates that wills may be revoked, either in whole or in part. Next it indicates that revocation may be made by cancellation or destruction, or by the execution of subsequent wills; and the cancellation referred to is a written one, which must be executed in the same manner as the making of a new will. This may be then simply an instrument of cancellation or revocation, or it may be a part of another and subsequent will, which contains an express clause of revocation. The word "cancellation" may have had a different meaning at common law, but in our statute it manifestly means revocation by a written instrument. Again, physical destruction of a will amounts to a revocation, when so intended by the testator. Again, a will may be revoked under this statute, either in whole or in part, by the execution of subsequent wills. This follows when there is an inconsistency between the two wills, and there is no express revocatory clause. See, as sustaining this view, Fry v. Fry, 125 Iowa, 424, 101 N. W. 144; Schillinger v. Bawek, 135 Iowa, 131, 12 N. W. 210; Re Dunahugh, 130 Iowa, 692, 107 N. W. 925; McCarn v. Rundall, 111 Iowa, 406, 82 N. W. 924; Re Brown, 143 Iowa, 649, 120 N. W. 667. These matters are pointed out in order that we may distinguish, harmonize, explain, and, perhaps, criticize, some of the cases relied upon by appellee. If a will be revoked by destruction, as by burning, and a second one is executed in its place, there is nothing to revive upon the destruction or revocation of the second one. A will once executed may be revoked by the execution of an instrument of revocation or cancellation, and this instrument may be a new will, containing an express clause of revocation; or by an instrument of revocation alone.

Upon the execution of such an instrument, the prior will is revoked, no matter whether the instrument of revocation be probated or not. It is the execution of the instrument in proper form which effectuates the revocation. This view is sustained by reason and the weight of authority, although disapproved by a minority of the courts. See, as sustaining the rule, some of our own cases already cited, and the following from other jurisdictions: Re Barnes, 70 App. Div. 523, 75 N. Y. Supp. 373; Brown v. Brown, 8 El. & Bl. 876, 27 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 173, 4 Jur. N. S. 163, 11 Eng. Rul. Cas. 491; Re Cunningham, 38 Minn. 169, 8 Am. St. Rep. 650, 36 N. W. 269; Stevens v. Hope, 52 Mich. 65, 17 N. W. 698; Cheever v. North, 106 Mich. 390, 37 L.R.A. 561, 58 Am. St. Rep. 499, 64 N. W. 455; Marsh v. Marsh, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 77, 64 Am. Dec. 598. Clearly this is the doctrine heretofore announced by us in McCarn v. Rundall, 111 Iowa, 406, 82 N. W. 924 and Re Dunahugh, 130 Iowa, 692, 107 N. W. 925.

If revocation, either in whole or in part, is to be implied from the execution of a second will, this revocation does not become effective if the second will is destroyed or revoked before probate, for the reason that every will, as such, is ambulatory in character, and if not in existence at the time of testator's death, and there being nothing to probate except the original will, there is no inconsistency and no revocation by implication. This is the doctrine of the Connecticut and other courts, although, as we think, they unduly extend it by making it apply to instruments expressly revoking prior wills. Doubtless the reason for this was to find some ground upon which to base the doctrine of revivor, although not calling it by that name. See Peck's Appeal, 50 Conn. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 685, as explained in Blakeman v. Sears, 74 Conn. 516, 51 Atl. 517; Stetson v. Stetson, 200 Ill. 607, 61 L.R.A. 258, 66 N. E. 262; Flintham v. Bradford, 10 Pa. 90; Randall v. Beatty, 31 N. J. Eq. 643; Sewall v. Robbins, 139 Mass. 164, 29 N. E. 650. In the instant case, there was an express revocation of the former will in the one executed in the year 1904. But this second will, containing the revocatory clause, was destroyed by burning. The first will had not been destroyed, but had been kept by the testatrix, and at the time of the burning of the second there is no doubt, under the testimony, that she intended to revive the first. To be logical and inconsistent, we must hold that the second will, when executed with its clause of express revocation, revoked or canceled the first will, and we are required now to formulate a rule with reference to the revivor of the first will by reason of the destruction of the instrument of revocation. The safest doctrine, we think, is that announced by the ecclesiastical courts of England, to the effect that it is a question of testator's intent, to be gathered from admissible parol testimony. It would not do to hold that the former will was absolutely revived by the destruction of the second, for that may have been entirely contrary to testator's intent. Having made the second will, and laid aside and, perhaps, forgotten the first, it would be dangerous to hold that the destruction of the second ipso facto revived the first, no matter if testator did not so intend. On the other hand, it would in many cases frustrate testator's intent, were we to hold that the former will could only be revived in such case by a re-execution or a republication thereof after the destruction of the second will, which had not been admitted to probate, and which could not be, because of its destruction. There is no danger, then, it seems to us, in holding it to be a question of testator's intent, to be arrived at from all the circumstances in the case. Testimony to establish such intent could only come from disinterested witnesses, and we can perceive of no harm which would result in submitting such question as one of fact.

In the construction of wills, testator's intent has always been regarded as controlling, and so with reference to what should be regarded as his will. There can be no valid objection to a rule leaving the question of revivor in such cases as this to be found as a matter of intent upon permissible parol testimony.

Declarations of testator at the time of revoking a will have generally been admitted, when testified to by disinterested parties. Boyle v. Boyle, 158 Ill. 228, 42 N. E. 140; Behrens v. Behrens, 47 Ohio St. 323, 21 Am. St. Rep. 820, 25 N. E. 209; Re Steinke, 95 Wis. 121, 70 N. W. 61. Even where a contrary rule prevails, admissions are admissible when part of the res gestæ. Caeman v. Van Hark, 33 Kan. 333, 6 Pac. 620; Hayes v. West, 37 Ind. 21; Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157, 62 Am. Dec. 71; Townsend v. Howard, 86 Me. 285, 29 Atl. 1077; Pickens v. Davis, 134 Mass. 252, 45 Am. Rep. 322; Williams v. Williams, 142 Mass. 515, 8 N. E. 424. There are the conclusions announced in Barksdale v. Hopkins, 23 Ga. 332; McClure v. McClure, 86 Tenn. 174, 6 S. W. 44; Carpenter v. Miller, 3 W. Va. 174, 100 Am. Dec. 744; Re Gould, 72 Vt. 316, 47 Atl. 1082; Rice County v. Scott, 88 Minn. 386, 93 N. W. 109; Colvin v. Warford, 20 Md. 357; Lane v. Hill, 68 N. H. 275, 73 Am. St. Rep. 591, 44 Atl. 393.

We do not think there is any presumption one way or the other from the destruction of the instrument of revocation. The whole matter is one of fact, dependent upon the testimony which may be offered to show testator's intent. This is the rule announced by the later and better authorities, as shown in Williams v. Miles, 68 Neb. 463, 62 L.R.A. 383, 110 Am. St. Rep. 431, 94 N. W. 705, 96 N. W. 151, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 306, and the one best calculated to effectuate justice. It is the rule by statute in New York and Indiana. See Re Forbes, 24 N. Y. Supp. 841; Kern v. Kern, 154 Ind. 29, 55 N. E. 1004. The result of its application to the case at bar is to affirm the judgment of the court below, and it is so ordered.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

FREDERICK VOLLI, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FREDERICK WIRTH.

(164 Mich. 21, 129 N. W. 9.)

Limitation of action — oral loan.

The right to recover money loaned at interest without any agreement as to the time of its return, or written evidence of the transaction, is barred if demand is not made within the statutory period for simple contract debts.

(December 22, 1910.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover money loaned at interest. Affirmed.

Statement by Ostrander, J.:

This action was begun in justice's court, where the plaintiff declared, orally, upon the common counts in assumpsit, and filed a bill of particulars, the last item of which was money delivered to defendant December 11, 1898. The plea was the general issue, with notice that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. In the circuit court the cause came on to be tried October 22, 1909, and counsel for plaintiff made an opening statement to the jury. This statement, in substance and effect, was that plaintiff came to this country from Germany in 1889, and became acquainted with the defendant, "I think during the first or second year he was in this country. At any rate, within the first years he was in this country, he was out of employment and not feeling very well, and he went to Mr. Wirth's and stayed there, and made it his home, and while there he let Mr. Wirth have $40, without any statement about the interest. He just let him have it to take care of, and upon the express agreement that when he wanted the money, he should tell Mr. Wirth that he wanted it, and then Mr. Wirth, after being told that he wanted it, was to have a reasonable time to raise the money, and not be crowded. And the thing ran along a year or such a matter, and he let him have $12 more on the same arrangement,—nothing said about interest,—just let him have it to take care of it; and it was stated when he wanted it he would pay him the two sums together. And about a year after that, $18; and about a year after that, and, I think, the latter part of the year 1898, Mr. Volli had some money in the City Savings Bank, and Mr. Wirth wanted to use some money, and he spoke to him about it, and he either drew the whole sum, or the principal portion of it, from the bank and gave it to him, again upon the identical same understanding he had given him the other money. He was to take care of it for him and use it, and take care of it, and nothing said about the interest, and pay him back when he wanted it, and he let him have $180 at that time.

. . . And the thing ran along until about November, 1905. Mr. Volli wanted to get his money together, and he asked Mr. Jacob Kuester, a carpenter living upon Medbury avenue, 1050 Medbury, a man whose acquaintance he had made, and a friend of his, where he sometimes stayed when he had no particular work, and he took him out, and Mrs. Kuester fixed up in German a paper, an acknowledgment showing what sums of money he had let him have up to that time. And he went out then and told him he would either like to have the money or else sign an acknowledgment, because he could not tell what might happen, and Mr. Wirth says: 'You give me another year, and come again, and I will pay you the whole sum,' and he went away again, and he did not make further demand upon him at that time, until about two years after. And he . . . went out there a year ago last summer, shortly before these suits were started, and he again asked him to pay the money, or give some obligation. He says: 'You never come out here unless you bring a couple of loafers with you, and I want you to get off my farm,' and he drove them off the place. And Mr. Volli then brought suit to recover his money, and you all understand that there is a certain jurisdiction in the justice court; so he brought suit for these four sums, $40, $12, $18, and $180, and that is the suit that is now before you for determination."

At the conclusion of this statement, the attorney for defendant submitted to the court whether, assuming the facts stated to be proven, plaintiff was entitled to recover. In answer to questions by the court, the attorney for the plaintiff stated that no receipt for the money was given, no partial payment ever made, no note given, the defendant had not been absent from the state, but had lived all the time within 4 or 5 miles of the plaintiff, plaintiff had not been confined or insane. After an argument, during which plaintiff's attorney was permitted to offer in evidence a paper writing, referred to in the opening statement of counsel, which was prepared for the purpose of obtaining an acknowledgment of the debt from the defendant, the court directed a verdict for the defendant. This writing, literally translated, reads: "I have of Mr. Frederick Volli a capital borrowed and indeed in sums: first, $40, then $12, $18. On 26 December, 1898, the sum of $180, then later $50 and then $25; now is the sum $325 to-day not yet paid with interest. Detroit, the 2 Dec. 1905."

A number of requests to charge were preferred on the part of the plaintiff and refused, and exceptions were taken. The question presented by the assignments of error is whether the action is barred by the statute of limitations; it being admitted that the last item of money involved in this suit was given to defendant December 11, 1898, and the first demand was made December 2, 1905.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The writing prepared at the instance of the plaintiff indicates that interest was due, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and that interest was expected is conceded in the brief for plaintiff. It seems, then, that each transaction amounted to a lending of money upon interest, payable within a reasonable time after demand. It is not perceived in what respect the case would be different if each time plaintiff gave defendant money, he had received a demand note or a receipt for money to be accounted for on demand. And if it be assumed that an actual demand was contemplated by the parties, and was necessary before an action to recover the money could be maintained, no demand was made until nearly seven years had expired after the last money was given to defendant. The court therefore was not in error in holding that the plaintiff could not recover. Palmer v. Palmer, 36 Mich. 487, 24 Am. Rep. 605; Freeman v. Ingerson, 143 Mich. 7, 106 N. W. 278.

The judgment is affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN A. ROBERTSON

v.

T. W. HALTON, Appt.

(156 N. C. 215, 72 S. E. 316.)

Damages — fraud in horse trade — substitution — amount.

1. If one who, in trading horses, defrauded the other party, substitutes another animal for the one originally transferred, upon complaint of the party defrauded, the measure of damages in case the latter animal is not as represented is merely the difference between the value which the substituted animal would have had had it been as represented and what it in fact was, and damages cannot be awarded upon both transactions.

Evidence — fraud — different transactions.

2. In an action to recover damages for false representations in regard to an animal which one who had defrauded another in a trade substituted for the one which he first transferred, evidence of the deceit in the first transaction is admissible to prove intent in the last.

(October 11, 1911.)

Note. — May purchaser recover damages for breach of warranty or fraud as to both articles, where one article is substituted for another at his request, and both are defective.

The right of a purchaser to recover damages for fraud or breach of warranty as to different articles, where a substitution has been made at his request, but neither article complies with the representation or warranty, depends upon all the circumstances

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged deceit and false representations by defendant in a horse trade. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Moore & Dunn for appellant.

Messrs. Simmons & Ward for appellee.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover damages in the sum of $125 for deceit and false warranty in a horse trade, and was tried upon issues which, with the answers thereto, are as follows: "(1) Did the defendant procure the exchange of his mule for plaintiff's mare by fraud and misrepresentation, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yea. (2) If so, what damages is plaintiff entitled to recover by reason thereof? Answer: Fifty dollars. (3) Did defendant procure the exchange of his mare for the mule swapped him by plaintiff by fraud and misrepresentation, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (4) If so, what damages is plaintiff entitled to recover by reason thereof? Answer: Seventy-five dollars." Plaintiff alleged that he was fraudulently induced by the defendant to exchange a bay mare he owned and valued at $200 for a mule owned by the defendant, and $20 as the difference in the value between the two animals, with the understanding that the mule could be returned and another mule substituted, if desired by plaintiff; that, in order to induce the plaintiff to trade, the defendant warranted the mule in several respects, and made certain false and deceitful representations to him as to the fine qualities of the mule. When the plaintiff discovered that he had been deceived, he told the defendant that he was not satisfied with the trade, and that he must make his representations good, whereupon the defendant said that he had a good mare he would substitute for the mule, and of each particular case. If the substitution in effect constitutes a new agreement, made in compromise and settlement of the purchase under the original agreement, there being no reason why such a settlement could not properly be made, it will ordinarily bar the right of the purchaser to claim damages, either general or special, for the original breach of warranty or fraud practised upon him. On the other hand, if the second transaction amounts to a mere substitution of one article for another, leaving the original contract in full force, a different rule applies, and the purchaser may recover damages for breach of warranty as to the original article, or he may rescind and recover the entire amount paid, including the amount paid on the original contract. Broderick v. Hartman, 141 Mo. App. 259, 124 S. W. 1060; Russell v. Wolff, 19 Misc. 536, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1077; Smith v. Newberry, 140 N. C. 385, 53 S. E. 234.

In Smith v. Newberry, supra, the court, in holding that if the seller made a new contract with the buyer, taking the property sold back, and substituting another for an additional consideration to boot, whatever rights the purchaser had under the original contract were surrendered, remarked: "It is but common fairness to require men to deal frankly with each other, and when new and substituted contracts are made, to say whether they intend to reserve controverted claims and demands growing out of the original transaction. It may well be that in making the second trade, both parties took into account the conditions attaching to the first. If they did not do so, they should have said so."

Where a contract for the sale of property contains an agreement for substitution if not satisfactory, the purchaser may rescind the original contract after substitution has been made, on the ground that the substituted article does not fulfil the warranty, and the measure of his recovery is the purchase price paid under the contract. Housing v. Solomon, 127 Mich. 654, 87 N. W. 57. And this is also the measure of recovery where the seller agrees to make a substitution and fails to do so. Tygart v. Sutton, 8 Ga. App. 20, 68 S. E. 488; Russell v. Wolff, 19 Misc. 536, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1077; Vogel v. Osborne, 34 Minn. 454, 26 N. W. 453. In either case, if the purchaser has not paid the purchase price, he is entitled to recover at least nominal damages. Vogel v. Osborne, 34 Minn. 454, 26 N. W. 453. Compare with ROBERTSON v. HALTON, holding that under such circumstances damages cannot be based on a warranty as to both articles, unless the damages are special.

If, by the second contract or substitution, the purchaser, in accepting the substituted property, receives the full value of the consideration paid for the property received under the original contract, his damage for the breach of the warranty under the original contract is but nominal. Smith v. Newberry, 140 N. C. 385, 53 S. E. 234. And damages for breach of warranty as to the article originally delivered cannot be claimed where a substitution is made which fully meets the warranty, and is accepted by the purchaser as satisfactory. R. B. Gage Mfg. Co. v. Woodward, 17 R. I. 464, 23 Atl. 16.

An agreement subsequently entered into to replace any property theretofore sold, found to be defective, does not bar the purchaser from maintaining an action for breach of warranty, based on the original contract, the agreement not constituting a settlement thereof. Broderick v. Hartman, 141 Mo. App. 259, 124 S. W. 1060.

A. G. S.

at the same time made certain warranties and deceitful representations as to her fine qualities. Judgment was entered upon the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

It will be observed at a glance by anyone reading the evidence sent up that this case has been tried upon a wrong theory. Why should the defendant be twice mulcted in damages? The trade was, at first, that they should exchange the plaintiff's mare for the mule and $20. If there had been no further exchange or negotiation and there was a breach of warranty as to the mule, or a deceit practised upon the plaintiff, he would be entitled to recover this difference between the value of the mule as he was and as he was represented to be, or as, under the contract or the representation, he should have been. When they again traded, the defendant's mare took the place of the mule, and why is not the measure of damages the difference between the value of the defendant's mare, which he substituted for the mule, as it was and as it should have been? The defendant's mare took the place of the mule, and in this way any damages for deceit in the exchange of the mule and $20 "to boot" for the plaintiff's mare were satisfied. If the mare, which was substituted for the mule in the trade, had answered the terms of the warranty or representation, the plaintiff surely could not recover damages for the first deceit, unless he had suffered some special loss in addition to the ordinary damages which result in such cases from the deceit or false warranty, as in Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 630, 30 L. ed. 810, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 696, where the warranty or representation was that certain rags, which the plaintiff sold to the defendant, were clean and in sanitary condition, and they turned out to be infected with germs of smallpox, and consequently the disease broke out in the defendant's mill and spread among his employees, causing him great loss and damage, and the court held that the defendant was entitled to recover damages for the wrong commensurate with loss, either upon the warranty or the count for deceit; and in this connection Justice Gray, who wrote the opinion, said: "The damages recoverable for a breach of warranty, or for a false representation, include all damages which, in the contemplation of the parties, or according to the natural or usual course of things, may result from the wrongful act. For instance, if a man sells hay or grain for the purpose of being fed to cattle, or such as is ordinarily used to feed cattle, and it contains a substance which poisons the buyer's cattle, the seller is responsible for the injury. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440; 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

While the court seems to have given the correct instruction in regard to the measure of damages,—that is, the difference between the value of the mare, as represented by the defendant, and its real value,—the jury were permitted, under the direction of the court, to assess damages as to both transactions,—the first swap and the second or substituted one. This was error. The charge of the court is also very meager, and as to the deceit, it omitted an essential element,—the scienter. There was abundant proof of a scienter, but it was not correctly applied, if considered at all in the charge; and for that reason we have called attention to the law, as stated in former decisions of this court, and it will be well in such cases to be guided by them. The deceit in the first transaction, if established, will be evidence of the intent or scienter in the last, as the two are so closely connected with each other, and such evidence is admissible to show fraud in the second exchange, under the rule in Brink v. Black, 77 N. C. 69, and subsequent cases approving it. Gilmer v. Hanks, 84 N. C. 317;

Coble v. Huffines, 133 N. C. 422, 45 S. E. 760. A case directly in point is State v. Weaver, 104 N. C. 758, 10 S. E. 486. But the first transaction is not a separate cause of action, and is only relevant to the controversy as tending to show the deceitful purpose in the last exchange.

We decide, therefore, that there should have been two separate issues: one as to the warranty, and the other as to damages, unless the case is so presented at the next trial that the rule of damages for the deceit and the one for the warranty will not be the same, in which case there may be an issue as to the damages for each cause of action; but we hardly see how this can be upon the evidence as it now appears. When there are no punitive damages, one issue as to damages, in cases like this, is generally sufficient, unless there is more than one cause of action, so relating to different transactions as to entitle the plaintiff or other party to an assessment of damages upon each of them.

In regard to the nature of the warranty or deceit, much must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case, as it is presented. We have stated some general rules, though, which will serve as guides to us in such matters: (1) When the statements made by sellers amount to nothing more upon their face than a mere commendation of the goods which is usual in sales,—a puffing of wares, as it is sometimes called,—there is no warranty or deceit. National Cash Register Co. v. Townsend, 137 N. C. 652, 70 L.R.A. 349, 50 S. E. 308. (2) Where the statement takes the form of an opinion or estimate of value or quality, and it is doubtful whether or not a warranty was intended, the question should be submitted to the jury to say whether one was, in fact, intended. Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft Bros. 155 N. C. 63, 71 S. E. 61, citing authorities. In McKinnon v. McIntosh, 98 N. C. 89, 3 S. E. 840, it was said upon a kindred question, relating to a sale of fertilizers: "The defendant had a right to have the question whether the force and effect of the affirmations of the plaintiff in regard to the quality of the fertilizer did not constitute a warranty of the quality [go to the jury]. If the vendor represents an article as possessing a value which, upon proof, it does not possess, he is liable as on a warranty, express or implied, although he may not have known such an affirmation to be false, if such representation was intended not as a mere expression of opinion, but the positive assertion of a fact upon which the purchaser acts; and this is a question for the jury. Thompson v. Tate, 5 N. C. (1 Murph.) 97, 3 Am. Dec. 678; Inge v. Bond, 10 N. C. (3 Hawks) 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

101; Foggart v. Blackweller, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 238; Bell v. Jeffreys, 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 356; Henson v. King, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 419; Lewis v. Rountree, 78 N. C. 323; Baum v. Stevens, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 411." (3) Where, though, the words or language clearly show a warranty, it becomes a question of law for the court, without the aid of the jury, to so declare, as in Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft Bros. supra; Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Feezer, 152 N. C. 516, 67 S. E. 1004; Audit Co. v. Taylor, 152 N. C. 272, 67 S. E. 582. (4) In order to constitute a deceit, several facts must concur and be established by the proof. There must be a statement made by the defendant (a) which is untrue. (b) The person making the statement, or the person responsible for it, either must know it to be untrue, or be culpably ignorant (that is, recklessly and consciously ignorant) whether it be true or not. (c) It must be made with the intent that the plaintiff shall act upon it, or in a manner apparently fitted to induce him to act upon it. (d) The plaintiff must act in reliance on the statement in the manner contemplated or manifestly probable, and thereby suffer damage. 155 N. C. 66, 71 S. E. 62 second column; Pollock, Torts, 7th ed. 276; Whitehurst v. Life Ins. Co. 149 N. C. 273, 62 S. E. 1067; Unitype Co. v. Ashcraft Bros. supra. The gist of the action for deceit is fraudulently producing a false impression upon the mind of the other party by words or acts, or concealment or suppression of material facts not equally within the knowledge or reach of the plaintiff. Stewart v. Wyoming Cattle Ranch Co. 128 U. S. 383, 32 L. ed. 439, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 101. In order to maintain the action, it is sufficient to show that the defendant practised a deception with the design of depriving the plaintiff of some right, profit, or advantage, and to acquire it for himself or avail himself of it in some way. National Bank & L. Co. v. Petrie, 189 U. S. 423-425, 47 L. ed. 879-881, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 512. In Whitmire v. Heath, 155 N. C. 304, 71 S. E. 314, the three requisites of an actionable deceit were thus stated: "(1) The representation must be false. (2) The party making it must know that it is false, commonly called the 'scienter.' (3) It must have misled the other party and induced him to contract upon the faith of the representation as true,"—citing numerous cases, and specially Lunn v. Shermer, 93 N. C. 164; Black v. Black, 110 N. C. 398, 14 S. E. 971; Ashe v. Gray, 88 N. C. 190 (s. c. on rehearing, 90 N. C. 137),—all actions against horse dealers. (5) A warranty is contractual, but may be joined with a cause of action for deceit, which is a tort.

The old and new mode of pleading is clearly stated in Ashe v. Gray, supra, and, quoting from the opinion of the court (by Chief Justice Pearson) in Bullinger v. Marshall, 70 N. C. 520, Chief Justice Smith says: "If there be a warranty of soundness in the sale of a horse, the vendee may sue upon the contract of warranty, and the justice of the peace has jurisdiction, or may declare in tort for a false warranty, and add a count in deceit, in which case a justice of the peace has not jurisdiction, the plaintiff being permitted to declare collaterally in tort for a false warranty in order to enable him to give in a court for the deceit, which, of course, was in tort." Ashe v. Gray, 88 N. C. 192. See also same case (Ashe v. Gray) on rehearing, 90 N. C. 137.

For the error noted by us, a new trial upon all the issues will be had in the lower court.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

GEORGE MITCHELL, Appt.,

(156 N. C. 659, 72 S. E. 632.)

Intoxicating liquor — exchanging — liability.

Lending whisky with the understanding that it is to be returned in kind is within a statute making it unlawful in any manner to sell or otherwise dispose of intoxicating liquor for gain.

(November 15, 1911.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Forsyth County, convicting him of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Louis M. Swink and J. S. Grogan for appellant.

Messrs. T. W. Bickett, Attorney General, and G. L. Jones, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is but one question presented, and that is: Is it a violation of the prohibition act for one to lend another whisky, upon the understanding that other whisky will be returned in place of it? The evidence is contradictory. The prosecuting witness testified that he purchased the liquor for cash, and paid 50 cents down when he made the purchase. The defendant testified that he furnished whisky to the prosecuting witness, but that it was a loan, and upon the understanding that the whisky was to be returned as soon as an order made by prosecuting witness could be received.

The point comes up on the charge of the court, who instructed the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the witness Curry applied to the defendant for liquor, and it was then and there agreed by and between the witness Curry and the defendant that the defendant would let Curry have whisky, in consideration of an agreement on the part of Curry to deliver to the defendant other whisky in return for that which he received, and after this agreement was made the defendant delivered to the witness Curry a quantity of whisky, in consideration of the agreement of Curry to deliver to the defendant a like quantity when Curry's whisky arrived on the train, such transaction, if not a technical sale, would nevertheless be such as is made unlawful by the statute to which your attention has been directed, and your verdict will be 'guilty.'"

This exact question has never been decided in this state, and it has been decided both ways in other jurisdictions. The Cyclopædia of Law and Procedure says: "Where the statute prohibits the sale of liquor by certain persons or under certain conditions, and the indictment distinctly charges a sale, there can be no conviction on evidence which proves a gift or exchange of liquor, as distinguished from a sale." Again, on page 181 of the same volume: "A loan of liquor; with the understanding that it is to be repaid in other liquor of the same kind, is not a sale." 23 Cyc. 269. The author of the article in Cyc. is Henry C. Black, author of the well-known work on Intoxicating Liquors. The cases cited in the notes do not appear to fully sustain the text. It is held in Georgia that an exchange of liquor does not constitute a sale. Skinner v. State, 97 Ga. 690, 25 S. E. 364. Same in Arkansas. Robinson v. State, 59 Ark. 341, 27 S. W. 233. It was so decided in Texas in Ray v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 176, 79 S. W. 535, but specially held otherwise, and the Ray Case overruled, in Tombeaugh v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 286, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 937, 123 Am. St. Rep. 841, 98 S. W. 1054, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 275.

The true rule, we think, is clearly stated by the court of criminal appeals of Texas in the latter case: "While the doctrine of an accommodation exchange seems to have been recognized by this court in the Ray Case, supra, in our opinion that case should be overruled. There might be a case—to illustrate, where some member of a family should be bitten by a snake, or some venomous insect—that would require the immediate use of whisky, with no time to send for a physician to obtain a prescription. In such case it might be allowable to borrow whisky from a neighbor on account of such emergency. We do not believe the doctrine should be extended beyond some pressing necessity. Certainly not to a case of a loan by one club member of whisky to a stranger in social drinking or as a beverage. In our opinion, it makes no difference in this respect whether the party loaning be a club member or not. His exchange of whisky to another person under the circumstances here detailed would be a sale, and comes under the doctrine announced in Keaton's Case, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 259, 38 S. W. 522. We fail to see any difference between such transaction and the payment of money for the whisky at the time." These cases appear to sustain that view: Com. v. Clark, 14 Gray, 387; Com. v. Abrams, 150 Mass. 393, 23 N. E. 53; Leach v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 53 S. W. 630; Taggart v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 97 S. W. 95; Sparks v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 99 S. W. 546; Coleman v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 578, 111 S. W. 1011; Beckham v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 28, 111 S. W. 1017; Wilson v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 13, 111 S. W. 1018.

Justice Manning, in State v. Colonial Club, 154 N. C. 177, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 387, 69 S. E. 771, reviews the authorities to some extent as to what constitutes a sale. Quoting from 2 Bl. Com. 446, he says: "A sale is a transmutation of property from one man to another, in consideration of some price or recompense in value." Justice Dillard, in State v. McMinn, 83 N. C. 668, defines a sale as follows: "A sale is the transmutation of the property in a personal chattel from one to another on a quid pro quo, paid or agreed to be paid, and such a change of property in the retail of spirituous liquors by the small measure is usually effected by the delivery of the article and the payment of the price simultaneously; but it may be in other modes," etc.

We think, tested by these definitions, in any view of the evidence, the transaction constituted a sale, and was a clear violation of the prohibition law of this state. The transaction was nothing more or less, according to the defendant's own evidence, than a barter of liquor. The title to the liquor passed absolutely, and the same rules of law are applicable to the transaction, whether the consideration of the contract is money or other liquor to be delivered at some future date. As said in Com. v. Clark, supra, by the supreme court of Massachusetts. "It can make no essential difference in the rights and obligations of parties that goods and merchandise are transferred and paid for by other goods and merchandise, instead of by money, which is but the representative of value or property."

In adopting the prohibition statute enacted by the general assembly, our voters had in view the prevention of the traffic in intoxicating liquors in the state. If it were allowable to carry on an exchange or barter for whisky, the law would be rendered practically worthless and incapable of enforcement. Whenever a person was charged with an illicit sale of liquor, the defense in most cases doubtless would be that the transaction was only an exchange or barter. Our statute is very broad and comprehensive in its terms, and its framers evidently had in view, not only the prohibition of a sale of liquor for money, but for barter likewise. It reads: "It shall be unlawful for any person or persons, firm or corporation, to manufacture or in any manner make, or sell, or otherwise dispose of for gain," etc. Public Acts, Extra Session, 1908, chap. 71.

We think his Honor was correct in his instructions to the jury.

No error.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

EX PARTE EARL EPPERSON.

(— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 134 S. W. 685.)

Municipal corporation — automobile — forbidding operation by children.

Charter authority to license and regulate hackmen, draymen, drivers, and all others pursuing like occupations, does not empower a municipality to forbid children under a specified age to operate automobiles on its streets.

(February 15, 1911.)

Note. — Power to prescribe qualifications of chauffeurs.

While it is common in acts regulating the use of motor vehicles to make some provision as to the qualifications of chauffeurs, the question of the validity of these provisions does not seem to have been often questioned.

In Chicago v. Banker, 112 Ill. App. 94,

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to secure the release of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed under an alleged invalid ordinance. Petitioner discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kennedy & Robbins for applicant.

Mr. C. E. Lane for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original application for writ of habeas corpus. The city of Clarksville, organized under the general incorporation laws of Texas as a municipal corporation, passed the following ordinance: "It shall be unlawful for any person under the age of sixteen years to operate any automobile or other motor vehicle upon the streets or ways of the city of Clarksville,"—and in a subsequent ordinance prescribes a penalty of not less than $5 nor more than $100. There is an agreement in the statement of facts that the city of Clarksville had not by any ordinance prescribed any manner or means by which a person's ability to operate an automobile or other motor vehicle may be ascertained, and the qualifications of the driver of such vehicle are not specified nor prescribed by the ordinance. It is further agreed that the applicant is fifteen years of age.

Two questions are presented to this court: "First, the age of the applicant; second, the constitutionality of the ordinance under which the applicant was arrested." Relator's contention is that the ordinance is invalid, first, because the city council of the city of Clarksville had no authority, express or implied, under the general laws of the state, under which the city is incorporated, to enact such legislation; second, that, even though the city council had authority to enact such legislation, it is nevertheless void, because it is an arbitrary exercise of power, is discriminatory, and in derogation of common rights; third, the ordinance is void, because it prohibits an occupation recognized by the state as lawful and conceded by the public as useful and remunerative; and, fourth, the ordinance is unconstitutional and void, because it deprives persons of their liberty—that is, the right to follow a lawful avocation for the support of life, as well as in pursuit of happiness and pleasure—without due process of law.

The city of Clarksville, being organized as a municipal corporation under the general laws of the state, must look to such law for its authority to act. Article 430, Sayles's Anno. Civ. Stat. 1897, is as follows: "To license, tax, and regulate hackmen, draymen, omnibus drivers and drivers of baggage wagons, porters, and all others pursuing like occupations, with or without vehicles, and prescribe their compensation, and provide for their protection, and make it a misdemeanor for any person to attempt to defraud them of any legal charge for services rendered, and to regulate, license, and restrain runners for railroads, stages, and public houses." It will be noticed from the reading of this article that the city is limited in regard to the matters specified to those of regulation. The statute nowhere grants power to a city council to prohibit any of the matters specified in said article. It is a familiar rule, and thoroughly settled, that municipal corporations have only such power as may be granted by the legislature, unless otherwise provided in the Constitution; and wherever the question of grant of power is at issue, the grant will be taken more strongly in favor of the granting power, and against the grantee, where an application of this principle is made to municipal corporations. Applying this rule to the statute quoted, it will be observed that the power of the municipal corporation in regard to the control of matters therein stated is only one of regulation, and not one of prohibition. Viewed from this standpoint of the law, the ordinance is invalid, and must be held void, and the applicant discharged from custody.

The applicant is ordered discharged from custody.

It was held that an ordinance compelling one who used his automobile for his private business and pleasure only to submit to an examination and take out a license (if the examining board saw fit to grant it) imposed a burden upon one class of citizens in the use of the streets, not imposed upon others, and the ordinance was held beyond the power of the city council, and void.

In Unwen v. State, 73 N. J. L. 529, 64 Atl. 163, a legislative act requiring every resident or nonresident owner of an automobbile to file a verified declaration that he was competent to drive a motor vehicle, and a statement of his name and address, and a description of his automobile, and providing for a fee of $1, was held within the exercise of the police power.

For a note on validity of excise or license tax upon automobiles, see Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 215, and the supplemental note to Mark v. District of Columbia, post, 440.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, Appt.,

v.

JOSEPH M. SNOW, Resp't.

(65 Wash. 353, 118 Pac. 209.)

Larceny — misappropriation by officer — legality of possession.

A statute rendering it larceny for one having property in his control, as a public officer, to appropriate it to his own use, applies to an officer having public money in his possession, although no law authorized him to receive it.

(October 19, 1911.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Superior Court for Thurston County sustaining a demurrer to an information charging defendant with the crime of grand larceny. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. V. Tanner, Attorney General, George A. Lee, Assistant Attorney General, and John M. Wilson, for the State:

The information follows the section of the statute defining larceny, and states facts sufficient to constitute a crime against the laws of the state of Washington.

State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 1; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, 8th ed. § 364; Skagit County v. American Bonding Co. 59 Wash. 1-15, 109 Pac. 197-199; State v. O'Brien, 24 Tenn. 79, 26 L.R.A. 252, 28 S. W. 311; Ex parte Ricord, 11 Nev. 288; Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 109; People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 35 Pac. 80; People v. Hawkins, 106 Mich. 484, 64 N. W. 736; People v. Sanders, 139 Mich. 442, 102 N. W. 959; State v. Tumey, 81 Ind. 559; State v. Pohlmeier, 59 Ohio St. 491, 52 N. E. 1027; People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 631, 39 Pac. 524.

Messrs. Thomas M. Vance and C. E. Collier for respondent.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the state from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an information.

The charging part of the information is as follows: "That on or about the 31st day of July, 1909, at Olympia, in the county of Thurston and state of Washington, one Joseph M. Snow did commit the crime of grand larceny as follows, to wit: He, the said Joseph M. Snow, then and there being an officer of the state of Washington, to wit, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting state highway commissioner of said state, and then and there having in his possession, custody, and control, as such officer, the sum of two thousand one hundred forty-two and  $\frac{05}{100}$  (\$2,142.05) dollars in lawful money of the United States, of the value of two thousand one hundred forty-two and  $\frac{05}{100}$  (\$2,142.50) dollars, being the property and funds of said state of Washington, did then and there unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously, and with intent to deprive and defraud the state of Washington thereof, withhold, steal, and appropriate to his own use the said sum of two thousand one hundred and forty-two and  $\frac{05}{100}$  (\$2,142.05) dollars."

The Code (Rem. & Bal. § 2801) provides that "every person who, with intent to deprive or defraud the owner thereof— . . . (3) Having any property in his possession, custody, or control, as bailee, factor, pledgee, servant, attorney, agent, employee, trustee, executor, administrator, guardian, or officer of any person, estate, association, or corporation, or as a public officer, or a person authorized by agreement or by competent authority to take or hold such possession, custody, or control, or as a finder thereof, shall secrete, withhold, or appropriate the same to his own use or to the use of any person other than the true owner or person entitled thereto," steals such property and is guilty of larceny. The grade of the offense is defined by § 2805. The grounds of demurrer are (1) that the information does not charge a crime or offense, and (2) that the court is without jurisdiction. The judgment was that the "general demurrer" be and is sustained, and that the case be dismissed.

The only question presented by the appeal is the legal sufficiency of the information. The position of the state is that the respondent is fraudulently holding funds of the state as a public officer, and that the information charges a crime under the terms of the statute quoted, regardless of the fact that there is no law authorizing him to "receive" the money. On the other hand, the respondent contends that, there being no law authorizing him to receive the money, he is not within the denunciation of the statute. A careful reading of the statute discloses that it is twofold in its nature, as applied to the fraudulent withholding or appropriation of public property by a public officer. The first provision is directed only against the unlawful withholding or appropriation. The second is directed against such unlawful withholding or appropriation by a person "authorized, by agreement or by competent authority, to take or hold" the possession, custody, or control. The respondent is charged only with an infraction of the first provision of the statute. The information does not charge that he was authorized by "competent authority to take or hold" the property. The charge is that having the money of the state in his possession, custody, and control as a state highway commissioner, he unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously appropriated it to his own use. It seems clear that the legislature contemplated that a public officer might have property of the state in his possession and custody without warrant of law, and that it intended to make it criminal for such an officer to fraudulently withhold or appropriate it to his own use.

Note. — For embezzlement as affected by want of authority of defendant to receive the money or property in the first instance, see note to Smith v. State, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531.

But, putting this view to one side, we think the information charges a crime. The charge is that the respondent fraudulently withheld public money as a public officer. This the statute condemns as a criminal offense. Respondent cannot obtain and hold the property of the state in virtue of his office, and excuse himself from criminal responsibility by admitting the actual withholding, and by asserting that he received it without statutory authority, and hence that he does not hold it as a public officer. This view is, we think, in accord with the better authority. In State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 1, the indictment charged the defendant as city clerk with embezzling city money. By far the larger portion of the money was received by him as license fees. There was no statute or ordinance authorizing him to receive such money. It was contended on his behalf that the money did not belong to the city, but to the licensees, from whom he received it without lawful authority. In meeting this contention, the court, speaking through Judge Brewer, said: "On the other hand, the state rests upon the broad proposition that, when a party assumes to act for another, he is concluded by that assumption, no matter who else is bound; that if A assumes to act as the agent of B, and receives money belonging to B, he cannot thereafter deny that it is B's money, and that, notwithstanding B is not concluded by his acts, and though in fact he was not the agent of B; that this doctrine, universally recognized in civil, is equally true in criminal, law. A man may not say: 'I have the right to receive money,' and receive it, and then, when challenged for its receipt or embezzlement, avoid liability by saying, 'I had no right to receive it.' He has voluntarily assumed a position the responsibilities of which he may not avoid. The defendant may not say that he holds this money simply for the licensees, because he himself has issued the licenses, which he might rightfully issue only when the city had received the money; that by issuing, he conclusively, so far as he was concerned, affirmed that the money he had received and was holding was city money. The law of estoppel binds him, whether it binds anyone else or not, and is equally potent in a criminal as well as a civil action. . . . But we hold that, when one assumes to act as agent for another, he may not, when challenged for those acts, deny his agency; that he is estopped not merely as against his assumed principal, but also as against the state; that one who is agent enough to receive money is agent enough to be punished for embezzling it. An agency de facto, an actual, even though not legal, employment, is sufficient." In Skagit County v. American Bonding Co. 59 Wash. 1, 109 Pac. 197, a like contention was made on behalf of the appellant, a surety for a defaulting county auditor, and rejected by this court. While not stated in direct terms, the gist of the decision is that a public officer, who receives public funds without statutory authority, but in virtue of his office, is estopped to dispute his right to receive it.

In Ex parte Ricord, 11 Nev. 287, it is held that it does not lie in the mouth of one who holds the money of another to deny that he had the authority which he claimed in order to collect it, and which the confidence reposed in him by his employer enabled him to claim with success. In People v. Hawkins, 106 Mich. 479, 64 N. W. 736, the court, addressing itself to the inquiry as to the criminal responsibility of one who receives property for another assuming to act as its agent, said: "By virtue of his relation, he became possessed of property which was not his, and which belonged to the company, if to anybody. He acted for, and permitted himself to be held out as the agent of, the company, and received money from various persons who were willing to pay. He was a de facto servant, and it is unnecessary that his relation should have grown out of a lawful contract of agency. It was enough if he acted, and was permitted to act, as such." The same rule was announced in People v. Sanders, 139 Mich. 442, 102 N. W. 959, where the defendant as a deputy township treasurer came into the possession of money belonging to the township. The contention that there was no crime, because the money was received without lawful authority, was rejected as unsound. What we conceive to be the correct rule is aptly stated in State v. Pohlmeier, 59 Ohio St. 491, 52 N. E. 1027, in the following language: "The statutory definition of the offense regards the actual relation of the agent, servant, or employee, and not the legality of the mode in which it was created nor the extent of the authority conferred. And the rule that one who receives money or any other thing of value in the assumed exercise of authority as agent for another is estopped thereafter to deny such authority, applies in criminal prosecutions as well as in civil actions." This view has the support of Mr. Bishop. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, 364. The same principle is announced in State v. Tumey, 81 Ind. 559; People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524; State v. O'Brien, 94 Tenn. 79, 26 L.R.A. 252, 28 S. W. 311; Ex parte Hedley, 31 Cal. 109; People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 35 Pac. 80.

The respondent relies upon the following authorities: San Luis Obispo County v. Farnum, 108 Cal. 562, 41 Pac. 445; People v. Pennock, 60 N. Y. 421; Orton v. Lincoln, 156 Ill. 499, 41 N. E. 159; Warswick v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 63, 35 S. W. 386; State v. Johnson, 49 Iowa, 141, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 62; People ex rel. Howard v. Cobb, 10 Colo. App. 478, 51 Pac. 523; People ex rel. Lane v. Hilton (C. C.) 36 Fed. 172; State v. Moeller, 48 Mo. 331; Moore v. State, 53 Neb. 831, 74 N. W. 319. In the Farnum, Pennock, Orton, Cobb, Hilton, and Moeller Cases it was held that the sureties were not liable upon an official bond, where the money did not come into the hands of the principal as a public officer in pursuance of law. The bond in each of these cases was substantially the same as the bond in the Skagit County Case. In that case this court said that the breaches of duty relied upon for a recovery on the bond were for the unauthorized acts of the officer,—acts that were not a part of his official duties, but illegally performed "for his personal and private benefit." It is further said that one of the undertakings of the sureties was that their principal would give faithful, honest, and efficient service, and that, he having misappropriated and embezzled public moneys, the sureties became liable therefor. In the Warswick Case, under a statute making it a criminal offense for an officer of any county, city, or town to fraudulently take, misapply, or convert to his own use any money or property belonging to such county, city, or town "that may come into his custody or possession by virtue of his office or employment," it was held that an information charging the defendant with the receipt of a certificate of deposit as county judge, and with having fraudulently converted it, did not state a crime, there being no statute authorizing him to take the custody or possession of such property. A like view was taken in the Johnson and Moore Cases, under similar statutes. The decision in the latter case was, however, by a divided bench. Judge Sullivan, in dissenting, announced a view in harmony with that expressed by Judge Brewer in State v. Spaulding, supra. It will be noticed that in these cases the offense consisted in the conversion by a public officer of property "that may come into his custody or possession by virtue of his office or employment." The portion of the statute charged to have been violated in the case at bar contains no such provision. We fully indorse the statement of Judge Brewer in the Spaulding Case, that the law of estoppel binds the respondent, whether it binds anyone else or not, and that it is applicable alike to civil and criminal cases. The rule announced in the Pohlmeier Case, that the statute defining the offense regards the actual relation of the party to the money and not the legality of the mode of its acquirement, impresses us as being both wholesome and sound.

We think this information charges a crime, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

FULTON LIGHT, HEAT, & POWER COMPANY et al., Resp'ts.,
v.

STATE OF NEW YORK, Appt.

(200 N. Y. 400, 94 N. E. 199.)

Navigable water — title to bed.

1. The title to the bed of a nontidal navigable stream the first settlers upon which acquired their title under the principles of the common law is in the riparian owners, except where it constitutes a territorial boundary.

Boundary — on stream — title to thread.

2. A boundary in a state patent of land said to lie on the bank of a river, beginning at a tree on the east shore of the river, thence around the land to the river, and

Note. — Right of government to divert water from nontidal stream without compensation to riparian owner.

For a general treatment of the question of state and Federal ownership of waters, see note to Smith v. Deniff, 50 L.R.A. 737.

Owing to the conflict among the authorities and the different premises upon which then "up and along the same" to the place of beginning, does not prevent the title from extending to the thread of the stream.

Water — right of state to divert.

3. The right of a state to use the bed and waters of a river for the improvement of navigation does not extend to the diverting of the waters from the river to an artificial channel along the bank, constructed not for the improvement of the navigation of the river, but as a separate navigable water way, and if it attempts to do so, it must make compensation to the riparian owner for the injury thereby caused him.

(January 17, 1911.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirm-

the decisions are predicated, it is difficult to state a comprehensive general rule or rules by which the class of cases under discussion is governed, except to say in the most general way that where the title to the bed of the stream is in the riparian proprietor, any diversion of the waters thereof for public use constitutes a taking which requires compensation; and that where the title to the stream, including its bed, is in the state, the weight of authority is to the effect that, for some public purposes, at least, such waters may be diverted without liability to a riparian owner thereby deprived of the normal flow of the stream. Since at common law the title to the beds and waters of all nontidal streams was in the riparian owners, all cases permitting the public to remove the waters from such streams without compensating riparian owners are departures from the rule as originally established.

Many courts have confused the common-law test of public ownership, to wit, presence of tide, with navigability. In these jurisdictions a marked distinction is drawn between streams which are navigable and those which are not, in respect to the property which riparian owners may have in them. In a navigable stream the bed and the waters are held to belong to the state; while in non-navigable streams the owners of the bank own to the thread of the stream, or, if both banks, the entire bed; and in addition have a qualified ownership in the water itself. All streams navigable in fact are navigable in law, under both the common and civil law systems; and therefore, if navigability is made the test of public right, the public may take the water from most streams without compensation. This is contrary to the common-law rule. By the civil law, however, the running water was regarded as common property, so that by applying the civil law directly, the public might take such water as it needed without compensating anyone for it.

In some states the streams which are actually navigable are declared vested in the people by express constitutional or ing a judgment of the Court of Claims in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover compensation for the appropriation by the state of certain of plaintiffs' lands and riparian rights for barge canal purposes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel E. Brong, Andrew E. Tuck, and Arthur J. Hammond, with Mr. Edward R. O'Malley, Attorney General, for appellant.

The right to use the water of the Oswego river for power is dependent upon ownership of the bed of the river.

Sweet v. Syracuse, 129 N. Y. 316, 27 N. E. 1081, 29 N. E. 289; Lawrence v. Whitney, 115 N. Y. 410, 5 L.R.A. 417, 22 N. E. 174; People ex rel. Loomis v. Canal Ap-statutory provision; but such provisions do not affect vested rights.

In those cases which determine the rights of the state according to the navigability or non-navigability of the stream, the weight of authority, as above stated, is to the effect that in non-navigable streams water cannot be diverted by the state, even for public purposes, without compensating riparian owners thereby deprived of the right to use the diverted water.

Diversion for navigation purposes.

This note does not include those cases in which it appears that the waters were diverted in improving the navigability of the streams in which they naturally flow, as such cases as a class involve broader principles than the class of cases under discussion.

As to whether the waters of a non-navigable stream may be diverted for purposes of navigating water ways distinct from the stream from which the waters are taken, the better rule would seem to be that laid down in FULTON LIGHT, HEAT, & P. COMPANY v. STATE. This decision is directly supported by Cohen v. United States, 162 Fed. 364, where it was held that the United States government could not divert the waters of a non-navigable stream to the injury of a riparian owner, for canal purposes, where the construction of the canal was not for the benefit or improvement of that stream, but for the improvement of navigable waters in another and different locality, on the ground that such a diversion would be a taking of the private property of the riparian owner for a public use, within the meaning of the constitutional provision entitling him to compensation therefor. So, also, in Beidler v. Sanitary Dist. 211 Ill. 628, 67 L.R.A. 820, 71 N. E. 1118, it was held that the right of the public to improve navigation without liability for consequential injuries does not include the right to take the water of a stream (nontidal, and owner of banks also owner of bed of stream) to supply an artificial channel or canal. It was here

Canal Appraisers*, 33 N. Y. 461.

The title of the state to lands under public navigable waters, whether fresh or salt, is ingrafted with a trust for the ben-contended that the title of a riparian owner is subordinate to such use of the water as may be consistent with or demanded by the public right of navigation, and subject to the paramount right of the state to make any and all improvements to facilitate navigation, but the court answered by saying that such right did not extend to the making navigable of an artificial channel, and in effect held such principle applicable only in case the improvement was for the purpose of facilitating the navigation of a channel in which the water naturally flowed, or some stream or body of water naturally emptying into it, or into which it emptied. And in Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall, 26 Wend. 404, set out in FULTON LIGHT, HEAT, & P. COMPANY v. STATE, it was held that the state cannot divert the waters of a fresh-water stream, the land under which belongs to the owner of the adjacent banks, to aid in the carrying on of navigation in a canal district from the stream itself, without making compensation to the riparian owners injured by the diversion. And this rule was applied in Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow. 518, 16 Am. Dec. 447, where the complaining riparian proprietor owned to the center of the stream, it being held that the state could not divert the waters of the stream to feed a canal without making compensation to the injured owner; and in Cooper v. Williams, 5 Ohio, 391, 24 Am. Dec. 299, affirming 4 Ohio, 253, 22 Am. Dec. 745, wherein it was held that the waters of a stream cannot be diverted to feed a canal constructed under authority from the state without compensating lower riparian owners for the loss of the right to use the diverted water. Also in Avery v. Fox, 1 Abb. U. S. 246, Fed. Cas. No. 674, it was held that the Federal government, in improving navigation between the states, could not wholly divert a fresh-water stream from riparian lands by conducting the water through a canal without compensating such injured owners. And the same conclusion was reached in Lowndes v. United States, 105 Fed. 838, where, in improving navigation, the waters of a creek were diverted into a canal, to 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the injury of persons having vested rights in the waters of such creek.

In a number of jurisdictions the courts, following what they supposed to be the civil-law rule, but which was in fact established by the Code Napoleon, held that the same principles apply to fresh-water streams which are actually navigable as the jurisdictions adhering to common-law principles apply to tidal waters; namely, that the state may divert such waters for public purposes, such as navigation, without compensation except in case of interference with vested rights. Thus, in Homochitto River v. Withers, 29 Miss. 21, 64 Am. Dec. 126, the court rejected the theory that the state can do nothing which will cause a diversion of a public water course not a tidal stream, and adopted the doctrine that fresh-water streams which are actually navigable are subject to the paramount right of the state to control and dispose of the waters thereof in which the riparian owners have only a qualified right for public purposes without violating the constitutional provision against taking property. Applying the latter doctrine it was held that the state can entirely absorb a navigable nontidal stream by diverting its waters into a canal constructed to promote and facilitate navigation without liability to a riparian owner thereby deprived of all benefit formerly derived from the river. This decision was commented upon adversely in 1 Farnham, Waters, p. 404, where the author said that the court had been misled by the apparent force of certain cases which seem to imply a right to destroy the rights of riparian owners, but which in fact had no such force. It might also be worthy of note that the rule that the right of the public was superior to that of the individual, and that the individual might be made to suffer loss for the public, was changed in Mississippi by Constitution 1890, § 17, which made the right of the owner of private property superior to that of the public, wherefore he may be compelled to part with his property only by full payment for it or any right in relation to it.

The state is entitled to use the bed and waters or the river for the improvement of navigation, without compensation, by virtue of its paramount right to control navigation.

People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 196, 8 Am.

And in People ex rel. Loomis v. Canal Appraisers, 33 N. Y. 461, the court said that the territory about the Mohawk river, a fresh-water stream, had been settled under the civil law by the Dutch, and then applied to it the rule of the Code Napoleon to the effect that the title to its bed was in the people, which is contrary to the rule as laid down by the Dutch writer Vinnius (see Farnham, Waters, p. 240), and held that because of that fact the waters of the river belonged to the people, and could be diverted for canal purposes without compensating damaged riparian owners. The court attempted to evade the force of Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall, supra, on the ground that in that case there was evidence of an express grant of the bed of the stream with the grant of the bank, and that therefore it was unnecessary for the court to base the decision on the fact that the river was a fresh-water stream, and the title in the riparian owner because of that fact. But in Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393, set out infra, in subdivision entitled, "Diversion for water-supply purposes," Chancellor Kent's rule of navigability, that is, presence or absence of tide, was adopted as to all fresh-water streams in New York state except the Mohawk and the Hudson rivers, and the doctrine of People ex rel. Loomis v. Canal Appraisers, held applicable to such rivers only.

And in Rundle v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 14 How. 80, 14 L. ed. 335, it was held that under the principles of the civil law as adopted in Pennsylvania, under which her large fresh-water rivers are treated as belonging to the public, the waters in such a river could be diverted by a canal company chartered to construct a canal for purposes of navigation between that river and another river, without the necessity of compensating either riparian owners or licensees of water power on the river from which the waters were diverted. So, in Susquehanna Canal Co. v. Wright, 9 Watts & S. 9, 42 Am. Dec. 312, it was held that the state may authorize the construction of a canal for navigation purposes, and the 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) diversion of the waters of a navigable river, without compensation for injuries to the right of a riparian owner to whom the state had previously granted a right to divert waters, but with the express proviso that navigation should not be obstructed, it being said that the right granted the riparian owner was a mere license, revocable by the state at the peril of the licensee.

Diversion for power purposes.

Authorizing canal commissioners to take water from private streams for canal navigation by making compensation does not authorize them to take water to be leased or sold for the benefit of the state to private parties for power purposes. Cooper v. Williams, supra; Buckingham v. Smith, 10 Ohio, 288. In the latter case the court said: "The state, notwithstanding the sovereignty of her character, can take only sufficient water, from private streams, for the purposes of the canal. So far the law authorizes the commissioners to invade private right as to take what may be necessary for canal navigation, and to this extent, authority is conferred by the Constitution, provided a compensation be paid in money to the owner. The principle is founded on the superior claims of a whole community over an individual citizen; but then in those cases only where private property is wanted for public use, or demanded by the public welfare. We know of no instances in which it has or can be taken, even by state authority, for the mere purpose of raising a revenue by resale, or otherwise; and the exercise of such a power would be utterly destructive of individual right, and break down all the distinctions between meum et tuum, and annihilate them forever, at the pleasure of the state."

But in Green Bay & M. Canal Co. v. Kaukauna Water Power Co. 70 Wis. 635, 35 N. W. 529, 36 N. W. 828, affirmed in 142 U. S. 254, 35 L. ed. 1004, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 173, it was held that the state may grant the right to divert water from a navigable stream for power purposes without compensation to lower riparian owners,

People*, 214 Ill. 9, 73 N. E. 393. Messrs. Charles A. Collin, John L. Wells, William D. Gaillard, and George Coffing Warner, with Mr. Hugo Hirsch, for respondents:

The Oswego river is non-navigable in law, and the court of claims committed no error in construing the Stene patent of 1793 in accordance with the established common-law doctrine of this state for construing where the water power was created by an improvement by the state of the stream, as in such a case the surplus water power over that required for navigation was merely incidental to the improvement.

Diversion for highway purposes.

The rule that a riparian owner cannot be deprived of a portion of a stream through diversion by the state, its political subdivisions or officers, without compensation, was recognized in McCord v. High, 24 Iowa, 336, where water was diverted through an artificial channel by a road supervisor in constructing a highway crossing over a stream.

Diversion by railway.

In Bigelow v. Draper, 6 N. D. 152, 69 N. W. 570, it was held that the adoption of the constitutional provision making all flowing streams and natural water courses the property of the state for mining, irrigation, and manufacturing purposes after the territory had been settled under the principles of the common law, which vested the streams of the territory in the owners of the lands through which they flowed, did not deprive the riparian owners of the right to have the water flow in its natural bed, in view of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, which protects property against all state action that does not constitute due process of law, so as to allow a railroad company having power to take property by eminent domain proceedings to divert a stream from the lands through which it flowed without compensating the injured riparian owners. Continuing, the court said that if such constitutional provision had had the effect of taking streams which had become vested in private persons without compensation, it would have itself contravened the Federal amendment above referred to.

Diversion for drainage purposes.

In Stevens v. Worcester, 196 Mass. 45, 81 N. E. 907, it was held that a city cannot not divert the water of a stream for purposes of sewerage without compensating riparian owners injured by the diversion.

And in Re Dancy Drainage Dist. 129 Wis. 129, 108 N. W. 202, it was held that the legislature of the state cannot authorize a drainage district to destroy even a navigable river without compensation, where the title to the bed of the stream is in the state in trust. This was upon the ground that the state cannot abdicate a trust.

So, it is held that a public corporation organized to provide a drainage system cannot contest its liability to compensate for injuries done to riparian owners by diverting water from a navigable stream to supply its ditch, upon the ground that incidentally it has created a navigable channel, and that the public is not liable for injuries to riparian owners in consequence of the improvement of navigation. Beidler v. Sanitary Dist. 211 Ill. 628, 67 L.R.A. 820, 71 N. E. 1118.

Where a diversion by the state or a corporation to which it has delegated its powers is with the consent and to the advantage of the riparian owners affected, the appropriation of waters does not amount to an exercise of the power of eminent domain. Murphy v. Wilmington, 6 Houst. (Del.) 108, 22 Am. St. Rep. 345, holding that the diversion of the water for sanitary purposes of a small, nonbeneficial water course, by a city through which it flowed, where made with the consent of the affected riparian proprietors, and for their benefit, was not an exercise of the power of eminent domain.

Diversion for irrigation purposes.

Rules similar to those applied in the foregoing cases seem applicable to diversions for purposes of irrigation, which is conceded to be a public purpose. Thus, it is held that an act authorizing an irrigation company to appropriate the waters of natural streams in arid districts for the purpose of irrigation, domestic use, and other beneficial purposes, to the exclusion of other riparian owners, for any but domestic use, without providing compensation, deeds of lands bordering on streams non-navigable in law.

A deed by a private person of lands bordering on an interior fresh water nontidal stream, forming no part of the state boundary, and non-navigable in law, is presumed to convey the fee of the land to the center of the stream.

violates the constitutional provision against taking property without compensation. Barrett v. Metcalfe, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 247, 33 S. W. 758. But such an act, if limited to apply only to streams upon the public lands of the state, would seem to be valid. Mud Creek Irrig. Agri. & Mfg. Co. v. Vivian, 74 Tex. 170, 11 S. W. 1078.

And the same conclusion was reached in Crawford Co. v. Hathaway (Crawford v. Hall) 67 Neb. 325, 60 L.R.A. 889, 100 Am. St. Rep. 647, 93 N. W. 781, wherein it was held that the legislature cannot abolish vested riparian rights by authorizing the appropriation of public waters for irrigation except as such rights are taken or impaired in an exercise of the power of eminent domain, in which case compensation must be made, although irrigation is essential to successful agriculture in arid portions of the state.

So, it is held that a charter authorizing a canal company to "acquire" water privileges for purposes of irrigation in arid districts confers no right to use the water of non-navigable streams, to the injury of riparian owners, without making compensation. Mud Creek Irrig. Agri. & Mfg. Co. v. Vivian, supra.

Diversion for water-supply purposes—in general.

There is some conflict among the authorities as to whether or not nontidal waters may be diverted for the purpose of furnishing a municipality and its inhabitants with water for domestic use without compensating injured riparian owners, but the great weight of authority denies such a right even where the municipality is located on the banks of the stream.

The following cases adhere to the general rule that the waters of a stream cannot be diverted for municipal purposes to the injury of a riparian proprietor without compensating him for the resulting damage: Pine v. New York, 103 Fed. 337, affirmed 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Van Winkle v. Van Winkle, 184 N. Y. 193, 77 N. E. 33; Mott v. Mott, 68 N. Y. 246; Wilcox v. Bread, 92 Hun, 9, 37 N. Y. Supp. 867.

The state has appropriated claimants' rights to the use of the water, and must compensate them therefor. 2 Farnham, Waters, 1565.

Rep. 284, 22 Eng. Rul. Cas. 226. And in Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393, referred to in FULTON LIGHT, HEAT, & P. Co. v. STATE, the court, adhering to the rule that the title to the beds of fresh-water streams is in the owners of the adjacent lands, held that although actually navigable, such public easement fectured by this litigation, are situated at the city of Fulton, on the easterly side of the Oswego river. Under the provisions of chapter 147 of the Laws of 1903, generally known as the barge canal act, the state had appropriated certain of the land properties and riparian rights of the claimants, and this claim was filed and prosecuted in the court of claims, as provided for by the act to recover compensation therefor. The claimants recovered a judgment against the state for sums of money "for the permanent appropriation" of certain described parcels, and, as to two of them, for their right, title, and interest in the land in the bed of the river and as riparian owners. The judgment has been unanimously affirmed at the appellate division, and thus all questions of fact have been conclusively established, leaving, however, for our consideration, legal questions of some importance to the state, in the execution of the great work undertaken. They arise upon the defenses interposed by the state to the claim of the respondents.

The state disputes its liability upon the grounds, in substance, that the Oswego river is a navigable river, the ownership of the bed of which is by law in the state; that, the land affected being in the bed of the river, the claimants never acquired title to it by grant, or otherwise; and, upon the assumption that the title is in them, the work undertaken being for the improvement of navigation, that the state can use the bed and waters of the river without coming un-gives the state no right to divert the water of such a stream or its source, or to authorize their diversion for any use other than navigation, except by virtue of the right of eminent domain and upon making just compensation; and that therefore a city cannot divert waters which would naturally flow through a nontidal stream for the purpose of furnishing a municipal water supply, without compensating the riparian owners injured by the diversion.

And the fact that a municipal corporation owns land upon a stream gives it no right to divert water from the stream to the injury of other riparian owners, in sufficient quantities to supply the domestic wants of its inhabitants, where the city itself is not located upon the stream. Stein v. Burden, 24 Ala. 130, 60 Am. Dec. 453; Ulbricht v. Eufaula Water Co. 86 Ala. 587, 4 L.R.A. 572, 11 Am. St. Rep. 72, 6 So. 78; Harding v. Stamford Water Co. 41 Conn. 87; *Osborn v. Ill. App. 182, affirmed in 194 Ill. 476, 62 N. E. 929, it was said that a municipal corporation, by buying a small plot of land on the bank of a river, became a riparian owner, and could divert its proportionate share of the waters. This expression of opinion, however, was obiter, as the decision really turned upon the fact that the party contesting the city's alleged right to divert the water was not an interested riparian proprietor.

And a city cannot absorb a stream for municipal purposes even when located on its banks. New Whatcom v. Fairhaven Land Co. 24 Wash. 493, 54 L.R.A. 190, 64 Pac. 735. And in Salem Flouring Mills v. Lord, 42 Or. 82, 69 Pac. 1033, 70 Pac. 832, it was held that the riparian right of a city owning land on a stream does not extend so far as to authorize it to divert from the stream a sufficient amount of water to accommodate and meet the necessities of irrigation, cooking, laundry, sanitation, etc., for a state farm, penitentiary, and asylum where from 1,300 to 1,500 persons are confined, the latter institution being located about a third of a mile from the stream. In connection with the latter case see Filbert v. Dechert, infra.

But in a few instances a different conclusion has been reached where the municipality itself was located upon the banks of the stream. Thus, under the Mexican and Spanish laws, Mexican pueblos were entitled to so much of the water flowing through the pueblos as was necessary for municipal and domestic purposes of the pueblo, and this right was superior to the rights of the riparian proprietors. Vernon Irrig. Co. v. Los Angeles, 106 Cal. 237, 39 Pac. 762. And it is held that this superior right of the pueblos vests in the cities which became the successors of such pueblos. Ibid. And in Canton v. Shock, 66 Ohio St. 19, 58 L.R.A. 637, 90 Am. St. Rep. 557, 63 N. E. 600, it was held that a city situated on a stream may supply water to its inhabitants for domestic use without compensating a lower proprietor, who has been using the water of the stream for power purposes. (But it would seem that even der any liability to make compensation to those persons whose properties may be taken or interfered with.

The Oswego river is a fresh-water stream, of some 25 miles in length, flowing in a northerly direction, through the city of Fulton, into Lake Ontario. At the part where the claimants' properties are situated, the river is not navigable for some distance to the north and the south; but, above and below, it has been used for purposes of navigation and commerce. Its navigability is not, in any wise, affected by any of the claimants' structures. In 1793 the state granted to Conrad Stene, by letters patent, a tract, containing 200 acres of land, which, it is claimed, comprehends within the description of the grant the premises to which the claimants assert title and rights. By mesne conveyances, what title Stene had to them has passed to these claimants, and, although their properties are on the east side, and within the margin, of the river, they have not, since 1793, constituted any part of the bed of the natural channel. Prior to 1819, the then owners of the premises, Hubbard and Falley, had, at a short distance southerly from the present power plant, constructed a wing dam, extending into the river, and a sawmill, which was operated thereafter by water supplied from the dam through a flume upon their lands. In 1827, pursuant to the authority of acts of the legislature, the canal commissioners of the state, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river by the

in Ohio this rule does not apply where the municipality is not located on the stream, but merely owns a tract of land thereon. See Warder v. Springfield, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 855.) And in Barre Water Co. v. Carnes, 65 Vt. 626, 21 L.R.A. 769, 36 Am. St. Rep. 891, 27 Atl. 609, it was said: "Dwellers in towns and villages watered by a stream may use the water for domestic purposes to the same extent that a riparian owner can, provided they can reach the stream by a public highway, or secure a right of way over the lands of others. It is immaterial how the dwellers on the stream take the water for the purposes for which they may lawfully use it. They can drive their cattle to the stream, and allow them to quench their thirst, and can carry water in pails to their homes; or each individual can carry the water in a pipe to his dwelling for such use, provided he can secure a right of way for that purpose; or the dwellers on the stream may combine their funds to procure cheaper and better transportation by means of a pipe, and may use the water for their several necessities to the same extent that they could if it flowed past their dwellings in a natural channel." (But see Leonard v. Rutland, 66 Vt. 105, 28 Atl. 885.) And in Filbert v. Dechert, 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 362, it was held that the officers of a state insane asylum located on riparian lands as agents of the state, may take from the stream all the water necessary for the natural wants of the inmates, numbering some 900, although the taking resulted in a loss to lower riparian owners; but that the state could not take water to operate a fountain or for the manufacture of ice to be sold off the premises. In Feliz v. Los Angeles, 58 Cal. 73, it was held that a city through which a stream runs may, as against riparian proprietors, divert the waters of the stream for the municipal and domestic purposes of its inhabitants, even though such use required all the waters of the stream. This decision seems to be based upon the theory of prior appropriation; but in a later California case (Vernon Irrig. Co. v. Los Angeles, supra) it was established that the city had such a right of diversion as a successor to the rights of the Mexican pueblo, Reyna de Los Angeles.

But the preferential right of the Mexican pueblos to the waters in a stream could be asserted only to the amount needed to supply the wants of the inhabitants; and a city, as the successor of a pueblo, cannot sell water for use on extra-municipal non-riparian lands, to the injury of the riparian proprietors. Vernon Irrig. Co. v. Los Angeles, supra. See also Feliz v. Los Angeles, supra. And a municipality having a right to take all the waters of a stream upon which it is located that its inhabitants require for domestic use has no right materially to diminish the flow of the waters in the stream by supplying water to parties outside of such city, or by supplying to manufacturers for power purposes more than a reasonable share of the water, considering all the circumstances. Canton v. Shock, supra. And in Haupt's Appeal, 125 Pa. 211, 3 L.R.A. 536, 17 Atl. 436, it was held that a municipality, under an act authorizing it to provide a supply of water for its inhabitants, and clothing it with the right of eminent domain, has no power to carry any part of a water supply provided for the use of its inhabitants outside the burrough, for the inhabitants of another municipality. Nor can a water company incorporated for the purpose of supplying a particular municipality with water apply the water to the use of another municipality, or industries remote from such particular municipality, as against riparian owners or another burrough which has acquired the right to use the water. Ibid.

Where the waters are diverted from a navigable or public stream, and by navigable or public stream is here meant all streams that are actually navigable, it seems that municipalities may take a water supply without compensating riparian owners. Thus, in Minneapolis Mill Co. v. Water Comrs. 56 Minn. 485, 58 N. W. 33, affirmed in 168 U. S. 349, 42 L. ed. 497, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 157, on the ground that the Minnesota law governed the case, it was said that the rights of riparian owners on navigable or public streams of water are construction of the Oswego canal, had erected a dam across the river. This canal followed the river, using its actually navigable portions, and, where not navigable, passing around the dams built for its facilitation. The dam pier and the portion of the dam wall between the pier and the center of the river took the place of the former wing dam, and were, in part, upon the power-plant property. They remained as constructed until 1857, when, the pier and easterly end of the dam having been carried away by a flood, the entire dam and dam pier were rebuilt of stone by the state, in substantially the same location. As originally constructed by the commissioners, and as reconstructed, down to the time of the present appropriation by the state, the state dam had one or more openings in the dam pier along the southerly side of the sawmill, for the purpose of supplying water power to it and to the various plants which have been put up on its site and elsewhere upon the property. The southerly walls of the sawmill and of the buildings which have replaced it rested upon the northerly portion of the original, and of the reconstructed, dam piers. Around the easterly end of this dam, which reached from bank to bank of the Oswego river, the Oswego canal was built, and thereafter so much of the river water was diverted into it as was needed for its operation; but no water power was cut off, nor otherwise affected. No payment appears ever to have been claimed, or offered, for any damages to the power-plant property. It is to be presumed, subordinate to public uses of such water, that the public have the right to apply the waters of a navigable stream to public uses without making compensation to riparian owners, that the navigation of the stream is not the only public use to which these waters may be applied, that the right to draw from them a supply of water for the ordinary use of cities in their vicinity is such a public use, and that in thus taking water from navigable streams or lakes for ordinary public uses, the state is not controlled by the rules which obtain between riparian owners as to the diversion from and the return of water to its natural channel. And in Crill v. Rome, 47 How. Pr. 398, which dealt with the Mohawk river, the territory about which was settled by the Dutch, it was held that a city, under authority from the legislature, could take water from that river without compensating injured riparian owners, it being said that where the river is navigable the people of the state are proprietors of the waters therein, and, having title, may divert the same for public uses other than navigation. And in Taggart v. Jaffrey, 75 N. H. 473, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1050, 76 Atl. 123, it was said that if the state owned the bed of a pond and the stream running therefrom, it could divert the entire pond from the outlet without infringing on the private rights of the owners of lands on the outlet; but that the public could not, after granting the bed of the outlet to private owners, use the water in the pond to the injury of such grantees without making compensation to them, although it retained title to the pond itself.

—right as affected by constitutional and statutory provisions.

For a general treatment of the question of the effect of constitutional provisions asserting title to navigable water upon vested riparian rights, see note to Madison v. Spokane Valley Land & Water Co. 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 257.

Rights acquired to the use of the waters of a stream for irrigation cannot be taken 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

by a city for domestic use without compensation under constitutional provisions declaring that the waters of natural streams not heretofore appropriated are the property of the public, subject to be appropriated, and that those using the waters for domestic purposes shall have preference over those claiming for any other purpose, where the irrigation rights were acquired prior to the adoption of such constitutional provisions, especially where no contrary intent is clearly shown by the terms used. Strickler v. Colorado Springs, 16 Colo. 61, 25 Am. St. Rep. 245, 26 Pac. 313. And the same is true where the rights to use the water for a beneficial purpose were acquired subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution, but prior to the attempt of the city to appropriate the waters for the domestic use of its inhabitants. Sterling v. Pawnee Ditch Extension Co. 42 Colo. 421, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 238, 94 Pac. 339; Montpelier Mill Co. v. Montpelier, 19 Idaho, 212, 113 Pac. 741. And under such constitutional provisions the right of a city to divert water for the use of its inhabitants is not superior to the right of an individual or a farming community to divert water for domestic or other beneficial purposes, in the sense that the city can destroy rights previously acquired without compensating the senior appropriator. Sterling v. Pawnee Ditch Extension Co. supra. And any legislative attempt, in authorizing the appropriation of water for municipal uses, to limit the right to compensation to those only whose rights in the water vested prior to the passage of the statute, impairs constitutional property rights which vest after such passage, but prior to the attempt of a municipal corporation to appropriate the waters of a stream. Idem. And a statute authorizing a corporation to take water from a river, and providing that no party shall be entitled to any damages because of the diversion, is unconstitutional and void, where there are riparian proprietors who have vested rights. Harding v. Stamford Water Co. 41 Conn. 87. And a mere legislative authority to divert the waters of a stream for domestic use by the inhabitants and the facts warrant the presumption, that the owners regarded themselves as not, appreciably, injured by what was done at the time, as, also, by reason of the provision made for their case by the legislature in an act passed in 1823 (Laws 1823, chap. 112). It was enacted "for the relief of the owners of hydraulic privileges, where dams are erected by canal commissioners," and, while providing that such owners shall be entitled to the use of so much of the surplus water as may be necessary for their mills, upon their constructing a raceway and gate in the dam, further provided, that nothing therein contained should be so construed as to deprive them "of any right or rights which they may have owned and possessed prior to, and independent of, any license or grant made by this act, unless compensation shall be made therefor," etc. The owners of the mill plant, in 1827, executed a bond to the state, as required by the act where millowners avail themselves of the right to construct a raceway and a gate, conditioned to keep them in constant repair; but, of course, that could not affect any rights which they may have possessed. They were expressly saved by the act. As already observed, no claim was ever made against the state for any of the acts of the canal commissioners in constructing the Oswego canal, and matters remained as they were in the time of Hubbard and Falley's ownership; excepting that changes were made to the old flume and a new hydraulic canal was built. The claimants hold the parcels of property and the riparian rights, affected by the appropriation of the state under the provisions of the barge canal act, with the same right, title, and interest as did Hubbard and Falley, who first commenced to subdivide the tract of 200 acres by various grants. The state had not, heretofore, sought to acquire any further rights or properties than were involved in the construction of the Oswego canal, in 1827, on the easterly margin of the river, and in the diversion thereto of so much of the river waters as was necessary. The claimants and their predecessors in interest appear to have utilized and enjoyed, without claim or interference on the part of the state, such properties and rights as had become vested in Conrad Stene and his grantees. The riparian rights of the claimants attached to the three parcels involved here, and consisted in the right to use the river waters; the most beneficial right, naturally, being the use at the power-plant structure of the opening in the dam. It is found that ever since 1827, until the present appropriation by the state, the claimants and their predecessors in title have been "in the actual, undisputed, and open possession, claim-of a city does not authorize it to do so to the injury of the riparian owners, unless compensation be made. Hough v. Doylestown, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 333 (the court said that there was no distinction between an individual and a municipal corporation acting under legislative authority); Roberts v. Gwyrfai Dist. Council [1899] 2 Ch. 608, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 757, 64 J. P. 52, 48 Week. Rep. 51, 81 L. T. N. S. 465, 16 Times L. R. 2, 25 Eng. Rul. Cas. 401, affirming [1899] 1 Ch. 583, 68 L. J. Ch. N. S. 233, 63 J. B. 181, 47 Week. Rep. 376, 80 L. T. N. S. 107, 15 Times L. R. 165. And any attempt by the legislature so to authorize a municipal corporation to divert the waters of a stream for the domestic use of its inhabitants without compensation violates the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation. Hough v. Doylestown, supra. So, a mere legislative grant of an exclusive right to conduct to and furnish a city with water for domestic purposes confers no right upon the grantee to divert the waters of a running stream to the injury of riparian proprietors, although for such a public use, without making compensation therefor, especially where there is nothing in the statute from which the intention of the legislature to give the use of the water can legitimately be inferred. Stein v. Burden, 24 Ala. 130, 60 Am. Dec. 453; Stein v. Ashby, 24 Ala. 521; Burden v. Stein, 27 Ala. 104, 62 Am. Dec. 758. And the fact 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a corporation is chartered for the purpose of supplying, and is under contract to supply, a municipality and its inhabitants with water, does not give the corporation any right to use or appropriate the waters of a natural stream without compensating riparian owners. Tampa Waterworks Co. v. Cline, 37 Fla. 586, 33 L.R.A. 376, 53 Am. St. Rep. 262, 20 So. 780. And the following cases are to the effect that a private company which was incorporated for the purpose of furnishing a municipality with water cannot divert water as against a riparian owner, to supply the inhabitants of such a municipality with water for domestic use: Saunders v. Bluefield Waterworks & Improv. Co. 58 Fed. 133, reversed for want of jurisdiction in 11 C. C. A. 232, 25 U. S. App. 70, 63 Fed. 333; Standard Plate Glass Co. v. Butler Water Co. 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 563; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Pottsville Water Co. 182 Pa. 418, 38 Atl. 404. ing under and by virtue of written instruments, title, ownership, and rights of possession," of the properties in question, and have drawn from the river, through the openings in the dam pier, so much of the water as has been needed for their purposes. The possession and occupation for upwards of sixty years, prior to the filing and service of the appropriation maps, are found to have been "adverse to any claim by the state to any part thereof, except as to the construction and maintenance of the said state dam and the use of the waters of the Oswego river by the state."

In this situation, in 1906, the state engineer took the requisite action under the provisions of the barge canal act, to appropriate the lands, structures, and waters of the claimants, in question. By the terms of that act it was, among other things, provided that that official should be authorized to "enter upon, take possession of, and use lands, structures, and waters, the appropriation of which for the use of the improved canals, and for the purposes of the work and improvement authorized by this act, shall in his judgment be necessary." (Laws 1906, chap. 365, § 4.) The state engineer was to make and file maps of the lands to be appropriated, and the superintendent of public works was to serve upon the owner of any real property, so appropriated, notices of the filing and date of filing of such maps, which should specifically describe the portions appropriated. The act provides that, from the time of the service of such notice, the entry upon, and the appropriation by the state of, the real property therein described, should be deemed complete; that such notices should be conclusive evidence of such entry and appropriation, and of the quantities and boundaries of lands appropriated; and that the court of claims should have jurisdiction to determine the amount of compensation for lands, structures, and waters so appropriated, or damages caused by the work of improvement. The state engineer made, and duly filed, maps, specifically describing the three parcels involved here and the water rights of two of them, and the superintendent of public works duly served upon the claimants the notices, as required by the act; which also took, with respect to the two parcels, all the claimants' "right, title, and interest as riparian owners."

There is no serious dispute with respect to what the state has appropriated of the claimants' lands and water rights, and the question is whether, upon the facts, the claimants were invested with that lawful ownership of these lands and waters, within the banks of the Oswego river, which would support their judgment for compensation.

It must, finally, be noted as a material fact, that the proposed barge canal, where it crosses the claimants' property, is wholly outside the channel of the Oswego river, as it existed at the time of the service of the notices of appropriation, and as it was at the time of the grant by the state to Stene, in 1793.

This, perhaps somewhat extended, review of the facts, is in order to make intelligible the situation of the parties. Whether the ownership of the bed of the Oswego river was, or was not, in law, in the state, and whether, or not, its grant to Stene conveyed to him the land in the bed to the center of the stream, the claimants stand in the shoes of the owners of the tract of 200 acres, as they were in 1819, under the title derived from Stene; except so far as the state has exercised its paramount, or sovereign, right to improve the navigation of the river by the construction of the old Oswego canal and of the dam and other works incidental thereto. So far as it appears, the state had at no time sought to appropriate, in invitum, any rights to the claimants' predecessors in title, whatever they were; but, rather, had, from the time of the enactment of statutes bearing upon the construction of the Oswego canal to the enactment of the present barge canal act, reserved, if it had not recognized, those rights. It may be added that the situation presents facts and circumstances which would support the claimants' record title and rights by adverse possession and by prescription.

It is argued in behalf of the state that the Oswego river is a public navigable river, and that, under the rule of the common law, it was vested with the ownership of its bed. The fact is that this river is not navigable for any purpose at the city of Fulton, for some distance north and south; although in other portions it is used for navigation and commerce. But, were it altogether navigable in its course, the question of its ownership would be settled by the common-law rule relating to the title to beds of nontidal, or fresh-water, streams. In law, the term "navigable river" has received a technical application to rivers, or arms of the sea, in which the tide ebbs and flows. The common law of England regarded all fresh-water rivers as non-navigable. Under its rule the title to the soil of the sea, or of the arms of the sea, or of tidal rivers, was in the Crown, subject to an easement in favor of the public for passage or transportation; while fresh-water rivers belonged to the owners of their banks, also subject to the use of the public as navigable highways. This public right was not affected by the situation of the title, whether in the Crown, or in the riparian owner. Whether salt, or fresh, water streams, if they were large enough to be capable of common passage, and thus, in fact, were navigable, they were regarded as common highways, which might not be impeded. See Lord Hale's Tract De Jure Maris; Ex parte Jennings, 6 Cow. 518, 16 Am. Dec. 447; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 454, 91 Am. Dec. 58. The common law of England fixed, as an unalterable rule, the title to the bed of tidal streams in the sovereign, and to the bed of fresh-water streams in the owners of the adjacent banks, the owner of each side taking to the center, or usque ad filum aquæ, but made no distinction against the public right of passage & transportation. The navigability, in fact, of the stream, had no relevancy to the question of the title to its bed; it was relevant solely to the public right to pass, or to transport, upon it, as upon a highway. A stream, to be exclusively owned by the riparian owner, must be too small to be navigable in fact. In adopting the common law of England, the people of this state took over such of its rules as were applicable to, and consistent with, their condition and circumstances. It became, and is, the law of the state and the basis of its jurisprudence, except so far as its principles and rules of action have been modified by Constitution, statutes, or usages, or were inapplicable to our situation. Its rules upon the subject of the rights of riparian owners, necessarily, applied but imperfectly to the situation of our country, with its many large navigable bodies of water in bays, rivers, and great inland lakes. We have but to contrast the situation of Great Britain, an island, with short rivers, navigable, ordinarily, only so far as the tide ebbed and flowed, to perceive the extent to which modifications of those rules became essential. In our state, there were to be considered, in applying the common-law rule, the extent to which our fresh-water rivers and lakes formed territorial boundaries, and the nature of the title acquired under the laws of the state, to whose dominion England had succeeded. In the former case, the rule was clearly inapplicable, and, in the other cases, as I understand the result of the decisions, two of our rivers formed exceptions to the general rule. The part of the Hudson river above the ebb and flow of the tide, and the Mohawk river, a fresh-water stream, in grants made to settlers under the Dutch government, were excepted, and, upon the English succession, the beds of those waters, never having been conveyed, vested in the Crown, as lands not theretofore granted. As to those rivers, the people of this state have ever asserted title, as to unappropriated lands. See Canal Appraisers v. People, 17 Wend. 571; Canal Fund Comra. v. Kempshall, 26 Wend. 404; Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393. The case of People v. Tibbetts, 19 N. Y. 523, involved the rights of riparian owners on the Hudson river, and cannot be regarded as supporting the appellant's position. Smith v. Rochester, supra. Chancellor Walworth, in Child v. Starr, 4 Hill at page 372, speaks of the case of Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall, supra, as removing any doubt upon the question of whether the common-law rule prevailed here in the construction of conveyances of lands bounded by, or upon, a fresh-water, or nontidal, stream. In Smith v. Rochester, supra, it was distinctly so held. In Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 83 N. Y. 178, 38 Am. Rep. 407, which involved the riparian rights of owners upon the Chenango river, a fresh-water stream, it was held that, though navigable as a highway, it was a private river; that they owned the bed and banks, subject to the public easement of navigation; and that the legislature, except under the power of eminent domain, upon making compensation, could not interfere further than for the purpose of regulating, preserving, and protecting the public easement.

I know of no exceptions in this state to the common-law rule of riparian ownership of the beds of fresh-water streams, where not constituting boundary lines, other than the two rivers referred to. If not affected by situation, or by derived title, there is no good reason why the common-law rule should not obtain with respect to our fresh-water rivers. To meet differing political institutions and usages, it has been somewhat enlarged or extended, with respect to the riparian owner's right of access and of use on tide waters. Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 133 N. Y. 79, 15 L.R.A. 618, 28 Am. St. Rep. 600, 30 N. E. 654; Brookhaven v. Smith, 188 N. Y. 74, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 326, 80 N. E. 665, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1. The Oswego river, however it is to be regarded as a highway for navigation and commerce, is not taken out of the common-law rule by any fact or feature; and two decisions by the courts of this state have determined its character of non-navigability in law, at an early day. I do not think that their authority has been shaken by the principle of any subsequent decision of this court upon the applicability of the common-law doctrine of riparian rights. The first of the cases I allude to is that of Varick v. Smith, 5 Paige, 137, 28 Am. Dec. 417; Id., 9 Paige, 547. Varick and Smith were owners of lands and mills on opposite sides of the Oswego river, a short distance below one of the dams built in connection with the old Oswego canal. The state had leased to Smith, in 1827, the waters of the river not needed for the canal, and he claimed the right thereunder to divert the waters to his mill on the east side of the river, to such extent as to prevent them from supplying Varick's mill on the west side. Varick, claiming under state patents, to own in fee to the center of the Oswego river, with the riparian right to have one half of the surplus water, not needed for the canal, flow upon his lands, brought suit against Smith and the attorney general to have the lease annulled and an injunction restraining the diversion of the water involved. Varick succeeded in establishing his claim and his rights predicated thereon. In the various opinions rendered in the course of the litigation by the vice chancellor and by Chancellor Walworth, in affirmance, it was held, at all times, that the Oswego river was subject to the common-law right of riparian ownership to the center, which was subordinate, only to the servitude of the public, for the purposes of navigation and commerce, and to the governmental right of eminent domain. Its navigability in fact did not affect its non-navigability in law, as a fresh-water stream, and the common-law character of its riparian ownership was consequently unaffected. Vice Chancellor Gridley, in determining the issues upon the trial, refers to Lord Hale's statement that fresh rivers belong to the owner of the soil adjacent, and to his definition of navigable, or public, rivers, in the absolute sense of the term, as being only such, which are arms of the sea, where the sea flows and reflows, and holds that this doctrine of the common law is controlling; that it "is still the law of the land." Van Buren v. Baker, 12 N. Y. S. R. 209, is the second of the early Oswego river cases and involved a claim of the plaintiff to the title to an island in the river, under a conveyance from the state of a tract of land on the easterly side of the river. In sustaining a judgment in the plaintiff's favor, the general term (in 1887) followed the authority of Varick v. Smith, supra.

Upon the question thus far discussed, I conclude that the common-law rule governs with respect to the character of the Oswego river, and being, within its definition, non-navigable in law, the state would not hold title to its bed by virtue of its sovereignty, and could exercise no other right therein, save that of eminent domain, within constitutional limitations; except as such right might relate to the improvement of the channel and bed of the river for the purposes of navigation and commerce, as one for the advantage of the public easement. We are not called upon to give, or to search for, a reason for a rule which, by long standing, has acquired the stability of a rule of property; it is sufficient that a rule exists, by which the property rights of persons have been deemed to be measured and fixed. If there was any reason for the abandonment of this rule of the common law, the courts of the land, presumably, would have acted upon it; but it has remained, with only such modifications as to accord with the requirements of a new geographical situation and with differing political conditions.

It is objected in behalf of the state, the premises affected being in the bed of the Oswego river, that the grant by letters patent to Stene did not convey to him any part of the bed. As the people of this state became the owners of the unsettled lands upon the river, in right of the succession of the state to their dominion, they were capable of being granted by the legislature under letters patent. Those by which Stene took, in 1793, granted a tract of 200 acres "on the east side of the river below the Falls," by a description, which ran from "a white ash sapling . . . standing on the east shore of the Oswego river" by courses to the east, to the north, and to the west "to the said river, and then up and along the same to the place of beginning." This grant should be construed as to its descriptive language, as would be any ordinary grant of property. Being presumed to have been made for a sufficient consideration, there is no reason for construing it with any extraordinary strictness as against the grantee. It is not like a legislative grant of some exclusive franchise, or privileges, where the rule of a favorable construction to the state will be rigidly applied. As a boundary of the grant is on a fresh-water river, the location of the monument for the starting point in the sapling is not a delimitation of the westerly boundary line. As the monument could not conveniently, or properly, be placed in the channel of the river, in placing it on the bank it merely fixed a point in the south line; to which line the course from the northerly boundary returned along the river. Such a monument indicates the place of the line, or of its intersection with the stream, and not the end of it. Luce v. Carley, 24 Wend. 451, 35 Am. Dec. 637; Van Winkle v. Van Winkle, 184 N. Y. 193, 204, 77 N. E. 33. It is an old and well-settled rule, where the grant has no other boundary on the river side but the stream itself, that the legal presumption is that it was intended to convey to the middle of such stream. A boundary line, which is described as "along the shore," or "along the bank," of a fresh-water stream, would not extend the grant to the center; for there would be a prescribed limitation of the line to the shore, or bank. But where, as here, the line, when it reaches the river, is then described as running "along the same," it will be construed as following the thread of the stream. A boundary by, or along, a water course, is effectual to take the grant, by legal construction, to its center, and running the line to a monument standing on the shore does not restrict the grant; for it is only referred to as giving the directions of the lines, and not as restricting the boundary. Child v. Starr, 4 Hill, 369, 375; Luce v. Carley, 24 Wend. 451, 35 Am. Dec. 637; Seneca Nation v. Knight, 23 N. Y. 498; Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 44 Am. Rep. 393; Gouverneur v. National Ice Co. 134 N. Y. 355, 18 L.R.A. 695, 30 Am. St. Rep. 669, 31 N. E. 865. I conclude, therefore, upon the question of the effect of the state's conveyance to Stene by its letters patent, that it granted to him a tract of land bounded westerly by the center of the Oswego river.

It is further objected on behalf of the state that if the Oswego river is not in law a public navigable river, within the common-law, the state is, nevertheless "entitled to make use of its bed and waters for the improvement of navigation without compensation." The argument is that the proposed construction of the barge canal is such an improvement, and falls within the rule, which authorizes the state authorities, in such cases, to control and regulate the river. The right of the state to make improvements in the river for the benefit of the public, in facilitating navigation and transportation thereon, must be fully conceded. It may do so without regard to the private ownership of the bed of the river. The proprietary interest of the riparian owner is subordinate to the public easement of passage, and the state may be regarded as the trustee of a special public servitude; as it was termed in Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall, 26 Wend. 404. In the exercise of its authority, in that respect, the legislature may direct the performance of acts by state officers, which tend to promote the public right of passage and transportation, without subjecting the state to liability. When, however, it is not the channel, or bed, of the river, which is to be regulated, and land is taken, and the river waters are diverted for the purpose of constructing and operating some other channel distinct from that of the river, then the limit of the state's authority freely to intrude upon the riparian owner's rights has been reached. Ibid.; Smith v. Rochester, 92 N. Y. 463, 484, 44 Am. Rep. 393. In Kempshall's Case, his millrace on the Genesee river was obstructed for the purpose of constructing a state aqueduct for canal purposes, and to his claim for damages (as riparian owner 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to the center of the river) the state opposed his absolute right to divert the river water for such purposes. The state was held to be liable for damages in diverting the water from the mill. The chancellor observed that "the only restriction upon his [Kempshall's] right to use the bed of the river absolutely as his own was the right of the public to navigate the stream." Page 413. It was said, in the same case, by Senator Verplanck: "I cannot assent to the position that the conceded common-law authority of the state over such rivers, for the purposes of navigation, comprehends the right to divert the waters to other purposes of artificial navigation, wholly distinct from that of the river itself." Page 421. This language was quoted in the opinion of this court in Smith v. Rochester, supra, as was, also, the further remark of the Senator that "by its [the state's] sovereign right of eminent domain, it undoubtedly may do so, . . . but all these exercises of sovereign authority are, alike, 'the taking of private property for public use,' which the Constitution pronounces may not be done, 'without just compensation.'" Page 422.

It is found, in this case, that "the proposed barge canal, where it crosses the property of the claimants, is wholly outside the channel of the Oswego river, as it existed . . . in 1906 and as it was at the time of the grant by the state in 1793." It is also found that the lands occupied by the claimants' properties "have not, since 1793, constituted a part of the natural channel, or bed, of the Oswego river." When, in 1906, under the provisions of the barge canal act of 1903, the state authorities made the appropriations described in the notices, the claimants were deprived of the use of the water through the opening of the dam pier, over and around which the power-plant structure had been built, and there were taken from them distinct parcels of land and the appurtenant riparian rights. It is difficult, if at all possible, to perceive how all this could be done for this new artificial water way upon the bank of the river, without liability for damages; any more than it was possible in the case of the aqueduct for state canal purposes in Kempshall's Case, supra. The claimants had a proprietary interest in the water power of the Oswego river, which was incidental to the grant to their predecessors in title, and which entitled them to compensation for the appropriation of that interest for the public use. That a stream, adequate in size for public transportation or passage, should be subjected to a control, or a regulation, confined to such purposes, suggests no legal injury to riparian ownership. But when, under the plea of the improvement of navigation, the property of the riparian owner is taken, or diminished by the diversion of the waters, for a public work not within, but wholly outside, the channel of the river, I think there is a clear case for the enforcement of the constitutional guaranty of compensation. If the appropriation is for a purpose not incidental to the natural, or public, servitude in the river, how could that provision of the fundamental law of this government—so instinct with the principle of justice—find juster application? The state, by the exercise of its power of eminent domain, could take these claimants' lands and divert from their power-plant properties the water power which operated them, upon making just compensation therefor; but, in my opinion, it had no unlimited right to make a use of the river for a public purpose, except as such purpose was related to the improvement of the channel, or bed, of the river itself, for purposes of navigation or transportation.

Possibly, the question of title and right by adverse possession and prescription does not become important, in view of the conclusions already stated. As the point is made that the state reacquired the bed of the Oswego river "as canal lands at the time of the construction of the Oswego canal in 1826," and at that time acquired all the water power, it may be useful to discuss this question. I think that, on the facts, the record title of the claimants to the land in question, by long-continued possession and occupation, and their right, by prescription, to use the waters not actually needed for the old Oswego canal, are reinforced and made good. Such possession and right were not inconsistent with the public right of easement. It is found that such possession and occupation, by them and by their predecessors in interest, of the properties described, and the use by them of the water for supplying water power, "for upwards of sixty years prior to the filing and service of the appropriation maps, have been under claim of title founded upon written instruments, and open, notorious, and adverse to any claim of the state, or anyone else, to any part thereof, except as to the construction of the state dam and the use of the waters of the Oswego river by the state, as aforesaid (i. e., for the old Oswego canal). No cause of action for the recovery of the possession of any part . . . has accrued to the state within forty years prior to the service and filing of said appropriation maps; nor has the state, nor anyone from whom it claims, received rents and profits within said period from said three properties, or any part of either thereof." As between individuals, under such circumstances, the period of twenty years is prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure as constituting an adverse possession. Section 369. By § 362 of the Code, it is provided that the people will not sue with respect to real property, "by reason of the right or title of the people to the same, unless either: (1) The cause of action accrued within forty years before the action is commenced; or (2) the people, or those from whom they claim, have received the rents and profits of the real property, or of some part thereof, within the same period of time." No lapse of time will furnish a defense to an encroachment on a public right (Burbank v. Fay, 65 N. Y. 57, a case where the plaintiff claimed rights to the continued use of the water of a part of the Erie canal); but that a right to the enjoyment of an easement may be gained by prescription against the state was held at an early day. In the case of Canal Fund Comrs. v. Kempshall, already alluded to, ubi supra, where rights in the Genesee river were involved, it was said by Senator Verplanck (at page 421 of 26 Wend.): "The paper title made out is supported and attested by such a continued occupation of the bank and use of the water for thirty-five years, under claim of title to the whole, as would alone establish an adverse possession conclusive against any private claim. . . . The long adverse possession is alone sufficient to give an indisputable title against all private claimants, since it exceeds the twenty years' statutory limitation of private suits. But the state itself, if it were not concluded by its own grant, cannot sue for these lands under water, or their issues or profits, unless the right or title had accrued within forty years (according to the act of 1804 . . .), or unless the people have received the rents and profits within that term. As neither of these facts can be maintained here, then it follows, according to the same statute, that 'the persons holding such lands shall freely hold and enjoy the same against the said people and all persons claiming under them.'"

In another case, it was held, with respect to the right of riparian owners, as against the state, to maintain a wing dam in the Niagara river, that a claim for compensation for the value of its use might be lawful, if it had "the support of a prescriptive right to maintain it." Re State Reservation, 37 Hun, 537. And see Timpson v. New York, 5 App. Div. at page 429, 39 N. Y. Supp. 248. In Burbank v. Fay, supra, the elements necessary to constitute a prescriptive right were considered, and it was said that "the possession should have certain qualities and characteristics, such as being adverse, continuous, uninterrupted, and by the acquiescence of the owner of the estate over which the easement is claimed. An adverse possession under this rule means a claim asserted as a matter of right, and cannot grow out of a mere permissive enjoyment." At page 65 of 65 N. Y. In that case, the claim was, in effect, against the state, whose commissioners' acts, in depriving the plaintiff of certain privileges, were the subjects of complaint, and the rule was deemed applicable to the case, inasmuch as the possession did not comply with it. There was no proof how the privileges connected with the use of the Erie canal basin commenced, and therefore it was necessary to presume, as the only lawful manner was by permission of the state authorities, that it commenced in that manner.

Therefore I think that the title of these claimants is as well supported by the adverse character of the possession of the premises, as by the record title.

At some length—quite sufficient, I think, for the purpose—I have discussed the important questions presented upon this appeal. For an ampler discussion of the questions of fact and of law, a reference to the opinions of the court of claims may, most profitably, be made. Judge Rodenbeck, who spoke for that court, has treated them with great thoroughness and ability.

Upon the question of title by adverse possession, or prescription, which has been discussed, I am authorized to say that Chief Judge Cullen is of the opinion, on the authority of Burbank v. Fay, 65 N. Y. 57, Donahue v. State, 112 N. Y. 142, 2 L.R.A. 576, 19 N. E. 419, and Waterloo Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Shanahan, 128 N. Y. 345, 14 L.R.A. 481, 28 N. E. 358, that, as against the state, no title to the river could be obtained through private use or occupancy, whether adverse or by permission, however long continued, or by prescriptive right. Judge Willard Bartlett agrees with the Chief Judge in that view. Judges Werner, Chase, and Hiscock prefer to express no opinion upon that question. Upon all the other questions discussed, all of my Associates concur with the opinion, except Judge Collin, who takes no part in the decision.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

Cullen, Ch. J., and Werner, Willard Bartlett, Hiscock, and Chase, JJ., concur. Collin, J., not sitting.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

Motion for reargument denied. May 6, 1911.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Appt.,

v.

FRESNO FLUME & IRRIGATION COM-PANY, Resp.

(— Cal. —, 119 Pac. 646.)

Insurance — parol promise of agent — enforcement.

1. A parol agreement as to rates different from those named in the policy, made by an insurance agent to secure business which had been carried by a rival company, is not binding on the insurer, where the policy provides that no provision or condition of the policy shall be varied or altered by anyone unless by written consent of the president or secretary of the company.

Same — ratification of acts — suing on policy.

2. An insurance company does not, by attempting to enforce by action the payment of premiums on a policy of insurance written by an agent, ratify his unauthorized oral agreement as to rates, made to secure the business.

Same — failure to sign — effect.

3. That an applicant for insurance does not sign the policy does not absolve him from its provisions as to rates of premium and limitation of agent's authority, so as to enable him to enforce an oral agreement that the rates shall be different from those named in the policy.

Appeal — judgment for prevailing party.

4. Judgment should not be rendered for appellant upon reversal of a decision in defendant's favor in an action to recover the premiums alleged to be due on an insurance policy, if the findings as made would not support it.

(December 4, 1911.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fresno County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover premiums alleged to be due on two insurance policies executed and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chickering & Gregory, for appellant:

Under no circumstances can the terms of an agreement in writing be altered by parol

Note.—As to effect of nonwaiver agreement on conditions existing at inception of insurance policy, see note to Gish v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 826. Where the waiver relied on is the act of the agent, the burden is on the party endeavoring to establish such waiver to show either that the agent had power from the company to make the waiver, or that the company subsequently acknowledged and ratified the act of the agent, or dispensed with the observance of the conditions.

Per Curiam:

The appeal in this case was taken to the district court of appeal, which rendered a judgment of reversal. A rehearing was ordered, and, upon the second submission, two of the justices adhered to the views first announced, while the third wrote an opinion for affirmance. Upon this failure to agree the appeal was transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

Our own examination of the case has satisfied us of the correctness of the disposition first made by the court of appeal, and we adopt the following opinion of Hall, J., giving the reasons upon which that court based its judgment of reversal.

"This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant, taken within sixty days after the entry thereof. The action was brought to recover a balance of premiums unpaid upon two insurance policies executed and delivered by plaintiff to defendant and accepted by defendant, whereby plaintiff insured defendant against loss or damage resulting from liability for damages or injuries to employees of defendant during the period of one year from the date of the policies. At the time of the execution of the policies a certain sum was paid as premium, based on the amount of wages that defendant estimated that it would pay to its employees during the year. The policies are attached to and made a part of the complaint. The policies clearly and without ambiguity provide that the premium to be paid shall be a certain given per cent of the wages actually paid during the year by the defendant to its employees, and provide that, if the wages actually paid exceed the estimated wages stated in the schedule contained in the policies, the assured shall pay the additional premium earned, and, if the wages actually paid shall be less than the estimated wages stated, the insurer shall return to the assured the unearned premium pro rata. As a defense to the two causes of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint, the defendant pleaded: 'That heretofore, and on or about the 14th day of April, 1902, the plaintiff made application to the defendant to insure and indemnify it for one year from April 14, 1902, against all loss from any of the matters and things set forth in the complaint of the plaintiff herein. That the defendant thereupon informed the plaintiff that as it was then insured in another company covering all the matters and things set forth in the complaint of plaintiff, and for all such insurance paid as a premium a flat rate of $850 per annum, and the plaintiff thereupon assured the defendant that it would insure the defendant for one year upon the same terms, and it was then and there agreed upon, by and between the plaintiff and defendant, that the plaintiff would issue and deliver to the defendant, and the defendant would thereupon accept, the policies of insurance set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and that the defendant would be charged therefor and would only be required to pay a flat rate of $850 per annum in lieu and stead of the sliding scale and rate as set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and each cause of action therein, and that thereupon, and in pursuance to said agreement, and not otherwise, the policies of insurance set forth in plaintiff's complaint were so issued and delivered to the defendant, and the defendant accepted the same. That the sole inducement to the defendant, leading it to accept said policies of insurance from the plaintiff, was the statement and agreement and representation of the plaintiff that it would accept from the defendant the sum of $850 in full for all premiums due, or to become due, upon said policies of insurance, covering said policy year, and that no other sum of premium of any kind would be required or demanded or exacted of the defendant by the plaintiff. That at the time said policies of insurance set forth in plaintiff's complaint were issued and delivered to the defendant, the plaintiff then and there stated, represented, and assured the defendant that, notwithstanding the rate and terms of said policies of insurance, all the premiums that the defendant would be required to pay for said policies of insurance was the flat rate of $850; and in consideration of said assurances and statements, the defendant was induced to, and did actually, accept said policies of insurance.' The court found the facts to be in accordance with the above allegations of the answer, and gave judgment for defendant accordingly.

"The only evidence to support the above findings of fact consisted of testimony as to statements and agreements orally made by Mr. Shepherd, the local agent of plaintiff at Fresno, to and with Mr. Shaver as the president of the defendant, and oral statements and conversations between Mr. Bosworth, the general agent of the plaintiff at San Francisco, and Mr. Shepherd. This testimony as to oral negotiations and conversations, both before and at the time of the delivery of the policies, was admitted over the objections and exceptions of plaintiff, and these rulings are now relied upon as grounds for reversing the judgment.

"It is not claimed that, according to the written terms of the policies accepted by defendant, the amount sued for is not owing from defendant to plaintiff, but it is claimed by defendant that it is not bound by the terms of the written contracts.

"The theory of defendant, upon which it claims that this case is taken out of the general rule that, where the terms of a contract are reduced to writing, parol evidence is not admissible to vary or contradict the terms of the writing, is that it would be a fraud to allow one party to enforce the covenants of the writing contrary to his oral agreement by which the other party was induced to enter into the contract. In support of this contention respondent has cited a number of cases, among which are Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 644; Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, 59 Cal. 637, and Eva v. McMahon, 77 Cal. 472, 19 Pac. 872.

"But conceding that a court of equity will not permit one party to enforce a written contract contrary to his oral agreement, where to do so would work a fraud upon the other party to the contract, and that the same matter may be set up in defense of an action at law on such written contract, without seeking a reformation of the written contract (Eva v. McMahon, supra; Hopough v. Struble, 60 N. Y. 430; Walker v. Brem, 67 Cal. 600, 8 Pac. 320), it is essential that such oral agreement be made by the party to the contract or by his agent, acting with authority, actual or ostensible,

"The policies delivered to and accepted by respondent were signed by the president and secretary of plaintiff, and countersigned by its general agent, Bosworth. No evidence of the authority of Bosworth was given other than that he was the general agent of the plaintiff, and none was given as to the authority of Shepherd other than that he was the local agent of Fresno, and by the terms of his employment had no authority to change a policy in any way.

"It may be conceded that this was sufficient to clothe the agents with ostensible authority coextensive with the business intrusted to them, in the absence of any notice of a limitation thereon. But the policies accepted and retained by defendant contained the provision that 'no condition or provision of this policy shall be varied or altered by anyone unless by written consent of the president or secretary of the company.' This was a limitation upon the authority of agents of which defendant had notice. That such provisions in policies are valid has frequently been decided. The matter is discussed at great length in Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Asso. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133, and it was there held (syllabus) that 'it is competent and reasonable for insurance companies to make it matter of condition in their policies that their agents shall not be deemed to have authority to alter or contradict the express terms of the policies as executed and delivered.'

"In Clever v. Traders' Ins. Co. 65 Mich. 527, 8 Am. St. Rep. 908, 32 N. W. 660, the supreme court of Michigan said: 'When the policy of insurance, as in this case, contains an express limitation upon the power of the agent, such agent has no legal right to contract as agent of the company with the insured, so as to change the conditions of the policy, or to dispense with the performance of any essential requisite contained therein, either by parol or writing; and the holder of the policy is estopped, by accepting the policy, from setting up or relying upon powers in the agent in opposition to limitations and restrictions in the policy.' To precisely the same effect are Catoir v. American L. Ins. & T. Co. 33 N. J. L. 487; Weidert v. State Ins. Co. 19 Or. 261, 20 Am. St. Rep. 809, 24 Pac. 242.

"The same rule is followed in Massachusetts. 'A company which has seen fit to prescribe that the terms and conditions of its policies shall only be waived by its written or printed assent has prescribed only a reasonable rule to guard against the uncertainties of oral evidence, and by this the insured has assented to be bound.' Kyte v. Commercial Union Assur. Co. 144 Mass. 43, 10 N. E. 518.

"To the same effect are Quinlan v. Providence Washington Ins. Co. 133 N. Y. 356, 28 Am. St. Rep. 645, 31 N. E. 31, and Hankins v. Rockford Ins. Co. 70 Wis. 1, 35 N. W. 34.

"Limitations upon the power of agents, contained in a policy, similar to the limitations contained in the policies sued on in this case, were held reasonable and binding on the assured in Westerfeld v. New York L. Ins. Co. 129 Cal. 68, 58 Pac. 92, 61 Pac. 667.

"Defendant in the case at bar accepted the policies and retained them until the expiration of the insurance year, with full knowledge of their terms. There is no pretense that any misrepresentations were made as to their actual terms, or that any trick or device was resorted to by which defendant was prevented from reading them, and under such circumstances defendant must be presumed to have known the contents of the policies. New York L. Ins. Co. v. McMaster, 30 C. C. A. 532, 57 U. S. App. 638, 87 Fed. 63.

"Defendant thus knew that the agent had no power to alter the provisions of the policies without the written consent of the president or secretary of the insuring company. If defendant chose to rely upon the oral agreement of the agent, it did so at its peril. The oral representations and agreement thus made were not the representations or agreement of the plaintiff, and for this reason the findings to that effect are not sustained by the evidence, and the evidence of such oral agreement and representations should not have been admitted in evidence.

"We do not think the contention of respondent that plaintiff ratified the alleged oral modification of the contracts by bringing this action can be sustained. We are unable to assent to the proposition that by attempting to enforce a written contract according to its terms, plaintiff ratifies unauthorized oral modifications thereof."

Upon the second argument in the court of appeal, and in presenting the case here, the respondent has laid special stress upon the point that, because the policy was signed by the insurer alone, and not by the insured, it is conclusive with respect to its obligations alone, and not with respect to those of the party not signing. But we think there is no merit in this position. The receipt and acceptance by one party of a paper signed by the other, and purporting to embody all the terms of a contract between the two, binds the acceptor, as well as the signer, to the terms of the paper. 9 Cyc. 260, 391; Civil Code, § 1589; Watkins v. Rymill, L. R. 10 Q. B. Div. 178, 188, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 121, 48 L. T. N. S. 426, 31 Week. Rep. 337, 47 J. P. 357. Under the common-law rules of pleading, the fact that one of the parties had not executed the writing, if it were a specialty, would have required that he be sued in assumpsit, rather than in covenant; but the binding force of his obligation and the extent of his liability would not have been affected by the mere form of action. Locke v. Homer, 131 Mass. 93, 41 Am. Rep. 199.

The respondent cites a number of cases

In which, notwithstanding the existence of an agreement in writing (signed by one of the parties alone), the party not signing has been permitted to prove the real agreement by parol evidence. But none of these dealt with the situation here presented, i. e., that of a writing which was intended, when signed by one of the parties, and accepted by the other, to operate as a contract embodying all of the obligations on both sides. The authorities relied upon all fall within recognized exceptions to the parol-evidence rule. Some of them deal with writings which were prepared for execution by both parties, but were signed by only one. The opinion in Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 543, 26 Pac. 515, while generally favorable to the contentions of the appellant, contains some references bearing upon this point. See also Thomas v. Barnes, 156 Mass. 581, 31 N. E. 683. Other citations are to cases laying down the well-settled rule that recitals of consideration are not conclusive. Byers v. Locke, 93 Cal. 493, 27 Am. St. Rep. 212, 29 Pac. 119. This rule is not applicable here, where the clause relied upon is not a mere recital, but is a positive undertaking to pay premiums according to a specified mode of computation. The remaining authorities of respondent, so far as they have any bearing on the point under discussion, have to do with writings which were not intended to embody the entire agreement of the parties, but were either memoranda in the nature of receipts, or were silent with respect to some of the terms upon which the parties had agreed. Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 28 L. ed. 527, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566; Bank of Australasia v. Palmer [1897] A. C. 540, 66 L. J. P. C. N. S. 105; Routledge v. Worthington Co. 119 N. Y. 592, 23 N. E. 1111; Rapp v. Giddings, 4 S. D. 492, 57 N. W. 237; Ames v. Southern P. Co. 141 Cal. 728, 99 Am. St. Rep. 98, 75 Pac. 310.

On the other hand, the contention of appellant that a policy of insurance, when accepted by the insured, is conclusive evidence of the engagements of the parties with respect to the obligations declared in it, and may not be contradicted by evidence of previous verbal arrangements, is abundantly sustained. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mowry, 96 U. S. 544, 24 L. ed. 674; Thompson v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 104 U. S. 252, 26 L. ed. 765; Northern Assur. Co. v. Grand View Bldg. Assn. 183 U. S. 308, 46 L. ed. 213, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 133; Liverpool L. & G. Ins. Co. v. T. M. Richardson Lumber Co. 11 Okla. 579, 69 Pac. 936; Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 4 Kan. App. 16, 45 Pac. 789; Franklin F. Ins. Co. v. Martin, 40 N. J. L. 568, 29 Am. Rep. 271; Moore v. State Ins. Co. 72 Iowa, 414, 34 N. W. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

183; United States Casualty Co. v. Charleston, S. C. Min. & Mfg. Co. (C. C.) 183 Fed. 238. The reasoning of these cases lends no support to the respondent's supposed distinction between the obligations of the party signing and those of the party not signing the policy. Indeed, the case last cited is, in this respect, precisely like the one before us.

We cannot, however, give assent to appellant's claim that judgment in its favor should be ordered. The findings, as they stand, would not support such a judgment. Under such circumstances, it has been the usual practice of this court, where a reversal was found necessary, to send the case back for a new trial. There may be exceptional instances justifying a different procedure (see Finnell v. Jas. H. Goodman & Co. Bank, 156 Cal. 18, 26, 103 Pac. 483); but we see no reason, in the present appeal, for departing from the ordinary course.

The judgment is reversed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

W. H. GUTHRIE

v.

F. B. FIELD et al.

and

J. W. RIFFIE, Appt.

(85 Kan. 58, 116 Pac. 217.)

Deed — blanks — intrusting to agent — misapplication — effect.

Where the owner of real estate executes and acknowledges a deed thereto, leaving the name of the grantee blank, and intrusts it to another, with authority to negotiate a sale of the land, fill in the name of the buyer, and deliver the deed upon certain conditions, and the holder of the deed, in violation of his instructions, delivers it to a third person, who fills in his own name and records the deed, an innocent purchaser of the property upon the faith of the record acquires such a right that his claim of title cannot be adjudged void at the suit of the original owner, without compensation being made for what he has lost by the transaction.

Headnote by MASON, J.

Note. — Effect of deed executed with name of grantee blank, where name of grantee is filled in and deed delivered contrary to grantor's authorization.

This note does not include cases involving merely the general question as to the

APPEAL by defendant Riffie from a judgment of the District Court for Finney County, quieting plaintiff's title to a certain tract of land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James T. Burney & Son and Hopkins & Hopkins, for appellant:

A deed regularly executed and intrusted to a third person, with the name of the grantee blank, but with the understanding and agreement that the blank may be filled in before delivery, is, when so completed and delivered, a valid deed in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value.

2 Cyc. 159, 171; Lafferty v. Lafferty, validity of a deed executed in blank as to the name of the grantee, or any question as to the authorization of another than the grantor to fill in the grantee's name in such a deed; but, assuming that the grantor has executed a deed in blank as to the name of the grantee, and has duly authorized the filling in of the blank in a certain way or upon certain conditions, the question is as to the effect, where the grantee's name is filled in contrary to the grantor's authorization.

As to a grantor's authorization of the filling in of the grantee's name in a deed signed and acknowledged with a blank therefor, see note to McCleerey v. Wakefield, 2 L.R.A. 529.

In accordance with the general rule that a deed executed in blank as to the grantee's name does not pass legal title to the property described, unless the blank is filled by a person having authority to fill it, before the deed is actually delivered by the grantor (13 Cyc. 540, 541), it seems clear that, where the blank is filled up and the deed delivered contrary to the grantor's authorization, it is at least voidable, if the grantee has knowledge of that fact, or of circumstances sufficient to put him upon inquiry as to the extent of the authority of the person filling up the blank.

Thus, an owner of property, who has executed a deed thereof, with the name of the grantee and the amount of the consideration left blank, and has delivered the deed to his agent, with authority to fill the blanks and deliver the deed when the prospective purchaser shall have accepted the title and deposited the consideration in a certain bank to the credit of the owner, is not bound by a filling of the blanks and delivery of the deed to the purchaser before the latter has accepted the title and deposited the consideration, if the purchaser had knowledge of the fact that the deed was thus executed with blanks, as he assumed the risk that the agent was strictly pursuing his authority in delivering the deed, and that he was legally authorized to fill the blanks before making such delivery. Lund v. Thackery, 18 S. D. 113, 99 N. W. 856.

And where an owner of land has executed a deed thereof, with the name of the grantee left blank, and has delivered the deed to an agent, with authority to insert the name of one with whom the owner has a contract for the property, and to deliver the deed to the latter upon his payment of the agreed price, and the agent inserts in the instrument, as grantee, the name of a stranger, who has knowledge of the facts, and delivers the deed to the latter, without authority, the deed is void, and will be canceled at the suit of the grantor, as against such grantee,—though if such grantee had conveyed to a bona fide purchaser, the first purchaser might have been estopped, as against such purchaser, to deny the validity of his deed. Schintz v. McManamy, 33 Wis. 299.

And in Barden v. Grace, 167 Ala. 453, 52 So. 425, it was held that where a grantor, thinking that he is selling to a certain grantee, signs a deed in which the space for the name of the grantee is in fact blank, and delivers the deed to one whom he believes to be an agent of the supposed grantee, and the deed is subsequently filled in with the name of a man unknown to the grantor, it is void, and not even a subsequent innocent purchaser on the strength thereof will be protected as against the grantor.

But where an owner of land has executed a deed thereof, in blank as to the name of the grantee, and has sent the deed to another person, with authority to fill in the name of the grantee, upon payment being made to the grantor for the land, the fact that such holder of the deed does not fill in the name of the grantee in strict accord with the authority with which he is invested will not, as between the grantor and an innocent purchaser for value, render the conveyance void. Swartz v. Ballou, 47 Iowa, 188, 29 Am. Rep. 470.

And where an owner of land has executed a deed thereof, in blank as to the grantee, and has delivered the deed to his agent, with authority to insert the name of a grantee in the blank and deliver the deed, and the agent makes a fraudulent use of the deed by inserting the name of a relative, as grantee, and delivering the deed to the latter, without consideration, and for his own benefit,—while the deed is voidable as to such grantee, it is good as to purchasers

Likewise, where the owner of a lot has delivered a deed thereof, executed in blank as to the name of the grantee, to a contractor, upon his promise to produce receipts showing payments for material furnished and work done upon a building on another lot, to the extent of the value of the lot in question, and the contractor, without producing such receipts or being able to do so, inserts the name of an innocent third person in the deed, as grantee, and delivers the deed to such grantee for value, for his own benefit, the grantee having no knowledge as to the manner in which the contractor acquired possession of the deed,—the grantee acquires thereby an interest in the land, either as owner or as mortgagee, if he accepted the deed merely as security for a loan to the contractor. Clemmons v. McGeer, 63 Wash. 448, 115 Pac. 1081.

And where a part owner of realty has executed a deed of his own interest, with the grantee's name left blank, and has left the deed with his attorney, with authority to fill up the blank with the name of one of the grantor's co-owners, and to deliver the deed to such grantee upon receipt of the price, in case one of the co-owners will take his interest at a price fixed, but otherwise the deed to be destroyed, and the attorney fills up the blank with his own name as grantee, has the deed recorded, and procures a loan secured by mortgage on the property, representing to the mortgagee, who acts innocently and in good faith, that he has purchased the property from the grantor,—while the deed is void as to the attorney, or as to anyone having notice of the fraud, it is valid as to the innocent mortgagee to the extent of his rights under it, or the rights which he would have under it if it were valid, and his mortgage constitutes a valid lien upon the property. State v. Matthews, 44 Kan. 596, 10 L.R.A. 308, 25 Pac. 36.

And an owner of real property, who has executed in blank a printed form of a deed, and has delivered it to another person to enable the latter to sell the property as his agent, and to convey it to the purchaser by filling up the blanks and delivering the in-

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. H. Guthrie recovered a judgment against F. B. Field, the Osage Live Stock Company, a Missouri corporation, and J. W. Riffie, quieting his title to a tract of land in Finney county. Riffie appeals. The facts, as found by the court or testified to by the plaintiff, are substantially as follows:

Guthrie, a resident of Finney county, on March 10, 1908, delivered to Field, who lived in Kansas City, a warranty deed to the property, fully executed and acknowledged, except that a blank was left for instrument, will be estopped, as against a subsequent innocent purchaser, from denying that the deed was complete when he executed it, after his agent, four years subsequently, has filled up the blanks, inserting his own name as grantee, and has himself sold and conveyed the property to a person ignorant of the facts in reference to the first conveyance, upon which he relied as a valid deed of the first owner. Pence v. Arbuckle, 22 Minn. 417.

The following cases, though upon their facts within the scope of this note, seem to turn upon the excluded question as to the sufficiency of parol authority, or the necessity for written authority, or authority under seal, to fill up blanks in a deed after execution. Thus, in Upton v. Archer, 41 Cal. 85, 10 Am. Rep. 266, where a grantor had executed a deed in blank as to the name of the grantee, and had delivered it to an agent with verbal directions to fill the blank with the names of two certain proposed purchasers, if they accepted his offer to sell, and the agent, in the absence of the grantor, sold the lands to another on the same terms as those of the grantor's offer to sell to the first parties, caused the name of such other person to be inserted in the deed as grantee, and delivered it to him as the grantor's deed, it was held that the instrument was not the deed of the signer thereof, and conveyed no title to the premises, as it could not become his deed until the name of a grantee was inserted; and that act could not be performed by an agent, in the absence of the principal, unless his authority was in writing.

On the other hand, in Field v. Stagg, 52 Mo. 534, 14 Am. Rep. 435, it was held that, where an owner of land has executed a deed regularly in other respects, with a blank left for the name of a grantee, and has placed it, in that condition, in the hands of another person with verbal authority, but no authority under seal, to fill up the blank with the name of a solvent person, and deliver the deed to the person whose name is inserted as grantee,—although the person so authorized fills in the name of an insolvent person, and then delivers the deed to that person, as the deed of the grantor, it will be recognized as a valid deed.

the name of the grantee. The arrangement between them was that Field was to have thirty days within which to find a purchaser, and, upon collecting $2,000 for Guthrie, was to fill in the name of the buyer and deliver the deed. At the expiration of the thirty days, Guthrie went to Kansas City and asked Field for the return of the deed. Field answered, in substance, that the land had been "about stolen" from him, and that he did not have the money to pay Guthrie. On April 14, 1908, Guthrie filed a petition in the district court against Field, alleging the sale of the property to him, and asking judgment for the price. He also caused an attachment to be levied upon the land as the property of Field, but no service was obtained, and the proceeding was abandoned. On May 8 or 10, 1908, a stranger came to Guthrie with the deed, the blank still remaining unfilled, and asked him to insert therein his own name (that of the stranger). Guthrie, after examining the deed, which was handed to him for the purpose, returned it, saying that he had received nothing for it, refusing to fill the blank, and forbidding the stranger to do so, or to record the deed. On May 12, 1908, the deed was filed for record, containing the name of the Osage Live Stock Company as the grantee. On May 16, 1909, J. W. Riffe, of Kansas City, in closing a deal involving other property, accepted at a consideration of $800 a deed from that corporation, he acting in good faith, in reliance upon the record, and without notice of any irregularity. On June 17, 1909, Guthrie brought this action, seeking to set aside the two conveyances described.

The plaintiff contends that the original deed was absolutely void, and incapable of becoming a source of title in anyone, because no one but Field had authority to fill in the blank, and he appears not to have done so, inasmuch as the deed was shown to have left his hands without the name of any grantee having been inserted. The modern and, as we think, the better rule, is that authority may be given by parol to insert the name of a grantee in a deed, even after delivery, and such authority may be implied from the circumstances. 2 Cyc. 159-160, 168-172; 3 Enc. L. & P. 431-435. We do not regard it as material by whose hand the blank was filled. If Field had complied with his instructions in all other respects,—if he had collected the $2,000 and remitted it to Guthrie,—the fact that a representative of the Osage Live Stock Company, instead of Field, wrote in the name of the corporation, after the expiration of the thirty days, would hardly be deemed a sufficient ground to avoid the deed. The act of writing the name would have been essentially that of Field, though done by another hand. If the blank deed had been stolen from Field, and the thief had inscribed the name of a grantee, an entirely different situation would be presented. But Field's statement was that the land—not the deed—had been "almost stolen" from him, and this negatives the idea of a surreptitious taking. If Field delivered the deed in blank, his breach of trust was as pronounced, and the probable effects as readily to be anticipated, as though he had first filled in the name of a grantee.

The effect of the delivery of a deed executed in blank must depend upon the circumstances, and upon the manner in which the question is raised. In Iowa the rule is firmly established that "one who takes a conveyance of property by delivery of a deed executed and delivered to his grantor by a prior owner, and blank as to the name of the grantee, becomes a purchaser without notice as effectually as though his grantor had executed a direct conveyance." Hall v. Kary, 133 Iowa, 465, 470, 119 Am. St. Rep. 639, 110 N. W. 930, 931. In Creveling v. Banta, 138 Iowa, 47, 55, 115 N. W. 598, doubt is expressed as to the wisdom of the rule, but only on the ground that it gives opportunity for concealing property from creditors. We need not determine, however, what the immediate effect would have been if Field had delivered the deed to the Osage Company in violation of his instructions, but for a fair consideration, and without notice of any wrong. Whether (in accordance with the view taken in Lund v. Thackery, 18 S. D. 113, 99 N. W. 856) the mere existence of the blank would have prevented the company from acquiring rights as an innocent purchaser—would have charged it with the duty of learning the actual scope of Field's authority—need not be decided. The trial court was justified in finding that Field did violate his instructions, and that the Osage Company was chargeable with notice of the fact. Little evidence was available concerning the actual negotiation attending the delivery of the deed, and the circumstances shown did not compel a finding that the company acted in good faith.

It follows that under the evidence and findings the deed did not pass title; that, as between Guthrie and the Osage Company, it could have been set aside. Riffe, however, stands upon a different footing. Either he or Guthrie must suffer by the wrongful act of Field. Riffe has been diligent throughout. His conduct has been that of the ordinary business man. He had no reason to suspect any irregularity and no means of ascertaining the real facts except by making an unusual investigation, for which there was no apparent occasion. Guthrie, on the other hand, by intrusting Field with the blank deed, gave him the power to make a perfect record title in anyone he might choose. Guthrie intended that Field should fill in and deliver the deed, but only upon certain conditions. Guthrie reposed confidence in Field that he would act in accordance with his instructions, knowing that, if he did not, some innocent person might be misled. Field delivered the deed contrary to his instructions, and the consequence followed that might have been anticipated if he were to prove unfaithful,—a stranger to the transaction parted with his money having every reason to suppose he was obtaining a good title. Under these circumstances, the loss must fall upon Guthrie rather than upon Riffe. The principle involved is thus stated: "It is a well-settled principle, applicable to both negotiable and non-negotiable contracts, that where a person, with intent to execute a contract, delivers to another an incomplete instrument, and such other has authority, either expressly given or implied by law, to complete the instrument, such instrument is enforceable in the hands of a purchaser for value and without notice, notwithstanding the blanks have been filled up in a manner violative of the authority conferred. This doctrine is based on principles of agency. The filling of such blanks in a wrongful manner by a person having express or implied authority to fill them in another way is deemed to be a breach of confidence merely, and is held to be within the scope of the principle that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer through the wrongful act of a third person, the loss must fall on that one who has reposed confidence in such third person, and thereby enabled him to perpetrate the wrong." 3 Enc. L. & P. 440-442. The peculiar applicability of the principle to the situation here presented is illustrated by a distinction thus pointed out: "The courts which hold to the doctrine of estoppel by negligence in execution base their holding on the maxim that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, that one must bear the loss whose conduct made it possible. But, as has been pointed out in many well-considered cases, this principle applies only where one of the two innocent parties has reposed confidence in the person whose wrongful act occasioned the loss, and consequently is not properly applicable where the instrument was complete when it left the maker's hands, and the person who made the alteration had no authority, express or implied, to do so." 3 Enc. L. & P. 445. The weight of authority sustains the view, although there is some conflict, that no title can be acquired, even by an innocent purchaser, in virtue of the unauthorized delivery of a deed deposited as an escrow. 16 Cyc. 581; 17 L.R.A. 511, note. This is put on the ground that the grantor has been guilty of no negligence. If he is shown to have been negligent, the rule is otherwise. 66 Am. St. Rep. 201, 202, note. An obvious distinction is to be noted between depositing a completed deed, to be delivered upon conditions, and intrusting to another a paper which, at his will, may be converted into an instrument, attested as genuine by the real signature and acknowledgment of the grantor, purporting to convey the property to anyone the holder may select. One who arms another with such an uncontrollable power must know that, if his chosen agent shall prove dishonest, that is likely to happen which in fact happened here; and, if such result follows, it must be regarded as the consequence of his own imprudence. In acknowledging a blank conveyance before an officer, a grantor in effect declares it to be a deed, which it is not, so long as its terms are incomplete. Having purposely put forth his solemn declaration that he has signed the instrument as a complete deed, when he has not in fact done so (expecting the custodian to find a purchaser, fill in the blank, and effect a transfer of title), he is answerable for the consequences if another innocently suffers loss through relying upon such assurance; and he cannot avail himself of the plea that a blank deed is no deed. Where one intrusts a completed deed to another, he so far retains means of control that, by an action against the grantee, he can bring notice of a controversy to a possible purchaser,—a method not available where no grantee is named. In McNeil v. Jordan, 28 Kan. 7, one who was induced by her agent to sign and acknowledge a deed to him, supposing it to be a different instrument, was held to be bound by it, when the rights of an innocent purchaser had intervened. The court there said: "Where a person not illiterate or of feeble mind, possessed of legal capacity to make a contract, executes and acknowledges a deed without ascertaining its character and extent, upon the representations of another, he puts confidence in that person; and, if injury ensues to an innocent third person by reason of that confidence, his act is the means of that injury, and he ought to answer to it." (P. 15.)

An instrument signed under such circumstances would be deemed a forgery (26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 138, note; 17 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 705, note), and upon that ground has been held incapable of supporting a title even for the benefit of an innocent purchaser (McGinn v. Tobey, 62 Mich. 252, 4 Am. St. Rep. 848, 28 N. W. 818). In the case cited, however, the conclusion was also based upon the view that the owner of the land was not in fact negligent, although he signed the deed without reading it, since he had reason to rely upon the statements made to him. In State v. Matthews, 44 Kan. 596, 604, 10 L.R.A. 308, 25 Pac. 38, 39, this court, speaking of a deed executed in blank, said: "The directions of the maker with reference to filling the blank were oral, the instrument was filled up in the absence of the maker, and not in accordance with, but contrary to, her directions, and to her injury; but the parties, now claiming benefits under it, . . . acted innocently and in good faith, and without the slightest knowledge of . . . fraud or of the imperfections or infirmities of the instrument when it left the hands of the maker, . . . and they parted with value on the strength of the instrument as it appeared when they or either of them first saw it, and as the maker . . . and her agent . . . made it to appear. In all such cases the weight of authority is that the instrument will be held to be valid to the extent of the innocent party's rights under it, or the rights which he or she would have under it if it were valid. . . . This is founded upon the general principle of law often announced by courts, and which has become axiomatic, 'that, whenever one of two innocent persons must suffer loss on account of the wrongful acts of a third, he who has enabled the third person to occasion the loss must be the person who shall suffer.' . . . It is almost universally held that whenever an instrument is procured from one person by the fraud or villainy of another, even if such fraud or villainy should amount to a criminal offense, if all the rights which the instrument apparently gives should at that time or afterwards be transferred to another who should be an innocent and bona fide holder for value, the innocent and bona fide holder could enforce the instrument against the maker, although the maker might also be an innocent person. . . . In such a case the maker would be estopped from claiming that the instrument was void as against the innocent bona fide holder. There may be some authorities that hold a contrary doctrine; but, if so, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) we do not choose to follow them. (Pp. 604, 605.) The case of Stone v. French 37 Kan. 145, 151, 1 Am. St. Rep. 237, 14 Pac. 530, 533, is cited in support of the plaintiff's contention, but we think it wholly consistent with the views already expressed. There a deed signed and acknowledged, but not delivered during the life of the grantor, after his death reached the hands of the grantee, and was recorded. It was held that one purchasing upon the faith of the record acquired no rights, upon the ground that the owners of the land (the heirs of the person named as grantor), not having been in any way negligent, could not be deprived of their property by the acts of a person for whose conduct they were in no way responsible. In the opinion it was said: "A deed not delivered, but wrongfully in the hands of the apparent grantee, without fault or negligence on the part of the owner of the land, is unlike a deed not delivered, but which, through the fault or negligence of the owner, has been permitted to get into the hands of the apparent grantee." (37 Kan. 151.) In Wiggenhorn v. Daniels, 149 Mo. 160, 50 S. W. 807, a landowner executed a deed in blank, which was wrongfully filled in and recorded. He was allowed to prevail against one who claimed to be an innocent purchaser on the faith of the deed. There, however, the defeated claimant had no title in the deed referred to; a purported conveyance to him turning out to be a forgery. In Westlake v. Dunn, 184 Mass. 260, 100 Am. St. Rep. 557, 68 N. E. 212, the owner left a blank deed with an agent to deliver upon the payment of the purchase money. A proposed buyer obtained the deed from the agent by representing that he wanted to show it to a friend, who was to furnish a part of the price, and that he would return it in a few moments. Instead of doing so, he filled in his own name and raised money upon a mortgage. The court held that the mortgagee could not recover, saying that neither the owner nor the agent had reason to suspect that the deed would be used as it was, and that they owed no duty to anyone to see that it was not so used, and therefore could not have been negligent in that respect. An instrument in the form of an executed deed, save that no grantee is named, has in one sense no legal effect. But as it is manifestly adapted to the use to which it is often put,—to enable the holder to accomplish a transfer,—it would seem to be within the reason of this language, used of a non-negotiable certificate of indebtedness assigned in blank: "If the owner of the instrument intrusts it to another, he does so charged with notice of the power to deceive which he is putting into that other's hands; and, if deception follows, he must bear the burden. . . . It cannot be said that the owner is free from all obligation to contemplate the possibility of wrongdoing by a third person." Scollans v. E. H. Rollins & Sons, 179 Mass. 340, 353, 88 Am. St. Rep. 386, 60 N. E. 983, 984. The Dunn-Westlake Case, however, differs from the one at bar, in that the actual perpetrator of the fraud had not been intrusted with the delivery of the deed, but had obtained possession of it under the pretense of desiring it for a temporary purpose; his attitude being much the same as though he had taken it surreptitiously.

While for the reasons indicated the judgment must be reversed, it does not follow that the plaintiff should be denied all relief. Riffe paid only $800 for the conveyance from the Osage Company. There was a mortgage upon the land, but he did not become personally responsible for its payment. He appears to have executed a deed to the property, but, as this was after the commencement of the action, it cannot affect the result. Guthrie would be entitled to have the title quieted in himself except for the fact that Riffe has suffered loss through his negligence and misplaced confidence. The extent to which Guthrie's right is thus qualified is measured by the amount of the loss. The principle upon which Riffe is protected does not require that he shall enjoy the full fruits of his bargain with the Osage Company,—merely that he shall be saved from actual loss. This result will be accomplished if he is paid $800 and interest. Guthrie should have an opportunity to make that payment, and thereupon to have his title quieted. If he elects not to do so, or fails to do so within a time to be fixed by the trial court, judgment should be rendered for Riffe.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for proceedings in accordance herewith.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

FRANK KIERNAN, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF PORTLAND et al., Respts.

(57 Or. 454, 111 Pac. 379.)

Voters — submission of amendment — filing proposal.

1. The validity of the submission to the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

voters of a proposed charter amendment cannot be destroyed because the proposal for it was filed with the city auditor in his capacity as clerk of the common council rather than as clerk of the city, where the ordinance authorizing the proceeding required the proposal to be filed merely with the auditor.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — repeal — effect of amendments.

2. The repeal of an ordinance as amended, which provides for the submission of a question to the voters on a certain date, carries with it an amendment requiring its submission on another date.

Same — ordinance — submitting question to voters — time of passage.

3. A resolution fixing the date when a proposition shall be submitted to the voters of the city may be passed before the expiration of the period which must elapse before a prior ordinance repealing a proposition to submit at another date can take effect.

Statute — initiative measure — title.

4. A title may be affixed to an initiative measure for purposes of identification, although the law does not in terms require it.

Voters — clerical mistake — effect on election.

5. A vote of the electors amending the city charter will not be void because of a clerical failure to print on the ballot the fact that the amendment was submitted by the council, although the ordinance under which the submission was made required it to be done.

Same — preparation of ballots — variance from voters' pamphlet.

6. A vote upon the question of the adoption by the electors of a charter amendment will not be void because the squares to be crossed in the ballot were not numbered in the same order as in the voters' pamphlet of instructions, where the words "yes" and "no" were plainly printed opposite the squares on the ballots, so that no one could have been misled.

Same — charter amendment — invalid provision.

7. The adoption by the voters of a city of a charter amendment authorizing the building of a bridge is not rendered void by the insertion of an invalid provision

Note.—A writ of error in this case was dismissed by the United States Supreme Court (Kiernan v. Portland, 223 U. S. 151, 56 L. ed. —, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231) upon the ground that the existence of the republican form of government was a congressional, and not a judicial, question, following the decision to the same effect in Pacific States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S. 118, 56 L. ed. —, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224,—and that the question whether the statute was in violation of the state Constitution was not a Federal question. The initiative and referendum are considered in the notes to Ex parte Pfahler, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1092, and Ex parte Farnsworth, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 969, and notes thereto.

that it be turned over to the county when completed.

Bridge — right to enjoin erection — failure to secure permission.

8. A taxpayer cannot enjoin the construction of a bridge by the city on the ground that it will cross navigable waters of the United States, and that no permission from it or from the state corporation having control of the port has been secured.

Ports — state control — interference with municipal bridges.

9. The creation of a corporation to control a river for the purpose of facilitating and protecting commerce does not give it power to interfere with the construction by a municipal corporation of a bridge across the river, where its charter empowers it to construct bridges, and it has constitutional power to amend its charter in local matters by adopting any provision asserting a right which the legislature might have conferred upon it.

Municipal corporation — legislative control.

On Petition for Rehearing.

10. The legislature may enact general laws governing municipal corporations under constitutional provisions that corporations may be formed under general laws, and that the legislative assembly shall not enact, amend, or repeal any charter or act of incorporation for any municipality, city, or town.

Government — republican form — initiative.

11. A republican form of government is not destroyed by taking from the legislature and committing directly to the people the power over the enactment of certain kinds of legislation.

Municipal corporation — freedom from legislative control.

12. The people may confer upon the voters of a municipal corporation the right to enact local laws which cannot be affected by special acts of the legislature, so long as the legislature is not prevented from controlling them by general enactments.

(November 1, 1910.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in defendants' favor in a suit brought to enjoin the issuance and sale of municipal bonds for the construction of a bridge. Affirmed.

Statement by McBride, J.:

This is a suit by Frank Kiernan against the city of Portland, a municipal corporation, Joseph Simon, mayor of the city of Portland, A. L. Barbur, auditor of the city of Portland, and Joseph Buchtel.

Article 5, §§ 75 to 92, inclusive, of the city charter, provides the method by which the city of Portland may construct or acquire public utilities, including bridges, but prohibits the city from entering into any contract for such purpose until the question is first submitted to the vote of the electors.

On April 7, 1908, an initiative petition, containing the required number of signatures, was filed with the council, requesting the city to build a bridge across the Willamette river, from Broadway street in East Portland to the west side of the river, whereupon the city of Portland took steps to obtain plans and specifications for building said bridge. On May 8, 1908, the auditor notified the mayor of the filing of said petition, and requested him to comply with his duties under the charter in regard thereto. On October 20, 1908, the petition, containing a sufficient number of signatures, was presented to the council at a legally called meeting, and at said date the council requested the opinion of the city attorney as to the validity thereof. On October 27, 1908, the attorney filed his opinion, affirming its validity, and thereafter, on November 11, 1908, the council passed an ordinance (No. 18,531) submitting to a vote of the people an amendment to the city charter, providing for the construction of said bridge and for issuing bonds in the sum of not to exceed $2,000,000 to pay for the same, designating said proposed amendment as § 118½ of article 7 of chapter 3, and on November 25, 1908, the council passed a resolution, submitting the proposed amendment to a vote of the people at a special election on April 23, 1909. Thereafter, on February 17, 1909, the council passed an ordinance (No. 18,976) amending ordinance No. 18,531 so as to fix the date of the election on May 8, 1909, instead of April 23d, as originally specified. On March 31, 1909, the council passed an ordinance (No. 19,174) expressly repealing ordinance No. 18,531 as amended, and no special election was held under any ordinance or resolution. On March 31, 1909, the same date as that of the repealing ordinance, a resolution was passed authorizing the submission of the charter amendment to a vote of the people at the general election to be held June 7, 1909. More than twenty days prior to the election, the auditor of the city published the proposed charter amendment, with the ballot in full, in the city's official newspaper, as required by law, and also sent out and distributed copies of said amendment to the voters of the city. On June 7th the election was held, at which there were cast for the amendment 10,087 votes, and against it 6,061, and on June 21st the mayor proclaimed that the amendment had been adopted. On October 27, 1909, the council passed an ordinance (No.

20,208) authorizing the issue and sale of bonds to build the bridge, and thereafter plaintiff, a taxpayer of the city, brought this suit to enjoin the sale of such bonds, alleging ordinance No. 20,208 to be void, by reason of the fact that the alleged charter amendment § 118½ was not properly enacted. Upon trial in the court below the plaintiff's suit was dismissed, and defendant had a decree for costs. Plaintiff appeals.

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Viewed in the light of our Constitution and the ordinance of the city of Portland passed in pursuance thereof, the validity of § 118½ of the city charter seems clear. Article 11, § 2, of our Constitution, as amended June 4, 1906, is as follows: "The legal voters of every city and town are hereby granted power to enact and amend their municipal charter, subject to the Constitution and criminal laws of the state. . . ." In Acme Dairy Co. v. Astoria, 49 Or. 520, 90 Pac. 153, we held this provision not to be self-executing, and that in the absence of the legislation to the contrary, the city council might, by ordinance, order an initiative measure to be submitted to the voters. Pursuant to this decision the city council on March 26, 1907, passed ordinance No. 16,311, commonly known as the "McNary ordinance," providing for the submission of initiative measures to the people, and, the present measure having been regularly before them, they passed ordinance No. 18,531, submitting the same and fixing the date for the election on April 23, 1909. Later, presumably in order to have such special election coincide with the general primary election, another ordinance was passed, amending the previous ordinance, and fixing the date on May 8, 1909. Still later, on March 31, 1909, some doubt having arisen as to the validity of the election on the date last mentioned, an ordinance repealing the original ordinance as amended, was passed, and at the same meeting a resolution was adopted submitting the amendment to the voters at the general election to be held June 7, 1909.

2. The McNary ordinance provides that initiative petitions for charter amendments shall be filed not later than the sixtieth day before the election at which they are to be voted on, and also provides that the council itself may submit proposed amendments without an initiative petition, but that the same shall be filed with the auditor not later than sixty days before the election. The evidence is clear, and is not denied, that the present measure was on file with the auditor from the time of the presentation of the initiative petition, and it would seem clear that whether we regard it as a measure initiated by petition, or as a measure proposed by the council, the requisites of the law as to filing have been substantially complied with, and that the measure was entitled to go upon the ballot.

3. Counsel for plaintiff attempts to draw a distinction,—that the original filing was with the auditor acting in his capacity as clerk of the council, and not in his capacity as general auditor and clerk of the city,—but no such distinction is made in the law. No good reason exists for requiring several filings of the same paper with the same officer, simply because the duties of his office are divided into several departments. In fact, there is but one office, and one officer with one title, namely city auditor.

4. The contention that the repealing ordinance of March 31st did not repeal ordinance No. 18,976 is unsound. The ordinance last mentioned did not destroy ordinance No. 18,531, but merely amended it by changing a date from April 23d to May 8th. As amended it was in full force; and when, on March 31st, an ordinance was passed repealing it “as amended,” the whole ordinance, including amendments, was wiped out, if not directly, at least by implication.

5. Nor does the fact that the repealing ordinance could not take effect for thirty days take away from the council the power to pass a resolution to submit the charter amendment to a vote at the June election. They had a right, and it was their duty, to provide for a contingency which, in the natural course of things, would arise upon the expiration of the thirty days. Laws predicated upon future contingencies are not unusual.

6. The contention that the resolution submitting the amendment to a popular vote is uncertain and does not identify the amendment cannot be upheld. We have carefully compared the amendment with the resolution, and are certain that any person capable of reading and understanding the English language would instantly identify them as related to the same subject-matter and to each other. While the law does not in terms require that an initiative measure shall have a title, it does not prohibit a title, and if one is affixed it may be used for the purposes of identification, and in the present case we think the amendment sufficiently identified, both by reference to the title and to the subject-matter.

The alleged differences between the description of the proposed bridge in the resolution and ballot title are too microscopic to have misled anyone.

7. Plaintiff also contends that the failure of the auditor to have the words “charter amendment submitted by the council” printed upon the ballot rendered the election void. It may be conceded that these words should have been printed upon the ballot, and that the ordinance requiring this to be done is in a sense mandatory upon the officers charged with the duty of preparing the ballot; but it does not follow that a failure in this respect renders the election void. The omission could have misled nobody, as the important question for the voter to decide was not who introduced the measure, but what its real merits were. Courts should hesitate to disfranchise 10,000 voters because of the neglect of an officer to comply with a technical and comparatively unimportant provision of the law, unless it can be seen that the effect of such negligence might have been to change the result of the election. Following the doctrine above announced, courts have frequently held statutes containing provisions similar to the one invoked by plaintiff in this case, to be merely directory as to the voter. Jones v. State, 153 Ind. 440, 55 N. E. 229; Patton v. Watkins, 131 Ala. 387, 90 Am. St. Rep. 43, 31 So. 93; Maxwell, Interpretation of Statutes, 556, 557.

8. The same answer may be made to the contention that the transposition of the ballot numbers in the voters' pamphlet rendered the whole proceeding void. The law provides substantially that the affirmative shall be designated by the even numbers, and the negative by the odd; but in printing the ballot title in the voters' pamphlet the negative was placed after the even number and the affirmative after the odd. In all other respects the ballot title corresponds with that actually printed upon the ballot. Ordinarily this might be misleading, but in the present case could not possibly be so. We here give the ballot title, omitting that part descriptive of the measure:

Shall article 6 of chapter 3 of the charter of the city of Portland, be amended by inserting § 118½?

152 ☐ YES.

153 ☐ NO.

The words “Yes” and “No” were printed in large Roman type, showing much more conspicuously than the figures, and were the very things that indicated to the voter where to mark his ballot. The mistake misled nobody, and was immaterial.

9. It is also urged that the amendment is void because it provides that upon completion of the bridge the executive board shall surrender and deliver the possession thereof to the county court of Multnomah county. We agree with counsel that it is beyond the power of the city to impose the care and maintenance of a public bridge upon Multnomah county without the county authorities shall consent thereto, and that so far as this clause of the amendment goes, beyond giving a mere permission to do so, it is void.

10. It does not follow, however, that the whole amendment is void merely because one clause, easily separable from the rest, is ineffective. Simon v. Northup, 27 Or. 487, 30 L.R.A. 171, 40 Pac. 560.

11. The contention that no permission has been obtained from the War Department is negatived by the evidence; and, even if this were not so, the plaintiff does not stand in such a relation to the subject-matter as to be able to raise the question, which is one to be settled between the government authorities and the city.

12. The objection that no permission has been received from the port of Portland may be answered in the same way. Kundinger v. Saginaw, 132 Mich. 396, 93 N. W. 914.

13. In addition to this, we have been cited to no statute requiring the city to obtain the permission of the port of Portland before constructing bridges over the Willamette river. This corporation is authorized to remove obstructions, to deepen the channels, and generally to have control over the river for the purpose of facilitating and protecting commerce; but it may well be doubted whether this grant of power was ever intended to authorize it to act as sole judge as to when and where and how a great city shall erect bridges over a water way exclusively within its own limits. Section 76 of the charter of 1903 authorizes the city to acquire, construct, and maintain bridges and ferries, and this could have no application to any bridges or ferries except over the Willamette river. In the emergency clause to the same charter the necessity for constructing new bridges is enumerated. The power to construct bridges having been given, the next question is as to the manner of its exercise. The people of this state, by the constitutional amendment heretofore quoted, have seen fit to confer upon municipal corporations the right to enact their own charters; the only limitation upon that right being that such charters shall not conflict with the Constitution or the criminal laws of this state. We take it, therefore, that within the limits of the municipality, and for those purposes which are purely municipal, the city of Portland may include in its charter by amendment any provision or right that the legislature might have granted before the Constitution was so amended. This being so, there is fair ground for the contention that the city may, by amendment to its charter, obtain the right to locate a public bridge over the Willamette river at any point where such river is exclusively within the municipal boundaries, which is the case here.

We find no error in the record, and the decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

King, J., concurring:

I concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice McBride, and only wish to add that in my opinion there can be no doubt as to the power of the city of Portland to build bridges across the Willamette river without asking the consent of the corporation of the port of Portland.

The act of legislature of February 18, 1891 (Laws 1891, p. 791, § 2), as amended by act Feb. 18, 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 146, § 1), incorporating the port of Portland, contains the following grant of power: "The object, purpose, and occupation of said corporation . . . shall be to improve the Willamette river at the city of Portland, and the Willamette and Columbia rivers between said city and the sea, so that there shall be made and permanently maintained in said Willamette river at said city, from wharf line to wharf line, and in the Willamette and Columbia rivers between said city and the sea, a ship channel of such width at any and all points as it may deem necessary. . . . So far as is necessary, requisite, or convenient to carry out the said objects and purposes, the said corporation shall have the full control of said rivers at said city of Portland and between said city and the sea, so far as and to the full extent that this state can grant the same, and shall have full power to, from time to time, make such rules and regulations for the navigation thereof, or the placing of obstruction therein, as may be requisite, necessary, or convenient in the creation or maintenance of such channel. . . . Provided always that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to permit the removal of bridges or other obstructions existing by virtue of grant by this state of express authority therefor. . . ." From the foregoing it will be observed that there is no express provision requiring the city of Portland to apply to the port of Portland for permission to build bridges at any point within the city's corporate limits. It is too well settled to require citation of authority for support that grants of state sovereignty are always to be strictly construed.

Again, an express reservation as to bridges existing by virtue of an express grant of the state is made in favor of the city in § 76 of the charter of Portland, authorizing the building of bridges and the maintenance of ferries. In addition to this, the constitutional amendment relating to municipalities (pursuant to which § 118½ of the charter was adopted) delegates to cities all the sovereignty of the state within their municipal boundaries, so far as that species of sovereignty relates to matters of purely municipal concern. Such grants of legislative power, however, may be recalled by the authority conferring them (Straw v. Harris, 54 Or. 424, 103 Pac. 777), and this power of recall serves to prevent the abuse of the privileges delegated.

While the port of Portland is in many of its attributes a municipal corporation, it is one organized for a special purpose, and possessing limited powers, derived, not from the Constitution, but from an express legislative grant. To give to this grant the broad construction claimed by counsel would be to make the port of Portland virtually master of the city of Portland, responsible to no superior authority. I believe the legislature intended the port of Portland corporation to be the servant of the city of Portland and of the state at large, in the promotion of commerce and prosperity, and not the dictator thereof.

Running through all the amendments to the port of Portland act, as well as through the various acts amending the charter of the city of Portland, is an evident intent of the legislature to prevent the rights of the city from being subverted to the wishes of this auxiliary corporation. It follows, then, that the city of Portland, having adopted appropriate amendments to its charter therefor, is acting within the scope of its authority, and is not required to obtain the consent of the port of Portland before constructing the bridge in question.

Affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, King, J., on December 31, 1910, handed down the following additional opinion (57 Or. 466, 112 Pac. 402):

14. The principal point suggested by the petition for rehearing is the contention that the people of Oregon have no power, by constitutional provision or otherwise, to deprive the legislature of the sovereign power to enact, amend, or repeal any charter or act of incorporation for any city or town, and any attempt so to do is void. The constitutional provisions amending article 11, adopted in June, 1906, known as the "Charter Amendments," are as follows:

"Section 1a. The referendum may be demanded by the people against one or more items, sections, or parts of any act of the legislative assembly in the same manner in which such power may be exercised against a complete act. The filing of a referendum petition against one or more items, sections, or parts of an act shall not delay the remainder of that act from becoming operative. The initiative and referendum powers reserved to the people by this Constitution are hereby further reserved to the legal voters of every municipality and district as to all local, special, and municipal legislation, of every character, in or for their respective municipalities and districts. The manner of exercising said powers shall be prescribed by general laws, except that cities and towns may provide for the manner of exercising the initiative and referendum powers as to their municipal legislation. Not more than 10 per cent of the legal voters may be required to order the referendum, nor more than 15 per cent to propose any measure, by the initiative, in any city or town.

"Sec. 2. Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by the legislative assembly by special laws. The legislative assembly shall not enact, amend, or repeal any charter or act of incorporation for any municipality, city, or town. The legal voters of every city and town are hereby granted power to enact and amend their municipal charter, subject to the Constitution and criminal laws of Oregon."

It will be observed from the first sentence in § 2 that no restriction is placed upon the legislature with respect to the enactment of general laws; the exception being that no special laws creating or affecting the municipalities shall be enacted by the legislature. Under all the rules of construction, this exception reserves to the legislative department the right, whether by the people directly, through the initiative, or indirectly, through the legislature, to enact general laws upon the subject, making it clear that the inhibition in the next sentence has reference to special laws.

In Farrell v. Portland, 52 Or. 582, 586, 98 Pac. 145, it is held that the initiative amendments to the Constitution, bearing upon the creation and government of municipalities, including § 1 of article 11, must be construed together. In considering the effect of § 2, art. 11, it is there said: "But this section and the language used in it should not be construed alone. It is a part of the general initiative and referendum scheme first inaugurated by the amendment of 1902, and subsequently enlarged and extended by the amendments of 1906. All these amendments, so far as they refer to the same subject-matter, should be read together, and be so interpreted as to carry out the purpose of the people in adopting them, regardless of the technical construction of some of the language used." Since the above is the rule regarding the various amendments taken as a whole, much stronger must be the reason for reading and construing together all the sentences in the one section, from which it is obvious that the only restriction placed upon the legislature by § 2 pertains to the passage of special laws affecting municipalities. These agencies of the state are thereby enabled to enact such local measures, to revise existing local laws, and to exercise their powers affecting them, and thus carry out their general scope and purpose, so long as they are not inconsistent with the Constitution of the state, or of the United States, and are in harmony with all the special laws and general laws of the state, constitutionally enacted. Straw v. Harris, 54 Or. 424, 433, 103 Pac. 777. The language following the above excerpt from page 587 of 52 Or. of the opinion in Farrell v. Portland, concerning the limitations placed by the amendment upon the legislature, must be interpreted in the light of the questions there under consideration, from which it is manifest reference was had only to special laws affecting municipalities. The so-called "general initiative and referendum scheme," there alluded to, and whether it is in violation of this provision of the Federal Constitution, is fully considered and determined, adversely to petitioner's contention in Kaddery v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222, and State v. Pacific States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 53 Or. 163, 99 Pac. 427, and there held to be not in conflict or inconsistent therewith. Other cases impliedly if not expressly sustaining this position are: Farrell v. Portland and Straw v. Harris, supra; Haines v. Forest Grove, 54 Or. 443, 103 Pac. 775; State v. Langworthy, 55 Or. 303, 104 Pac. 424, 106 Pac. 336.

15. The question, however, as to whether the people may, by constitutional amendment, reserve to themselves the right to enact any law to the exclusion of the legislature, and, by such method, delegate to municipalities powers not subject to abridgment, change, limitation, or recall by special acts of the legislative assembly, was not directly involved in any of the cases above cited. It would seem, however, that the views and conclusions reached in the decisions named necessarily dispose of this feature, but since counsel for petitioner insists that such disposal has not been made, and presents his contention in good faith, we will, at the possible expense of repetition of views announced in the above cases, consider the points thus presented. To begin, article 4, § 4, U. S. Const. reads: "The United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence." In Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 48, 12 L. ed. 581, 601, the court observes: "Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind, and authorized the general government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a state, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that the United States shall guarantee to every state in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on the application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence. Under this article of the Constitution, it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a state. For, as the United States guarantee to each state a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the state before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the senators and representatives of a state are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision is binding on every other department of the government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal." See also Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 42, 45; Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700, 730, 19 L. ed. 227, 239; Taylor v. Beckham, 178 U. S. 548; 44 L. ed. 1187, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1009, and 6 Mich. Law Rev. 304, where authorities sustaining the above view are collated. We have an illustration of the principles announced in Luther v. Borden in the admission of Oklahoma as a state. Before its statehood was recognized, Oklahoma had adopted, as a part of its Constitution, the initiative and referendum lawmaking system, patterned after the Oregon plan, regardless of which its senators and representatives were "admitted into the councils of the Union," and "the authority of the government under which they were appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority;" thus determining that state, with its comparatively new legislative system, to be republican in form. This recent historical precedent should in itself be adequate to set at rest the temporarily mooted question in hand.

This court, however, has heretofore taken jurisdiction of cases of this character (Kad- derly v. Portland, supra, State v. Cochran, 55 Or. 170, 105 Pac. 884), and, owing to the importance of the points presented, we will proceed to a consideration thereof. To ascertain whether taking from the legislature and delegating to the municipalities, or to the localities affected, local self-government, or a right to enact, maintain, and alter their charters as the legislature formerly did, and whether the taking from the legislature the right to make special laws upon the subject violates this provision of the national Constitution, makes it important that we first ascertain what is meant by a republican form of government. It is an expression which all assume to understand, yet, judging from the many unsuccessful attempts of eminent statesmen and writers to give it a clear meaning, it would seem the phrase is not susceptible to being given a precise definition. Especially is this true when sought to be applied to the Constitution of different states, concerning which Mr. James Madison, a member of the Constitutional Convention, said: "... If we resort for a criterion to the different principles on which different forms of government are established, we may define a republic to be, or at least may bestow that name on, a government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure for a limited period or during good behavior. It is essential to such a government that it be derived from the great body of society, and not from any inconsiderable proportion or a favored class of it. . . ." The Federalist, Hamilton ed. paper 39, p. 174. Another and more pointed definition appears in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, 457, 1 L. ed. 440, 456, by Mr. Justice Wilson, a member of the Constitutional Convention, who, but a short time after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in adverting to what is meant by a republican form of government, remarked: "As a citizen, I know the government of that state [Georgia] to be republican, and my short definition of such a government is—one constructed on this principle—that the supreme power resides in the body of the people." From which it follows that the converse must be true; that is to say, any government in which the supreme power does not reside with the people is not republican in form. See also Mr. Justice Wilson's remarks to the same effect, reported in 5 Elliot's Debates, 160.

Measured in the light of the above, it is difficult to conceive of any system of law-making coming nearer to the great body of the people of the entire state, or by those comprising the various municipalities, than that now in use here, and, being so, we are at a loss to understand how the adoption and use of this system can be held a departure from a republican form of government. It was to escape the oppression resulting from governments controlled by the select few, so often ruling under the assumption that "might makes right," that gave birth to republics. Monarchical rulers refuse to recognize their accountability to the people governed by them. In a republic the converse is the rule. The tenure of office may be for a short or a long period, or even for life, yet those in office are at all times answerable, either directly or indirectly, to the people, and in proportion to their responsibility to those for whom they may be the public agents, and the nearer the power to enact laws and control public servants lies with the great body of the people, the more nearly does a government take unto itself the form of a republic,—not in name alone, but in fact. From this it follows that each republic may differ in its political system or in the political machinery by which it moves, but, so long as the ultimate control of its officials and affairs of state remain in its citizens, it will, in the eye of all republics, be recognized as a government of that class. Of this we have many examples in Central and South America. It becomes, then, a matter of degree; and the fear manifested by the briefs filed in this case would seem to indicate, not that we are drifting from the secure moorings of a public, but that our state, by the direct system of legislation complained of, is becoming too democratic,—advancing too rapidly towards a republic pure in form. This, it is true, counsel for petitioner does not concede, but under any interpretation of which the term is capable, or from any view thus far found expressed in the writings of the prominent statesmen who were members of the Constitutional Convention, or who figured in the early upbuilding of the nation, it follows that the system here assailed brings us nearer to a state republican in form than before its adoption. Mr. Thomas Jefferson, in 1816, when discussing the term "republic," defined and illustrated his view thereof as follows: "Indeed, it must be acknowledged that the term 'republic' is of very vague application in every language. Witness the self-styled republics of Holland, Switzerland, Genoa, Venice, Poland. Were I to assign to this term a precise and definite idea, I would say, purely and simply, it means a government by its citizens in mass, acting directly, and not personally, according to rules established by the majority; and that every other government is more or less republican, in proportion as it has in its composition more or less of this ingredient of the direct action of the citizens." Writings of Thomas Jefferson, vol. 15, p. 19. It is well known that at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution there existed in some of the Atlantic states a system of local government, known as "New England towns," in which the people had the right to legislate upon various matters, the masses assembling at stated periods for that purpose, all of which was within the knowledge of those composing the Constitutional Convention. After observing that a true republic, under his definition, would necessarily be restrained to narrow limits, such as in a New England township, and that the next step in use at that time was through the representative system, Mr. Jefferson pointed out that the further the officials of state or nation are separated from the masses, proportionately less does such state or government retain the elements of a republic; and on page 23 concludes: "On this view of the import of the term 'republic,' instead of saying, as has been said, that it may mean anything or nothing, we may say with truth and meaning that governments are more or less republican, as they have more or less of the element of popular election and control in their composition; and believing, as I do, that the mass of citizens is the safest depository of their own rights, and especially, that the evils flowing from the cuperies of the people are less injurious than those from the egoism of their agents, I am a friend to that composition of government which has in it the most of this ingredient." The observations quoted are in full accord with the recorded views of all the writers and statesmen of that time, when the intention of the framers of our national Constitution was fully understood, in the light of which it seems inconceivable that a state, merely because it may evolve a system by which its citizens become a branch of its legislative department, co-ordinate with their representatives in the legislature, loses caste as a republic. The extent to which a legislature of any state may enact laws is, and always has been, one of degree, depending upon the limitations prescribed by its Constitution; some Constitutions having few and others many limitations. But in all states, whatever may be the restriction placed upon their representatives, the people, either by constitutional amendment or by convention called for that purpose, have had, and have, the power to directly legislate, and to change all or any laws so far as deemed proper,—limited only by clear inhibitions of the national Constitution. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed 44.

tution, as first adopted, discloses many restrictions upon the lawmaking department, among which is a provision to the effect that no amendment thereto should be submitted to the people for ratification until after it passed two consecutive sessions of the legislature. In course of time, an amendment under this provision was legally submitted and adopted by a majority vote of the people, by which the people reserved the right to change the Constitution or any part thereof without awaiting this legislative formality, the validity of which is not open to doubt. Is it not possible, indeed, is it not practicable, then, for the people further to restrict the power of their representatives to legislate upon matters of public interest, and in so doing are they not, and even under the old system were they not, directly legislating? This system of direct legislation has been in common use throughout the various state governments since their inception; but until the adoption of the initiative and referendum amendments no one was heard to assert that an amendment to the Constitution of a state, merely because of depriving the legislature of some lawmaking power or powers held by it at the adoption of the national Constitution, was void on the grounds of being inconsistent with a republican form of government. The absurdity of such a contention, if made, would at once be obvious. But, viewed from any standpoint, such is the logical sequence of appellant's contention to the effect, that because the people have, by constitutional amendment, reserved the exclusive right to enact special laws concerning municipalities, and by constitutional amendment have delegated to municipal corporations the right to exercise such powers as before were only within the province of their representatives, through the legislature, to delegate, violates the provision of the Federal Constitution, guarantying to our state a republican form of government. In other words, it is argued that the right of the city of Portland to legislate upon matters of municipal concern, to provide for the exercise of its right of eminent domain, to build bridges, etc., would be in harmony with the above provision of the Federal Constitution if delegated by the people through their representatives, but not so if done directly by them through the initiative. In brief, the effect of this argument is that the people may legally do indirectly, by the mere enactment of a law, what they cannot do directly by constitutional amendment. The statement of this contention should be sufficient for its answer.

We held in Straw v. Harris, 54 Or. 424, 103 Pac. 777, that a state could not, by amendment of its fundamental laws or otherwise, except in the manner provided in § 3, art. 4, U. S. Const. delegate to any municipality or subdivision of the state prerogatives not subject to recall; that, so to do would, in effect, be the creation of a state within a state; and that, so long as the legislature is not precluded by the Constitution from enacting general laws affecting them, it may by that method amend, modify, or even abolish municipal corporations, and that even should this power be removed from the legislature there must remain with the people a right to do so, if not by enacting a law to that effect, then by the former system of direct legislation, consisting in the adoption of amendments to the Constitution, known as the fundamental laws of the state, and that this right of state government to retain control of these agencies and departments of state cannot be surrendered, but must always remain somewhere within the reach of that source of all power,—the people. We held, and still hold, to this view, not on the ground that to hold otherwise would be destructive of a republican form of government, but because to do so would in effect permit a state within a state, and accordingly violate § 3, art. 4, of the Federal Constitution, the first paragraph of which reads: "New states may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state; nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of the legislatures of the states concerned, as well as of the Congress." Suppose our lawmaking department should pass an ex post facto act, or a bill of attainder, such purported laws would be void, not because of being subversive of a republican form of government, but by reason of some express inhibition against legislation of that character, contained in another section of the Federal Constitution. If the national Constitution permitted or provided for the creation of a state within a state, could it be said that, by reason thereof, the state thus created would be unrepubli- can in form? Under § 3 of article 4, above quoted, states may be divided and new ones created, the limitation being that no state shall be created within a state, but the creation of new states under that section has never been considered an unrepubli- can step. Should our state attempt to surrender its powers to an executive for life, with the provision that upon his death his authority should pass by entailed inheritance to his son or other relative, and at the same time, by constitutional change or otherwise, further surrender any right to alter the system, except with the consent of such executive, it would lose its republican form, and in effect become a local monarchy within the Union, thereby furnishing an example of a violation of § 4, art. 4, of the Federal Constitution. But, so long as the people retain the power within themselves to conduct and manage the affairs of state,—either directly or indirectly,—a republican form of government is maintained, and comes within the provision of the Federal Constitution guarantying the same, being circumscribed in its powers only by the provisions of such Constitution. The effect of petitioner's contention is that any attempt on the part of the state to enact and enforce a law which may be in conflict with any provision of the national Constitution is not void because in conflict or inconsistent with the special provision violated, but because it deprives the state of its republican form of government; and this seems to be the character of reasoning adopted by the majority in People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 34 Colo. 143, 86 Pac. 233, to which we are cited as sustaining petitioner's view. In that case the question was whether the consolidation of the city and county of Denver, the boundaries of which were made coterminous, abolished the city government, as distinguished from county government, thereby giving to such organization home rule to the extent of permitting it to do as the constitutional amendment of 1902 provided might be done,—enact all local laws, and elect such officers at such times as deemed advisable, concerning which it was held by the majority that the city and county governments, although covering the same territory, remained separate and distinct, requiring different officers to be selected for each, and in a different manner, as before the change. The reason for the conclusion appears to be on account of other provisions in the Constitution of Colorado, the majority not recognizing the rule invoked without exception in all other jurisdictions, including ours, that Constitutions with amendments must be construed as a whole, and that when two constructions are possible, one of which takes away the meaning of a section, and another giving effect to all the provisions, the latter must prevail. State v. Cochran, 55 Or. 170, 105 Pac. 884; Farrell v. Portland, 52 Or. 582, 98 Pac. 145. In an able and exhaustive dissenting opinion in that case by Mr. Justice Steele, concurred in by Mr. Justice Gunter, it is made clear that a Federal question (such as here presented) was not involved; that the 1902 amendment of Colorado's Constitution was not inconsistent with § 4, art. 4, of the Federal Constitution. After demonstrating that the conclusion announced by the majority "overlooks the fundamental rule in the construction of Constitutions and statutes that a special provision controls the general one, and that both may stand" (People ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Johnson, 34 Colo. 189, 193, 80 Pac. 233, 249), at the close of his opinion (page 193) it is observed: "Wherever the question has been presented, the courts have given effect to the wishes of the people and sustained the power to establish the form of government here provided, as not being in violation of the Federal Constitution, and not in excess of the powers of the people to so provide in their organic law. And it is to be regretted that this court felt in duty bound to undo the work of the charter convention, and to deny the people of this city and county the right to provide for a simple and economical plan of government, as directed by the Constitution." Our holding is that the state may, by constitutional provisions, directly delegate to municipalities any powers which it, through the legislature, could formerly have granted indirectly. All the prerogatives attempted to be exercised by Portland in the construction of the Broadway bridge, formerly could have been granted by the legislature, and the power to provide therefor, having been delegated to the city by amendment to our organic laws, is valid, and the right to exercise such powers will continue until such time as changed by general enactments of the lawmaking department of our state, provision for which may be made by the legislature by general laws, applying alike to all municipalities of that class, or by the people through the initiative, by the enactment of either general or special laws on the subject. Cas. 911; Ex parte Wagner, 21 Okla. 33, 95 Pac. 435; State ex rel. Kansas City v. Field, 99 Mo. 352, 12 S. W. 802; Kansas City v. Marsh Oil Co. 140 Mo. 458, 41 S. W. 943; Kadderly v. Portland, 44 Or. 118, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222; State v. Pacific States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 53 Or. 163, 99 Pac. 427; Straw v. Harris, 54 Or. 424, 103 Pac. 777; McMinnville v. Howne-stine, 56 Or. 451, 109 Pac. 81.

17. In a public address prepared by Hon. Frederick V. Holman, attached to and filed as an appendix to petitioner's brief, it is argued that under our previous holding in Hall v. Dunn, 52 Or. 475, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 193, 97 Pac. 811, and Straw v. Harris, 54 Or. 424, 103 Pac. 777, to the effect that we have but one lawmaking department, composed of two separate and distinct law-making bodies,—(1) the people, acting directly through the initiative; and (2) the people, acting indirectly through the legislature,—either of them in a manner provided by law may undo the work of the other, and necessarily must lead to disastrous results, etc., in that an act passed by the first may, immediately on the convening of the legislature, be repealed, and one enacted by the legislative assembly may also be rescinded through either the initiative or the referendum. But that objection applies only to the question of expediency, with regard to which the lawmakers, and not the courts, are concerned. It might not be inappropriate, however, to observe that the same objection may with equal force apply to all legislative bodies. Our legislature to convene next week can, if it so chooses, repeal all the laws (not included in constitutional amendments) enacted at the recent November election, and also undo the work of the last legislative assembly. Again, two years later or earlier a special session of the legislature might be called, and enact many laws, and the day following its adjournment the newly elected Legislature could be convened and repeal all the laws going into effect the preceding day. The same may also be said of Congress, but this is seldom, if ever, urged as an argument against a representative system, or alluded to as indicating that our government is becoming unrepublican in form. In the appendix mentioned, it is observed that under our system, as interpreted by this court, we have four legislative bodies in place of two: (1) The legislature; (2) the people of the whole state; (3) the people of a municipality; (4) the common council or commissioners. This suggestion, however, overlooks the fact that in the above-cited cases advertence was made only to legal departments of the state, and not to municipal or other minor and quasi legislative bodies. The fallacy of this illustration (like many others to which our attention is directed, and which will not be specifically discussed) is obvious. The observation to the effect that under the interpretation given by this court to the charter amendments cities may invade the domain of state legislation to the extent, if desired, of condemning state property (such as capitol buildings, etc.), has no justification, either in the language of the charter amendments, or in anything said in any opinion of this court in interpreting such amendments. Many of the statements in our former opinions bearing upon points here presented are adverted to as dictum, and like contention is also made respecting our holding in the case at hand, to the effect that it is unnecessary to obtain the consent of the port of Portland before the bridge in question may be constructed. The points decided, determining the status of the port of Portland in the matter, were all forcibly presented in the briefs and at the oral argument, and the effect of the conclusion reached by this court was that, taking either horn of the dilemma, appellant's position is untenable. It cannot, therefore, be said that our views upon either point are dicta, and the same may be remarked of much, if not all, of the numerous like references to previous adjudications by this court (as in Straw v. Harris and other cases) in which the views alluded to as dicta hold adversely to the wishes and contention of the writers of petitioner's brief and the appendix thereto. On what is dicta, and the effect thereof, see Kirby v. Boyette, 118 N. C. 244, 254, 24 S. E. 18; Buchner v. Chicago, M. & N. W. R. Co. 60 Wis. 264, 19 N. W. 56; Kane v. McCown, 55 Mo. 181; Ocean Beach Asso. v. Brinley, 34 N. J. Eq. 438; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, (2d ed.) 165, 171; Florida C. R. Co. v. Schutte, 103 U. S. 118, 143, 26 L. ed. 327, 336. The terms "obiter dicta," "dictum," etc., like the phrase "technicalities of the law," are too often invoked by counsel to express disapprobation of some proposition of law militating against their contention.

Numerous other points are presented upon which the views of this court are requested. Some of them, however, were disposed of in our former opinions herein, to which we still adhere, and those remaining, even though not specifically adverted to, are included in the above considerations. The petition for rehearing is denied.

Writ of error dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, February 19, 1912.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

ALBERT BROWN, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

(— Miss. —, 55 So. 961.)

Evidence — extra-judicial confession of stranger.

An extra-judicial confession not under

Note. — Admissibility in behalf of accused of extra-judicial confession of stranger.

Of course, it is not intended to go exhaustively into the question of the admissibility, in behalf of an accused person, of evidence as to the acts and conduct of a third oath, by a stranger who cannot be produced as a witness, is not admissible at the trial of an indictment for murder.

Same — exclusion — error — cumulation.

It is not error to refuse to permit a witness who has identified accused as one who committed a homicide to be asked on cross-examination if he was not present at the inquest, and if it was not true that no testimony about who did the shooting could be secured there, where it does not appear that the question called for more than cumulative evidence that he had made no disclosure at the inquest as to who did the deed.

(July 31, 1911.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lee County convicting him of manslaughter. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clayton, Mitchell, & Clayton, Boggan & Leake, and C. P. Long for appellant.

Mr. George T. Mitchell for the State.

McWillie, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was indicted for the murder of Alonzo Addison, and, his previous conviction for manslaughter having been reversed (— Miss. —, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 811, 54 So. 305), he was again tried and convicted of the same offense, and from this second conviction the present appeal is prosecuted.

On the second trial the defense offered to prove that Henry Brown, a brother of the accused, who had never been indicted, stated to the sheriff and chancery clerk of the county that his brother had suffered long enough about the matter; that he was the man who slew the deceased; and that his brother was not present and had nothing to do with it in any way; that in pursuance of this confession he was taken in custody by the sheriff, and held a prisoner in the county jail for several months; that his confession and incarceration took place during the pendency of the former appeal herein; that before the reversal of judgment on that appeal, the grand jury having investigated the matter and failed to find an indictment against him, Henry Brown was discharged from custody, and was absent without the procurement of the person for the purpose of fixing the crime upon the latter. And it is but consistent also to forego a discussion of the cases involving threats or declarations of a third person before the commission of the offense, which, point to him as the perpetrator. In other words, it is not purposed to discuss cases like Alexander v. United States, 138 accused and his counsel, and his whereabouts were unknown to him and them, process for him as a witness for the accused having been returned "Not found." On the objection of the state, the court refused to admit the evidence, and its action in so doing is assigned for error.

It is well settled that testimony going to show confessions and admissions on the part of third persons made out of court is not admissible in exculpation of those on trial for crime. It is mere hearsay, and is excluded for this reason, although other reasons doubtless exist in the uncertainty to which it would subject all criminal proceedings. The following authorities clearly support this view: Snow v. State, 54 Ala. 138; Snow v. State, 58 Ala. 372;

West v. State, 76 Ala. 98; Owensby v. State, 82 Ala. 63, 2 So. 764; Welsh v. State, 96 Ala. 92, 11 So. 450; Lyon v. State, 22 Ga. 399; Moughon v. State, 57 Ga. 102; Davis v. Com. 95 Ky. 19, 44 Am. St. Rep. 201, 23 S. W. 585; State v. West, 45 La. Ann. 928, 13 So. 173; State v. Mitchell, 107 La. 618, 31 So. 993; State v. Evans, 55 Mo. 460; State v. Duncan, 116 Mo. 288, 22 S. W. 699; State v. Hack, 118 Mo. 92, 98, 99, 23 S. W. 1089; Greenfield v. People, 85 N. Y. 75, 86, 39 Am. Rep. 636, Id., 23 Hun. 454; State v. White, 68 N. Rep. —, 24 S. W.

U. S. 353, 34 L. ed. 954, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350, holding that on a trial for murder, where it is shown that another person than the prisoner had armed himself, and was hunting for the deceased, under the belief that the latter had eloped with his wife, the threats of such other person against the deceased, and his declarations as to his purpose, are admissible as a part of the res gestæ. For another of numerous cases, which discusses this question rather fully, reference may be had to State v. Beaudet, 63 Conn. 542, 55 Am. Rep. 155, 4 Atl. 237, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 84; and for a case which distinguishes the last one, and reaches a contrary result, it may be of interest to consult State v. Hawley, 63 Conn. 47, 27 Atl. 417.

And this note does not purport to include cases of bastardy suits or proceedings. For a single illustration of these, see Benton v. Starr, 58 Conn. 285, 20 Atl. 450, holding that while one who, in a bastardy suit, is charged with being the father of the child, may be permitted to prove facts which tend to show that another is its father, he cannot introduce evidence of the other's declaration to that effect.

Generally.

While it is true that a person on trial for the commission of a crime may, in exculpation of himself, introduce direct evidence of acts and conduct of another, or of other concrete facts or circumstances, tending to fix the crime upon such other. (Owensby v. State, 82 Ala. 63, 2 So. 764; Jones v. State, 64 Ind. 475; Green v. State, 154 Ind. 655, 57 N. E. 637; Com. v. Chabcock, 1 Mass. 144; State v. Haynes, 71 N. C. 79; *State v. W. 643), the rule laid down by a line of decisions whose unanimity is as complete as the shock which they give the general sense of justice, that evidence of the confession or admission of a stranger that he is the perpetrator of the offense is not admissible as a matter of substantive evidence for the purpose of exculpating the accused, where it is made neither under oath, subject to cross-examination, nor as part of what is indiscriminately denominated the res gestæ. *United States v. Wigmore, in his learned work on Evidence, while admitting that the weight of authority sustains the rule as stated, condemns it as unsound and barbarous. 2 Wigmore, § 1476. In this he finds no support in the other text writers on the subject, nor in the legal encyclopedists, who perhaps had greater deference for the opinions of those learned judges who, daily witnessing the application of the law, refused to sacrifice its wholesome principles to untried theory. Best, Ev. 3d Am. ed. p. 73; 2 Rice, Crim. Ev. p. 130, § 87; Wharton,

Crim. Ev. 9th ed. p. 176, § 225; 12 Cyc. p. 434. The learned author above named criticizes as "curious" and suggesting a "fantastic suspicion," the following language employed by the supreme court of Georgia in the case of Lyon v. State, 22 Ga. 399: "All one defendant would have to do would be to admit that his guilty accomplice was innocent, and that he himself had perpetrated the crime, absent himself so as to enable the party on his trial to have the benefit of his admission, and, after his acquittal, appear, demand his trial, and prove by the evidence of the acquitted party that he was in fact the guilty person."

We are unable to concur in the author's estimate of the above reasoning. It com-

Totten*, 72 Vt. 73, 47 Atl. 105 (robbery); State v. Hunter, 18 Wash. 670, 52 Pac. 247 (assault with intent to commit rape, point indirectly involved). This result, in many cases, is reached by invoking the hearsay rule; and this rule may safely be said to be essentially the basic principle of the decisions which do not expressly invoke it.

The rule against the admission of such confessions is, in North Carolina, held to be especially applicable when the declarations, although consistent with the guilt of the declarant, are not inconsistent with the guilt of the accused. State v. White, 68 N. C. 158; State v. Haynes, 71 N. C. 79; State v. Bishop, 73 N. C. 44, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 594; 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

State v. Baxter, 82 N. C. 602. So in Oddo v. State, 152 Ala. 51, 44 So. 646, the court summarily states that on the trial of one accused of concealing stolen goods, the defendant could not introduce a statement of his wife to a third person, that she, and not the husband, bought and received the property, the court saying that this was wholly immaterial. It is not clear whether the court intended to place this upon the ground that the extra-judicial confession of a stranger is inadmissible in behalf of an accused, or upon the ground that since the defendant was charged with concealing or aiding in concealing, he might still be guilty of the concealment, notwithstanding that his wife bought and received the property.

When declarant jointly indicted with defendant.

One jointly indicted with others cannot, in his separate trial for the offense, prove a conversation between the others when they were alone, inculcating themselves, and exculpating him from all participation in the crime. United States v. Douglass, 2 Blatchf. 207, Fed. Cas. No. 14,989. So, it is held in the state courts that one cannot, upon his separate trial, introduce evidence to show that one jointly indicted with him has confessed or admitted that he, and not the defendant, committed the offense. People v. Hall, 94 Cal. 595, 30 Pac. 7; Lyon v. State, 22 Ga. 399; Kelly v. State, 82 Ga. 441, 9 S. E. 171; Delk v. State, 99 Ga. 667, 26 S. E. 752; Robison v. State, 114 Ga. 445, 40 S. E. 253; Siple v. State, 3 Heisk. 137. And such a confession is not rendered admissible in behalf of the defendant merely because the person jointly indicted with him was tried and convicted before the latter's trial. Siple v. State, 154 Ind. 647, 57 N. E. 544.

Res gestæ.

Where one of a number of persons assembled together is killed by a shot from a revolver, while its owner is, because of his drunken condition, being disarmed by a third person, the owner cannot, upon his trial mends itself to this court as entirely sound, and, in view of the action of the grand jury in discrediting the confession, and refusing to return an indictment against the declarant on the strength of it, we have little doubt that the case in hand itself affords an illustration of such attempts to bring about a miscarriage of justice. The rule excluding such confessions itself suggests the reason why they have not been more frequently resorted to in behalf of the guilty. The confession in question was made out of court, was not supported by the oath of the party confessing, and the party was never subjected to cross-examination, which might very quickly have disclosed the falsity of the confession and the motive that prompted it. The law, in determining what is hearsay, does not admit what a witness states some other person told him, any more than it admits what still another person may have imparted to the one next in the line of communication. It is all hearsay; and no just exception can be made because the party confessing has put himself in a position of some hazard. Many motives, apart from the love of truth and justice, induce men to assume the gravest risks. Among the strongest of these is family affection, and it is observable that in this case the property against which the trespass was directed was that of Henry Brown, and not his brother, the accused, and that in the confession proposed to be proved Henry Brown, while claiming to be the culprit, for the killing of the deceased, introduce testimony of a physician that the person who attempted to disarm the defendant stated to him, the physician, when he came to get the latter to attend the deceased, that he had accidentally shot him. Salby v. Com. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2209, 80 S. W. 221.

But one on trial for killing another during a fight in the dark may, as part of the res gestæ, introduce evidence of a declaration of a bystander made immediately after the fight, that he, the bystander, cut the accused in the back, where it appears that the accused received no such cut, but that the deceased did, and that death may have resulted therefrom. Flanagan v. State, 64 Ga. 52.

Confirmation of direct testimony.

It was stated in Stanley v. State, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 537, 89 S. W. 643, that if other facts in the case had shown, or tended strongly to show, that a third person was placed in a position in which he might have done the shooting, the confession of such third person might have been held admissible.

And it was declared in State v. Fletcher, 24 Or. 295, 33 Pac. 575, that unquestionably it would have been competent to prove that a third party, and not the prisoner, killed the deceased, but that this could have been done only by proof connecting the third person with the fact, that is, with the perpetration of some deed entering into the crime itself; and that after such direct proof had been given, it might be that evidence of a declaration of the third party that he had done the killing would have been competent in confirmation of the direct testimony connecting him with the fact of killing.

In Munshower v. State, 55 Md. 11, 39 Am. Rep. 414, the court referred to the position taken in the dissenting opinion in Smith v. State, 9 Ala. 990, that while it might be true that the confession of a third person of his guilt is not evidence in favor of another when standing alone and unaided by other facts and circumstances, yet that it is so whenever the party confessing is connected with the crime by strong presumptive evidence; and it was stated in the Munshower Case, in effect, that, even assuming the correctness of this doctrine, there was nothing in that case to warrant its application, for the declaration, if ever made, stood alone, the record disclosing no facts or circumstances tending to connect the declarant with the crime.

Impeachment of declarant as witness.

A confession by a stranger even if sworn to, although it may be admissible merely for the purpose of proving that it was made, is not admissible for the purpose of having it accepted as true. State v. Jones, 127 La. 694, 53 So. 959.

Again, it has been declared that such a confession or admission is not admissible for any purpose, unless it be to affect the declarant's credibility as a witness at the trial. McDonald v. State, 165 Ala. 85, 51 So. 629.

Where a witness for the state in a case of homicide has testified that the defendant did the shooting, evidence that she had admitted to another witness that she herself did it is admissible upon proper foundation, for the purpose of impeaching her as a witness, but not as substantive evidence that she in fact was the guilty party. Perdue v. State, 126 Ga. 112, 54 S. E. 820.

In Munshower v. State, supra, it appeared that counsel for the defense asked a witness for the state whether, before the body of the deceased was found, he, the witness, had stated to another that the deceased had been murdered and buried in a certain place, and that his head had been mashed in; and contended that an answer to this question was admissible for the purpose of discrediting the witness, for the reason that, if he had answered the question in the negative, he would have been contradicted and discredited by the impeaching witness, and that, if he had answered it in the affirmative, it would have evidenced the possession of knowledge that the guilty party alone would be likely to have, and this would have discredited him,—admitting, however, that stated that his brother "had suffered long enough about the matter." The extreme case of a confession on the gallows by one claiming to be the true offender, employed by Wigmore to illustrate his view, affords no ground for the relaxation of the rule; for the experience assuring us that the last breath of men not wholly bad is sometimes employed in the asseveration of a falsehood justifies the rejection of the hearsay statements of a malefactor who, having no longer any concern as to his own fate, may wish to serve a pal, a kinsman, or a friend. Even dying declarations, which are restricted to trials where the declarant was the victim of a homicide, although they derive additional solemnity from the fact of approaching death, are admitted really for necessity, and in order to reach those manslayers who perpetrate their crimes when there are no other eye-witnesses.

While the question is one of admissibility of evidence, rather than of its probative force, it might be remarked, as showing the caution with which all confessions are received, that the confession of the accused himself is not admissible in the absence of evidence establishing the corpus delicti. It is worthy of note in this case that, although Henry Brown had been present at the previous trial of his brother, he remained wholly silent as to his authorship of the crime, and that his confession was not made until the state had disclosed all of its evidence and the trial re-on a trial for murder the admissions or declarations of third persons that they killed the deceased are not evidence, but insisting that if such third persons, on being examined as witnesses, implicate the prisoner by their testimony, evidence of their declarations that they were guilty of the offense is admissible to discredit them. The court, however, said: "The witness, in his examination in chief, had made no statement inconsistent with the declaration which the question implied he had made in reference to the manner of Wetsell's death and the place where the body was buried and concealed. If he had answered in the negative, he could not have been contradicted, for it is well settled that no question respecting any matter irrelevant to the issue can be put to a witness on cross-examination, for the mere purpose of impeaching his credit by contradicting him, and if any such question be inadvertently put and answered, the answer of the witness is conclusive. 2 Taylor, Ev. § 292. He was not bound to answer in the affirmative if the declaration would tend to inculpate himself, and if he chose so to answer voluntarily, then to allow the answer would be to permit his own antecedent declarations, when proved by himself as a witness, to go to the jury as evidence to exculpate the prisoner, when it is clear the same declarations could not, for that or any other purpose, be proved by any other witness. To allow the introduction of such testimony would effect a dangerous innovation upon the law of evidence in criminal cases, and open the door to the most fraudulent contrivances to procure the acquittal of parties accused of crime."

And the holding in Blocker v. State, 55 Tex. Crim. Rep. 30, 131 Am. St. Rep. 772, 114 S. W. 814, is indicated by the following language: "Where an accused is being tried for a homicide, it is legitimate and proper to introduce evidence that another party or other parties were in position to have committed the homicide, and motive and other matters of that character are also admissible to show a reason why the others, and not the accused party, committed the homicide. We deem unnecessary here to collate these authorities. There is, however, an unbroken line of decisions in the reports of this court so holding. We are of opinion this testimony was admissible under the circumstances stated. The motive was as strong on the part of Aaron Massey as it was on the part of appellant." The testimony sought to be introduced in this case was that Massey had, after the killing, admitted that he was the guilty person, and it may be that the court intended to hold merely that evidence of such declarations or admissions is admissible when the declarant's motive is shown to be as strong as that of the defendant, and left it to implication that such motive must be established by other evidence.

Effect of declarant's death—generally.

The confession is inadmissible though the confessor be dead. People v. Hall, 94 Cal. 595, 30 Pac. 7.

The exception to the rule against the admission of hearsay evidence, which permits the admission of the declarations against interest of the deceased person, does not, upon the theory that the confession is an admission against interest in that it renders the confessor liable to punishment and destroys his character, apply in criminal cases so as to render a stranger's confession admissible in behalf of one who is charged with committing the crime. United States v. Mulholland, 50 Fed. 415. It is also declared in this case that the fact of the unavailability of the direct testimony of the deceased person finds a parallel in the fact that, by invoking the rule against self-crimination, the confessor, if living, could avoid testifying against himself upon the stand.

And it is declared in State v. West, 45 La. Ann. 14, 12 So. 7, that where a third person makes a direct admission that he killed the deceased, and then escaped, and this declaration was sought to be introduced in evidence through one who heard him make it, it was inadmissible; and that the accidental fact of the declarant's death did not alter the character of the declaration and the testimony in support of it. Subsequent appeal in 45 La. Ann. 928, 13 So. 173.

sulted in a verdict of manslaughter, on which his brother was sentenced to imprisonment for the short term of two years. The hazard he assumed was not, therefore, one of very great gravity, especially as his running away on being released goes strongly to show that, apart from facing a jury in his brother's behalf, he did not intend to incur any decided risk, and was ready to recant his confession as soon as it had served its purpose, or exposed him to any great peril. This much is said in answer to the suggestion that only an imperative sense of guilt could have moved him to brave the great dangers that attended his confession, and as going to show that the

—dying declarations.

In this connection it is to be observed that this note does not include cases on the question as to the admissibility in behalf of the defendant in a homicide trial, of dying declarations of the person killed, that he, and not the accused, was responsible for the difficulty leading to the killing.

A stranger's confession of guilt cannot be admitted as a dying declaration (West v. State, 76 Ala. 98), since such a declaration is admissible only where the death of the declarant is the subject of the charge of homicide on trial, and the circumstances of the death are the subject of the declaration (People v. Hall, 94 Cal. 595, 30 Pac. 7; Mora v. People, 19 Colo. 255, 35 Pac. 179; Davis v. Com. 95 Ky. 19, 44 Am. St. Rep. 201, 23 S. W. 585).

Where it appears that one with whom the accused was fighting at the time of the killing of the deceased by a shot from the revolver of one of the combatants was suspected of having killed the deceased, and that, when an attempt was made to arrest him, he resisted, was wounded, and soon after died, it was held that the accused could not, in exoneration of himself, introduce testimony that the other, before dying, made some admission or declaration which lead to the belief that it was he who had killed the deceased, as such was merely hearsay. State v. West, 45 La. Ann. 14, 12 So. 7. On subsequent appeal in this case, in 45 La. Ann. 928, 13 So. 173, it appeared that at the second trial such testimony was sought to be introduced, but from the brief of counsel it appears that "the object of it was not to prove the truth of the statements made by Baptiste, but to prove the fact of his having made them to show the jury his belief and opinion as to the party who fired the shot that killed Lyall, and consequently to raise and substantiate any doubts in their minds as to the guilt of the defendant." But the court disposed of the matter by merely remarking that the testimony was irrelevant.

Conclusion.

The practical unanimity of the highest state courts of the country in the adoption of a rule of law, while necessarily causing hesitation, should not forbid a statement of the considerations which point to the justice of a contrary view, especially when the rule is characterized by Professor Wigmore as unsound and barbarous. The court in BROWN v. STATE says that Professor Wigmore finds no support in the other text writers on the subject, nor in the legal 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

encyclopedists, "who perhaps have greater deference for the opinions of those learned judges who daily witness the application of the law, and refuse to sacrifice its wholesome principles to untried theory." Most of the decisions, however, dispose of the question with little more than a shake of the head; and if, therefore, the rule is founded in reason, we must look elsewhere than to judicial opinion in order to find the reason.

In this connection it is both interesting and instructive to listen to Professor Wigmore when he says in his great treatise on Evidence (§ 1476) that the extra-judicial confession of a stranger, instead of being excluded by the hearsay rule, should be regarded as embraced within the exception of that rule, permitting the introduction of declarations against interest of persons whose direct testimony is unavailable. He traces the history of this exception, and shows that acceptance was gained for the principle that all declarations of facts against interest (by deceased persons) were to be received, and that from the year 1800 until about 1830, this was fully understood as the broad scope of the principle. "It was," he says, "thus stated without other qualification; and frequent passages show the development of the principle to this point. But in 1844, in a case in the House of Lords, not strongly argued, and not considered by the judges in the light of the precedents, a backward step was taken, and an arbitrary limit put upon the rule [exception]. It was held to exclude the statement of a fact subjecting the declarant to a criminal liability, and to be confined to statements of facts against either pecuniary or proprietary interest." It is pointed out that thenceforward the exception as so limited was accepted in England, although it was plainly a novelty at the time of its inception, and that the same attitude has been taken by the American courts, excluding confessions of a crime or other statements of facts against penal interest, made by third persons. He argues that not only is the limitation unjustifiable on grounds of policy, but that it is inconsistent with the broad language originally employed in stating the reason and principle of the exception, as well as the settled principle upon which confessions are received. He also points out that the decisions in our books show that in almost all of the rulings the declarant was not shown to be deceased or otherwise unavailable as a witness, and therefore the declaration would have been inadmissible in any view of the exception, and that most of the early rulings had in view, not the present exception to the hearsay rule, but the doctrine that supposed harshness of the rule may afford no reason for not adhering to it and excluding hearsay evidence as inadmissible.

It is assigned for error that the court below excluded the following question addressed on cross-examination to Vestor Addison, one of the two eyewitnesses of the the tragedy, and brother to the deceased: "Wasn't there a crowd of men there, B. Harris and several others, that Mr. McNees got together there and told them they would have to hold the inquest, and you were right there, and they couldn't get any testimony about who did the shooting, and found that he came to his death by the admission of one who is not a co-conspirator cannot affect others jointly charged. Professor Wigmore draws the moral by contemplating the spectacle that would have ensued if our courts, bound by "this barbarous doctrine," had heard the trial of Captain Dreyfus, and had refused, as they would have refused, to admit what the French court never for a moment hesitated to admit,—the authenticated confession of the escaped Major Esterhazy avowing himself the guilty author of the treason there charged.

The purpose of all evidence is to get at the truth. The reason for the hearsay rule is that the extra-judicial and unsworn statement of another is not the best method of serving this purpose. In other words, the great possibility of the fabrication of falsehoods, and the inability to prove their untruth, requires that the doors be closed to such evidence. So long therefore as a declarant is available as a witness, his extra-judicial statement should not be heard. Where, however, the declarant is dead or has disappeared, his previous statements out of court, if not inadmissible on other grounds, are the best evidence. But they are not rendered admissible by the mere fact that the declarant is unavailable,—something else is necessary. One fact which will satisfy this necessity is that the declaration is or was against the declarant's interest, and this is because no sane person will be presumed to tell a falsehood to his own detriment.

From what has been said, especially with respect to the essential fact that the hearsay rule is founded upon the desire to prevent perjury with impunity, it follows that the limitation which so circumscribes the exception to the hearsay rule, which admits declarations against interest, as to exclude all admissions which are against "penal" interest, is tantamount to a declaration that, while a man who makes an admission against his pecuniary or proprietary interest will be presumed to tell the truth, he will be presumed a liar when his statement is against his penal interest. It is going far to say that, whereas mankind holds property in such high regard that any of its statements to the detriment of its title and interest therein will be taken as true, the average individual takes such little thought of liberty, life, and soul, that he will slander and falsely condemn them for the purpose of exonerating another who, by the same token, has no greater solicitude for his own liberty, life, or soul; and this is especially unjustifiable in the light of the common knowledge that the individual, instead of having a higher regard for property than for life and liberty, will, when accused of crime, exhaust his entire material wealth to secure liberty, life, and vindication.

The point might also be made, although it is to be admitted that there is some ground of distinction, that, while the confession would be admitted against the declarant himself, and for the purpose of sending him to the gallows, it is held inadmissible for the purpose of exculpating another. The reason why it is admitted against the declarant upon his trial is not, of course, the theory that if he was indiscreet enough to make the statement, he should suffer the consequences, but upon the ground that, having been made to his own detriment, it is presumed to be the truth. But the query occurs, Why should the presumption as to its truth diminish when the declaration is sought to be admitted in favor of another? Certainly this is not straining the quality of mercy.

Again, if, as seems indisputable, the desire to close the door to falsehood which cannot be detected dictates the exclusion of such testimony, the question as to the effect to be given to such a confession is solely one of weight and credibility. This being so, why not leave it to the jury to say in each instance whether a confession is false or true, rather than make an ironclad rule which excludes all confessions, when it must be known that in the nature of things, by the laws of chance or otherwise, some of them must be true? This would but accord to the jury the right to exercise the function which is its peculiar province, and would also help to justify the belief that there is something besides mere verbiage in the maxim, "Better that ninety-nine guilty should escape, than that one innocent person should suffer."

In this connection there comes to mind the recent case of the unfortunate Pittsburg man who, after serving many years of a sentence imposed upon him for homicide, was pardoned upon the confession of another that he did the killing. The truth of that confession, and the innocence of the unfortunate prisoner, seems to have been admitted and unquestioned, and, as stated, was the basis of the governor's pardon; yet the fact remains that if the confession had been made before the trial of the prisoner, it would not—at least unless taken under a commission or other legal sanction—have been admissible in behalf of the accused, because of the doctrine which the court in BROWN v. STATE denominates "wholesome."

an unknown hand?" The purpose of this question was, of course, to discredit the witness, who had identified the accused as the slayer when seen by moonlight only a few feet distant. The witness had already testified that he paid no attention to the inquest, and it will be observed that the question involves no inquiry as to whether he testified differently, or at all, at the inquest, or was called on to testify at the same, and refused or evaded doing so, but merely that his attitude on the night of the killing was a negative one as to the identification of the accused. While he contradicted the several witnesses who testified that he in terms denied on the night of the killing that he was aware of the identity of the slayer, it was unquestionable on the evidence that he did not that night reveal who had committed the crime, unless he informed the deputy sheriff, who arrested the accused on the same night. This deputy, after he had testified that he made the arrest, was asked by the prosecution what conversation he had with the witness Vestor Addison on that night, when the court excluded the question on the objection of the defense, and the case went to the jury as if the accused had made no revelation that night as to the identity of the slayer. As thus viewed, the question in relation to the inquest could have evoked no other evidence favorable to the accused than such as would have been at most merely cumulative, and its exclusion does not constitute reversible error.

The general principle governing the decisions in the cases under annotation is well stated in 20 Cyc. 274, where it is said in substance that the signing required by the statute is a signature to the writing placed there with the intention of authenticating the writing, and that, if placed with this intention, it may occur at the beginning, in the body, or in the place designated for the witnesses' signatures, except in certain

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sebastian County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged failure of defendant to fill a contract order for goods given by plaintiff to defendant's salesman. Affirmed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

The appellant sued appellee on an alleged contract for the sale of onion sets, as follows: "Contract for onion sets between Vaughan's Seed Store, of the city of Chicago, state of Illinois, party of the first part, and Arthur G. Lee, of the city of Ft. Smith state of Arkansas, party of the second part. Said party of the first part sells said party of the second part the following amount of onion sets for delivery Jan. '08." Then follows description of the onion sets, and the terms of sale and shipment are set forth. The alleged contract is signed by appellant, and bears date April 8, 1907. It is made subject to certain (quoting) "terms and conditions on the back thereof, which are hereby agreed to." Among other recitals on the back is the following: "It is further agreed that the said Vaughan's Seed Store will care for this stock, keep it in the same warehouse, jurisdictions where the statute requires the memorandum to be subscribed.

The cases to which the above rule most clearly applies are those in which a rubber stamp or typewriter was used in affixing the name. Thus, in Landeker v. Co-operative Bldg. Bank, 71 Misc. 517, 130 N. Y. Supp. 780, it was held that stamping one's name with a rubber stamp or typewriter at the end of a contract for the sale of goods is subscribing it, within the meaning of the statute of frauds. And in Degginger v. Martin, 48 Wash. 1, 92 Pac. 674, it was and give it the same attention and care that they give any unsold portion of their own crop." Appellant alleged an offer to accept and comply with the terms of the contract on his part, and a refusal on the part of the appellee to comply with the contracts on its part, to the damage of appellant in the sum of $642. The amended answer specifically denies every allegation in the complaint except that appellee is a corporation; then alleges that the appellant gave to H. Cheeseman, a traveling salesman, an order for a car of onion sets, to be submitted to appellee for acceptance or rejection; that appellee refused to accept the order, and at once notified appellant of such refusal. The answer also alleges that the appellee made no contract with appellant for the sale of such onion sets, and that said H. Cheeseman made no contract with appellant in appellee's behalf; and that the said Cheeseman had no authority to make sale of onion sets. Then the answer sets up a custom of the trade to the effect that all such orders must be, and are, taken subject to confirmation, and that appellant knew of the custom. The last paragraph of the answer sets up the statute of frauds in bar of the action, for the reason there was no memorandum or contract of sale signed by the party to be charged. The appellant testified to the execution of the alleged contract. His testimony shows that one Cheeseman was the agent of appellee in the territory where Ft. Smith is located, and that he made the held that a broker's contract for the sale of lands was sufficiently signed under the statute of frauds where the firm name under which the broker did business was typewritten and followed by his written initials. See also the obiter statement in Bennett v. Brumfitt, 37 L. J. C. P. N. S. 25, L. R. 3 C. P. 28, 17 L. T. N. S. 213, 16 Week. Rep. 131, Hopw. & P. 407, to the effect that the usual signature of a person engraved upon a stamp, and impressed by himself on the instrument, would be sufficient under the statute of frauds. And see Deep River Nat. Bank's Appeal, 73 Conn. 341, 47 Atl. 675, wherein a letter dictated to a stenographer, typewritten by the latter, and signed with the name of the dictator by means of a rubber stamp furnished by him for that purpose, was held to be a writing signed by the dictator within a statute of limitations requiring acknowledgments of new or continuing contracts to be in "writing made or signed by the party to be charged thereby."

The question has also arisen in connection with the use of printed letter heads, and the same rule has been universally applied. Thus, in Drury v. Young, 58 Md. 546, 42 Am. Rep. 343, where the rule that the place of the signature is immaterial is in force, the court held that a printed letter head, followed by the memorandum of sale, was sufficiently signed, it being said that the name might be printed provided it is recognized and appropriated as his by the party. And in Tourrett v. Cripps, 48 L. J. Ch. N. S. 567, 27 Week. Rep. 706, it was held that a letter not signed in writing by the sender, but written on paper with his name and address printed at the top in such a way as to show that the sender recognized it as his own name, was sufficiently signed within the statute of frauds, to be binding on the sender. So, in Saunderson v. Jackson, 2 Bos. & P. 238, 3 Esp. 180, 5 Revised Rep. 382, it was said that where a trader is in the habit of using printed bills to which his name is prefixed, such a bill given to a vendee at the time of an order for future delivery is a good contract, within the statute of frauds. In connection with the foregoing cases, see also Anderson v. Wallace 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Lumber & Mfg. Co. and Huckleby v. Hook, as set out infra.

The cases which present the question whether or not the entering of a memorandum of a sale in an order book in which, or upon which, the owner's name is printed, is a sufficient signing of the contract, also apply the rule stated. Thus, in Jones Bros. v. Joyner, 82 L. T. N. S. 768, it was held that a memorandum sufficient to bind the seller was shown where it appeared that a memorandum of sale was entered in his order book, and signed by the vendee, although the name of the seller did not appear in the memorandum, but was stamped on the leather cover into which the paper memorandum book was slipped. In the lower court it was held that such printed name was not a sufficient signing, it being said that it was evidently printed on the case for the purpose of identification of ownership, but the court refused to follow this line of reasoning which would have brought the case within the rule announced in Nasmith v. Alexander Brown Mill. & Elevator Co. 9 Ont. L. Rep. 21, 4 Ont. Week. Rep. 451, where, in holding that an order entered in defendant's contract book, on the fly leaf of which the defendant company's name had been stamped some years previously for the purpose of marking the time when a new proprietorship began, was not, because of such stamped signature, sufficiently signed under the statute of frauds, the court said: "The essence of signature, whether made by writing or stamp or print, must be to authenticate or identify the contract by the party to be charged. The cases all show that the signature must be substantially contemporaneous in the case of connected documents, and it will not do to import into the particular transaction a name previously written—as here, years before—with a totally different intent. There may be, of course, recognition by subsequent signation of a bygone contract, or perhaps an anticipatory signature of a subsequent contract,—but nothing such is proved here."

Other instances in which the rule has been applied also support the rule stated. Thus, alleged contract on behalf of appellee with the appellant. The handwriting in the body of the instrument, except the last sentence, was that of Cheeseman. Appellant wrote the last sentence, to wit, "to be shipped when ordered out during January." The alleged contract was signed by appellant, and the name of appellee was printed in capital letters in the body of the contract, but was not written or printed at the bottom of the contract where the signature of appellant appears. Nor was the name of appellee written anywhere in the instrument by the agent of appellee. On April 16th appellee wrote appellant as follows: "We regret that we are unable to take care of your contract order for onion sets given our Mr. Cheeseman, as we seem to be pretty well booked up on the varieties in question."

After this a correspondence followed between appellant and appellee, in which it appears that appellant insisted that he had a contract with appellee for the delivery of the onion sets, and appellee on the other hand claimed that it had not booked appellant's order, and therefore had not approved or accepted same, and had not entered into a contract for the sale and delivery of the onion sets. Appellee also claimed in its letters that the agent taking the order had no authority to bind appellee to approve and accept same; that the order so taken was, according to the custom of appellee and the usual custom of the trade, subject to its approval before it became a binding contract, and that it had never been accepted and approved, but on the contrary had been expressly rejected by appellee's letter in which it stated that it was "unable to take care of your" (appellant's) "contract order for onion sets." Appellant testified to the difference between the price of onion sets under the alleged contract and the market price, his evidence tending to show that he was entitled to recover, should the alleged contract be upheld, in the sum of $710. He asked the court to direct a verdict for him in that sum but the court directed a verdict instead in favor of appellee, and appellant excepted and duly prosecutes this appeal.

Messrs. Read & McDonough, for appellant:

The contract was signed by both parties within the meaning of the law.

20 Cyc. 274; Clark, Contr. 125; Hall v. Misenheimer, 137 N. C. 183, 107 Am. St.

in Schneider v. Norris, 2 Maule & S. 286, in holding a bill of sale in which the name of the vendor was printed and that of the vendee written by the vendor, a sufficient memorandum within the statute of frauds as against the vendor, Lord Ellenborough said: "I cannot but think that a construction which went the length of holding that in no case a printing, or any other form of signature, could be substituted in lieu of writing, would be going a great way, considering how many instances may occur in which the parties contracting are unable to sign. If, indeed, this case had rested merely on the printed name, unrecognized by, and not brought home to, the party as having been printed by him or by his authority, so that the printed name had been unappropriated to the particular contract, it might have offered some doubt whether it would not be intrenching upon the statute to have admitted it. But here there is a signing by the party to be charged by words recognizing the printed name as much as if he had subscribed his mark to it, which is strictly the meaning or signing, and by that the party has incorporated and avowed the thing printed to be his; and it is the same in substance as if he had written Norris & Company with his own hand. He has by his handwriting in effect said, 'I acknowledge what I have written to be for the purpose of exhibiting my recognition of the within contract.'" requiring a contract of insurance to be in writing and signed by the insurer or on its behalf, a paper insuring a person, which commenced with the name of the insurance company and its general agent, was held sufficiently signed by the insurance company, where the paper was executed and delivered as and for a written contract of insurance, and was so received by the insured and premiums paid thereon, the court citing as authority Browne, Statute of Frauds, § 356, to the effect that a printed signature answers the requirements of the statute of frauds if there be sufficient evidence of its adoption as such by the party sought to be charged.

And in Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Meuth, 145 Ky. 160, 140 S. W. 157, under a statute requiring contracts to be in writing and subscribed at the end, it was held that when the president of an insurance company signed his name in his own hand, on the face of an insurance policy on the back of which his name was printed at the close of a list of privileges, he made the whole policy the contract of the company, under the rule that a printed signature is sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds where the paper is delivered under circumstances showing an intention to regard the printed name as the person's own. But in Vielie v. Osgood, 8 Barb. 130, it was held that printed signatures are not subscribed within the meaning of the statute providing that a contract of sale must be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, it being said that the word "subscribed" means an actual manual signing in writing. And in Zachrisson v. Poppe, 3 Bosw. 171, it was held that the printed signature of a broker authorized to sell, on a bill of sale, was not a sufficient signing within the statute of frauds. The ground upon which this decision was based are not stated, the opinion merely stating the conclusion. In connection with the two last cases, it should be noted that the true interpretation of the word "subscribed" is an actual manual subscription at the end of an instrument, and it would seem that that rule could be applied by using a rubber stamp or typewriter, and in fact it has been so held. See Landecker v. Co-operative Bldg. Bank, as set out supra.

And in Boardman v. Spooner, 13 Allen, 353, 90 Am. Dec. 196, the rule that the name, if not written, must be adopted, in order to comply with the statute, was adhered to in holding that a memorandum in writing signed by the party to be charged is not established by the mere stamping of the purchaser's name and the date on the bill of goods and order of delivery, at some time while the papers were in his possession, in the absence of evidence as to when or for what purpose it was done, on the ground that there was no showing that they adopted such a stamp as a signature or affixed it to the instrument with the intent to bind themselves thereby. And the same is true of Ferguson v. Trovaten, 94 Minn. 209, 102 N. W. 373, wherein it was held that the printed signature of the authorized agent of the vendor, appearing in a writing claimed to be a valid contract for the sale of land, did not constitute a subscribing or signing of the contract, within the meaning of the statute of frauds, where it was obvious from a mere inspection of the instrument that the name of the agent printed thereon was intended only for the purpose of authenticating certain printed instructions and conditions. And this rule was assumed in Anderson v. Wallace Lumber & Mfg. Co. 30 Wash. 147, 70 Pac. 247, where it was held that the using of a printed letter head, together with the writing of the party's name in the body of the instrument by his agent, was a sufficient compliance with the statute of frauds. See also Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Co. v. Chesterfield Coal Co. 87 C. C. A. 636, 160 Fed. 832, wherein a writing purporting to be a contract between two corporations was held not so signed as to avoid the statute of frauds, where the name was merely typewritten at the end, without authority, with an unfilled blank following it for the signature of the officer who should execute it.

And the principle that a printed name, to be effective, must be ratified or adopted, was recognized in Huckleby v. Hook, 82 L. T. N. S. 117, wherein it was held that an offer to purchase land written by the vendee on a letter head containing the printed name and address of the vendor, but not otherwise signed by him, is not sufficient within the statute of frauds, unless written at his dictation or adopted by him.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Section 3656 of Kirby's Digest provides: "No contract for the sale of goods, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.)

wares, and merchandise for the price of $30 or upward, shall be binding on the parties, unless, first, there be some note or memorandum signed by the party to be charged." Under the above section, in order to bind appellee to the alleged contract, it must appear that same was signed by appellee. "The party to be charged" is the one against whom the contract is sought to be enforced. 20 Cyc. 272, and note. See also Vance v. Newman, 72 Ark. 359, 105 Am. St. Rep. 42, 80 S. W. 574; Century Dig. p. 2286, § 244, where cases are collected; Browne, Stat. Fr. § 365.

Does the printed name of appellee in the body and on the back of the instrument constitute a signature within the meaning of the above statute? Browne on the Statute of Frauds says: "In regard to the place of the signature, there is no restriction. It may be at the top or in the body, of the memorandum, as well as at the foot. . . . But the name, besides being in his handwriting, must always be inserted in such a manner as to authenticate the instrument as the act of the party executing it, or in other words, to show the intention of the party to admit his liability upon the contract. The mere insertion of his name in the body of an instrument, where it is applicable to a particular purpose, will not constitute a signature, within the meaning of the statute, and although it be so inserted as to control and direct the entire instrument, still the better opinion seems to be that its insertion must also be intended as a final signature, and that, if it appear that the instrument was to be further executed, it will not be taken to have already been sufficiently signed." Browne, Stat. Fr. § 357.

The agent of appellee was furnished with a form of contract containing blanks to be filled and with the name of appellee printed in the body and on the back thereof. The agent when he took the order for goods filled in the blanks, but he did not sign the name of appellee to the instrument and did not write it in the alleged contract. The letters of appellee to appellant written after the instrument was signed by appellant (but introduced by appellant himself) indicate that appellee's agent who took the order had no authority to sign appellee's name to the alleged contract. His authority, according to these letters, was only to solicit orders and submit them for consideration and confirmation of appellee at its home office. But even if it could be assumed that the sales agent had authority to sign appellee's name, it does not appear that he did so.

"A signature consists both of the act of writing the party's name and of the intention of thereby finally authenticating the instrument." Greenl. Ev. § 674, quoted in Vines v. Clingfost, 21 Ark. 312, and in Seventh Street Colored M. E. Church v. Campbell, 48 La. Ann. 1546, 21 So. 184; Davis v. Sanders 40 S. C. 510, 19 S. E. 138; Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 466; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1065.

A name merely printed in an instrument where, according to its purport, the name should be mentioned in the recitals, is not a signature, within the meaning of the statute of frauds. See Evans v. Ashley, 8 Mo. 181. There must be a writing, stamping, or printing of the name by the party to be charged, in person or through a duly authorized agent, with the intention of authenticating and finally adopting the writing as his own. There is no proof to that effect in this record. We conclude therefore that the name of appellee printed in the instrument under consideration did not constitute a signing thereof, within the meaning of the statute of frauds.

Whether or not the letters of appellee to appellant, after the order of April 8th was taken, and with reference thereto, amounted to a signature authenticating the terms of the memorandum as a contract on the part of appellee within the statute, was a proper question for the court. In the first letter of April 16th appellee informed appellant that it was "unable to take care of his contract order" for onion sets. In this letter, appellee plainly told appellant that it could not fill his order. The designation of the instrument as "your contract order" meant no more than that it was a contract on the part of appellant when accepted by appellee, but informing him in the same letter that it could not accept it. In Capital City Brick Co. v. Atlanta Ice & Coal Co. 5 Ga. App. 436, 63 S. E. 562, it is held that a letter is sufficient to take the agreement out of the statute if it acknowledges the existence of the contract, even though the same letter attempts to repudiate the contract. But the letter of April 16th cannot be considered as anything more than information to appellant that appellee had received his order, but could not accept and fill same. The subsequent letters but emphasize the fact that appellee did not recognize the order as a contract on its part, and that, according to the custom of the trade, it would not become a contract until confirmed or adopted by it, which it had not done and would not do. We are of the opinion that the above is the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the letters of appellee which we have carefully examined. No useful purpose could be attained by setting them out in detail. The letters show that the agent of appellee was but a traveling salesman or drummer, and that he had no authority beyond that of the ordinary drummer, to solicit orders for the sale of goods to be sent to his principal for the latter's acceptance or rejection.

The appellant testified that Cheeseman represented appellee in the Ft. Smith territory, but he does not pretend to state the extent of his authority. Appellant does, however, introduce the letters of appellee which, as we have stated, show that the extent of his authority was that only of a commercial traveler or drummer. As a general rule a commercial traveler or drummer has no authority except that of soliciting orders for the sale of goods. Ex parte Taylor, 58 Miss. 478, 38 Am. Rep. 336. "In the absence of special authority to bind his principal, the drummer can merely solicit and transmit the order, and the contract of sale does not become complete until the order is accepted by his principal." 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 227, and note.

If any special authority existed beyond that of soliciting orders, the burden was on appellant to show it. Holland v. Van Beil, 89 Ga. 223, 15 S. E. 302; Kornemann v. Monaghan, 24 Mich. 36; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, § 224.

The judgment is correct, and is affirmed.

traveled path of the highway, see the note to James v. Wellston Twp. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1236.

For cases on the right of abutting owner to join his land to street by driveway or walk, see the note to Goodfellow Tire Co. v. Hurlbut, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1074.

The cases in general support the statement in Morgan v. Hallowell, 57 Me. 375, where the court said: "It is well settled that even though there be a defect or obstruction within the limits of the highway as located, if it is not in the traveled part of the road, nor so connected with it as to affect the safety or convenience of those using the traveled path, the town is not responsible for an injury sustained by one using the road for the purpose of passing to or from a private way, or his own land." In this case, however, the plaintiff was injured without the street limits, while going to a circus.

Where a coach containing the plaintiff passed from the railroad station, along the railroad's private road, to the highway of the defendant town, and in turning into the highway struck a stone and the plaintiff was injured, the court approved the following instruction: "If the stone alleged to have caused the accident was not a defect or want of repair in the highway, and was an obstacle and unsafe to those only passing from the private way into the highway, the private way not being so made as to admit of safe and convenient turn and entrance upon the highway, and if, in consequence of the private way being so made, the coach was upset by the stone, the defendants were not liable; if, however, the stone made the highway unsafe, and caused the injury alleged, the driver exercising ordinary care and prudence, the defendants were liable." The court said: "We think, upon the facts stated in the present case, the instructions of the court of common pleas were right, and that the defendants were not liable for an injury sustained by a traveler passing from the highway to the way leading to the railroad station, by an obstruction which furnished no ground of complaint against the 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

town in reference to the public travel on the highway." Smith v. Wendell, 7 Cush. 498.

In Shepardson v. Colerain, 13 Met. 55, where the plaintiff, knowing at the time of going out that a section of the highway, known as the lane road, was impassable from snow, in returning home, while on a highway intersecting the lane road, turned to pass over a private way of his own and thus avoid the snow in the lane road, and while still in the highway, but outside the traveled part of it, suffered an injury, not from the snow but through a difference in grade between the traveled and untraveled parts, it was held that he could not recover from the town. The court said: "The traveler does not leave the ordinary route appropriated for travelers, for the purpose of entering upon a private way. But in the case at bar, there was no such newly appropriated way without the limits of the made way used by the public, for the purpose of continuing their travel upon a public way. The plaintiff left the wrought road, not for the purpose of finding a better road upon the public way, or with a view of continuing to travel upon the highway; but he designedly left the wrought road for the purpose of continuing his travel upon his private way over his own land. This he might do; but at his peril if injured thereby, he fully knowing the obstruction upon the lane road before entering upon his journey."

In Goodin v. Des Moines, 55 Iowa, 67, 7 N. W. 411, where there had been for a considerable time a path leading from a sidewalk across a lot to a church, and the city had lowered the grade of the sidewalk, thus cutting off the use of the path, and plaintiff coming at night from the church, not knowing of the change, stepped into the street and was injured, the court in affirming a judgment for the defendant city said: "The city has full and complete control of the streets, and may excavate or fill up the same at its pleasure, but in doing so it cannot encroach on private property for the purpose of erecting barriers, or any other purpose; nor is it bound to provide

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's position, as we understand it, may be stated thus: The uncovered ditch which the defendant maintains by the side of the highway renders the approach from the highway to the adjoining landowner's premises dangerous and unreasonably inconvenient, and as to the landowner constitutes a private nuisance. The plaintiff at the time of his injury was the landowner's licensee for the purpose of traveling upon his private way. From these premises he deduces the conclusion that in the right of the owner he is entitled to maintain this action for the recovery of the damages he suffered from the alleged nuisance. He argues that, if the owner of the abutting land could recover damages caused by the uncovered ditch, he has the same right under his license from the owner. But the fallacy of the argument consists in the assumption that his license to travel over the owner's private way gave him the rights of an owner of the land with respect to nuisances maintained upon adjoining land.

Under the law of this state, the ownership of land does not include the right to an unreasonable use of it which deprives an adjoining owner of the reasonable enjoyment of his land. The rights of adjoining proprietors of land are reciprocal and are determinable by the doctrine of reasonable user. "The doctrines of reasonable necessity, reasonable care, and reasonable use prevail in this state in a liberal form, on a a safe, or any way by which the streets may be entered from private property. The citizen or traveler must get into the public ways of a city as best he can. Inasmuch as the plaintiff fell from private property into the street and was thereby injured, she cannot recover, and the jury were properly instructed to find for the defendant."

In McCarthy v. Oshawa, 19 U. C. Q. B. 245, where the plaintiff had placed a plank over a ditch to get from his premises into the street, and fell from it, it was held that the village was not responsible, as it was only responsible for street crossings.

In Philbrick v. Pittston, 63 Me. 477, where the plaintiff fell through planks, covering a gutter outside of the traveled way, used to give access to a private way or court leading to three or four houses standing south of the street, the access to the street from the plaintiff's house not being over these planks, but the nearest way from his garden down the street leading over them, the court said: "If towns were legally responsible for injuries received by persons going to and from the highways over the crazy and neglected platforms that lead across the gutters to their own or their neighbor's premises, because those structures have been suffered to exist within the located limits of the highway, it would be likely to add a somewhat important item to their liabilities. But such is not the law. It is no part of the duty of towns to provide a safe and convenient access to any man's house lot or garden in a country village from the street, and when a man avails himself of such conveniences as the abutters have seen fit to furnish in order to pass to or from the wrought and traveled part of the street, he cannot be accounted a traveler for whose security the town is bound to make the way safe and convenient."

In Brown v. Skowhegan, 82 Me. 273, 19 Atl. 399, where one engaged in teaching an evening singing school in a district schoolhouse in the defendant town, returning one night from the schoolhouse to the road, fell into a ditch which extended throughout the entire front of the schoolhouse, within the limits of the highway, although not in the traveled part of the road, and open save at one place where there were rocks on which the scholars were accustomed to cross, it was held that the town was not liable under the statute which provided that: highways, etc., shall be opened and kept in repair so as to make it convenient for travelers. The court referred to Philbrick v. Pittston, supra, as holding that it was no part of the duty of towns to provide safe and convenient access to their streets from any man's house or lot, and said: "We think the principle thus declared applies as well to schoolhouse and lots. The fact that these are in the nature of public buildings and places cannot change the principle. Those charged with the care of such buildings and places must care for the approaches. The fact that part of such approaches is within the limits of the location of the highway does not put their care upon the town. Those frequenting such places must use the approaches thus provided, or make their own way. They are not upon the risk of the town, until they have reached that part of the road prepared for travelers, and thus become travelers. The duty of the town is only to travelers upon its roads, not to those approaching or leaving its roads. The plaintiff must prove, as indeed he has alleged, that he was traveling upon the road. . . . As was said in Philbrick v. Pittston, supra: 'He (at the time of the accident) had not reached that part of the street which was appropriated to public travel or prepared by the town for that purpose.' Hence, he was not, when hurt, a traveler, and so cannot recover."

In Leslie v. Lewiston, 62 Me. 468, where the plaintiff while going from an outhouse on her father's premises to the house, supposing she had reached the end of a drain reaching from the premises into the highway, fell into the drain upon the highway, it was held that she could not recover, not only because the defect in the way was due to the neglect of her father, but also because she was not a traveler upon the highway.

The court said: "It appears that the broad basis of general principle." Haley v. Colcord, 59 N. H. 7, 8, 47 Am. Rep. 176; Davis v. Whitney, 68 N. H. 66, 44 Atl. 78; Ladd v. Granite State Brick Co. 68 N. H. 185, 37 Atl. 1041; Franklin v. Durgee, 71 N. H. 186, 58 L.R.A. 112, 51 Atl. 911; Horan v. Byrnes, 72 N. H. 93, 62 L.R.A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 670, 54 Atl. 945; Hamlin v. Blankenberg, 73 N. H. 258, 60 Atl. 1010; Moore v. Berlin Mills Co. 74 N. H. 305, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 284, 124 Am. St. Rep. 968, 67 Atl. 578, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 217.

And this principle is as applicable to towns in their qualified ownership and control of highways as to individuals. O'Brien v. Derry, 73 N. H. 198, 204, 60 Atl. 843. If the defendant town in leaving the ditch uncovered, over which the adjoining owner must pass in order to go to and from his land, made an unreasonable use of the highway in view of the owner's reasonable occupation and enjoyment of his land, it may be guilty of maintaining a nuisance as to him. It might be said that its use of the highway in this particular was not justifiable, and that it ought to respond in damages to the landowner for any injury he is thereby compelled to suffer in the proper use and enjoyment of his property.

If it is assumed that this is a correct statement of the liability of the defendant to the one in possession of the adjoining land, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that there is a similar liability on the part of the town to a bare licensee of the owner, who has no legal interest in the only occasion the plaintiff had for passing into the street was to go around the drain, instead of crossing it. She had not reached, and had no purpose of reaching, the traveled part of the street. She was not using it as a highway, and had no intention of so doing. It was not as a part of the street, even, but as a curtilage of the house. She had appropriated it as a convenience for domestic purposes, as an appurtenant to the house in which she was residing. She was not, therefore, a traveler, in any such sense as is contemplated by the statute providing for the recovery of damages arising from defects in streets or highways."

It will be observed that in ELLIOTT v. MASON, the court, at the end of its opinion, suggests that a recovery could not be had on the ground of negligence as to the ditch, citing Drew v. Bow, 74 N. H. 147, 65 Atl. 831 in which case it was held that the ordinary ditch or gutter by the side of a highway was not a "sluiceway" within the New Hampshire statute making towns liable for defects in "sluiceways" on highways.

Warning those coming from private property of dangerous condition of street.

Where the plaintiff, walking outside of the street limits, on what he claimed was an old path, fell into the street which was being excavated, it was held that the District of Columbia was not required to warn those coming from private property, against the condition of the street which was then being constructed. Young v. District of Columbia, 3 MacArth. 137.

In Mulvane v. South Topeka, 45 Kan. 45, 23 Am. St. Rep. 706, 25 Pac. 217, where the plaintiff claimed that the defendant city had failed to place danger signals at a point where a well-traveled way, which had been used, as he contended, for more than fifteen years by the traveling public,—although not a regularly laid-out road,—intersected a street of such city which had been excavated a distance of some 4 or 5 feet below the surface across such traveled way, and that he, in driving over such way to the city street, was precipitated into the excavation and injured, it was held that he could not recover. The court said: "There was no obligation resting upon the city to provide a way over private property to its public streets and avenues, and the fact that the ground over which the plaintiff passed had been used by the public for a number of years would not cast upon the city any duty to erect barriers or place danger signals upon such ground, unless the city had full and complete control over the same, as a part of the public streets of the city. There was nothing to indicate that this ground had ever been dedicated to the public, in such a way as to render the city liable, or give the plaintiff any right to use it as a traveled way. It is not the duty of a city to provide means of access from private property to its streets, nor is it liable for a failure to guard its streets from approach, at points where such approach is dangerous."

But in Burnham v. Boston, 10 Allen, 290, where the plaintiff was injured while driving from private lots much used as passways by the public into a public street, the court said: "Nor can it be maintained that a city or town would in all cases fulfill the duty incumbent on it by law by merely placing barriers across a street or way to protect travelers from injury by an existing defect or want of repair, without adopting any measures to guard against accident to those who might have occasion lawfully to come on the dangerous portion of the way from private lands adjoining and lying within the limits, which were closed against travelers approaching in other directions. Doubtless in many cases it would be a proper exercise of due and reasonable care to place a single barrier across a way or street which was defective and dangerous, sufficient to stop persons from passing over it by the usually traveled path. Such a precaution, for example, would be an adequate protection against accident on a highway in the country, which was not wrought for travel throughout its entire limits, or in places where the adjoining lands were so fenced by the owners, or land, and who is not therefore deprived of any enjoyment of the rights of its use and occupancy, as the owner may be, or as a tenant might be. A merely temporary, transient occupation by a licensee or a visitor does not invest him with a legal interest in the land. The license "does not convey any right or estate in the land, and amounts to nothing more than an excuse for an act which would otherwise be a trespass." Blaisdell v. Portsmouth, G. F. & C. R. Co. 51 N. H. 483.

Though the question thus presented is somewhat novel, it has claimed the attention of the courts in a few cases. In Ellis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 63 Mo. 131, 21 Am. Rep. 436, it appeared that the defendant, by one of its locomotives, ran onto and killed a horse near the house occupied by the plaintiff's husband and his family, and left the dead animal there, which soon created a nauseating stench and made the plaintiff sick. Her action was brought to recover damages for her physical suffering caused by the nuisance. But she failed in her suit, for the reason that she was not in the possession of the premises occupied by the family. The court say that the defendant "was guilty of a private nuisance, for which it rendered itself liable to an action by the person in possession of the house. The right of action in this case was in the husband of plaintiff, he being the occupier and in the rightful possession of the house, with his family, by contract with the owner of the natural obstacles were so interposed, that access to the way laterally was either unusual or difficult. But a very different standard of diligence would be applicable where a way or street was within the limits of a populous city or town, and was prepared for travel and actually used in every part, and to which constant access was had from private ways over lands of adjacent proprietors, entering it at the side. . . . If it was known to the defendants that a large amount of public travel came from these lots and entered Athens street laterally, so that, after coming within the limits of the street, a person using due care was exposed to the risk of accident in consequence of such defect, then it was incumbent on them to take suitable measures to protect travelers so entering the street, in like manner as they had done to guard against injury to those who came in other directions towards the place where the defect existed."

Miscellaneous.

The following cases, while perhaps not strictly within the scope of this note, should be read in this connection:

In Kellogg v. Northampton, 4 Gray 65, where the plaintiff while passing from a dwelling adjoining her father's, on the highway, to go upon such highway, when within a few feet from the gate broke through planking over a culvert and was injured, the court said in setting aside a verdict for the plaintiff: "We are of opinion that the defendants had a right to ask that the jury should be instructed that a town were not necessarily chargeable with damage arising from every defect existing within the located limits of a highway; that they would not be liable for obstructions or defects in portions of the highway not a part of the traveled path, and not so connected with it that they would affect the safety or convenience of those traveling on the highway and using the traveled path; and that the town would not be legally liable where an injury was sustained by a party using the road for the purpose of passing to or from his private way or path, or his own land, although it was caused by a defect within the limits of the highway as located by law, but outside the part of the road used for public travel."

But upon the hearing of exceptions to a further verdict for the plaintiff in the Kellogg Case, 8 Gray, 564, the court in holding that the defendant was properly excluded from showing that the culvert was originally built at the request and for the accommodation of the plaintiff's father and his neighbor Bartlett, said: "To render a verdict for the plaintiff, the jury must have found that the place where the accident happened was within the limits of that part of the highway wrought and prepared by the defendants for public travel; that, being so wrought and prepared, persons traveling along the line of the highway were induced to come upon and pass over it; that, after it had been so used for public travel, the defendants had repaired it; and that, in consequence of these acts of the defendants, it had actually become part of the path or track usually traveled by the public in passing over the road. Under these instructions, no inquiry concerning the object for which the defendants originally built the culvert would have been material or proper. It must have been found to have been adopted and incorporated as a part of the highway, wrought, intended, and used for public travel at the time when the accident occurred, without regard to the purpose or design of its original construction." It will be noted, however, that the court said further: "It does not appear by the facts stated in the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff was injured while passing from the house of Bartlett to the highway. It is stated that she was passing along the highway from the house of Bartlett towards a house in South street. Nor does it appear that any question was raised at the trial as to the right of the plaintiff to recover on the ground that, at the time of the accident, she was not in the use of the highway in the same manner and for the same purpose as other travelers."

In Webster v. Vanceburg, 130 Ky. 320, property. Had the husband brought this suit it could have been maintained." "We have found no case where a private action has been maintained for corruption of the air by offensive odors, except by a plaintiff who was the owner of or had some legal interest, as lessee or otherwise, in land, the enjoyment of which was affected by the nuisance." Kavanagh v. Barber, 131 N. Y. 211, 214, 15 L.R.A. 689, 30 N. E. 235. In that case the house was owned by the plaintiff's wife, and the family lived "in the house by sufferance of the wife;" but for the reason above suggested he was not permitted to recover for "the personal discomfort to which he was subjected in the occupation of the house." This doctrine was affirmed in Hughes v. Auburn, 161 N. Y. 96, 46 L.R.A. 636, 55 N. E. 389, where it was held that while a city may not conduct sewage into the house or upon the premises of an individual, and, if it does, is responsible to him in damages for the trespass or nuisance, the injury is one to property for which the owner alone may demand redress, and a member of his family has as such no special remedy against the municipality for personal suffering caused by its neglect of sanitary precautions against disease.

These cases are criticized in Thompson v. Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. 97 Tex. 590, 80 S. W. 990, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 231, where an opposite result is reached. But the criticism is not convincing, and the decision seems to overlook the distinction between an action for negligence and one for a nuisance. The opinion cites approvingly but two cases—Hunt v. Lowell Gas light Co. 8 Allen, 169, 85 Am. Dec. 697, and Holly v. Boston Gaslight Co. 8 Gray, 123, 69 Am. Dec. 233—both of which were actions for negligence. When a person manages his real estate in such a way as unreasonably to interfere with the correlative right of his neighbor to a reasonable enjoyment of his land, it is no justification for the nuisance for the former to prove that he was guilty of no negligence, or that he exercised due care in what he did. The question is: Has he invaded the proprietary right of his neighbor? If the necessary result of his act is to injure the latter in the reasonable enjoyment of his property, "the law of negligence has no application, and the law of nuisance applies." Bohan v. Port Jervis Gaslight Co. 122 N. Y. 18, 26, 9 L.R.A. 711, 25 N. E. 246, 247; Boston Ferrule Co. v. Hills, 159 Mass. 147, 20 L.R.A. 844, 34 N. E. 85; Joyce, Nuisances, § 18; Wood, Nuisances, § 841; 29 Cyc. 1155. "But such liability does not rest upon the doctrine of negligence. It exists irrespective of that doctrine. The inquiry is not whether the town has negligently failed in its duty to the plaintiff, but whether for any reason it has deprived him of that reasonable enjoyment of his land to which under the circumstances he was entitled." O'Brien v. Derry, 73 N. H. 198, 205, 60 Atl. 843, 846; Lockwood v. Dover, 73 N. H. 209, 61 Atl. 32; Roberts v. Dover, 72 N. H. 147, 55 Atl. 895; Lane v. Concord, 70 N. H. 485, 85 Am. St. Rep. 643, 49 Atl. 687.

The cases cited by the plaintiff (Paul v. Hazelton, 37 N. J. L. 106; Miller v. Greenwich Twp. 62 N. J. L. 771, 42 Atl. 735; Case v. Weber, 2 Ind. 108) do not support the plaintiff's contention that permission of the owner to drive over his private way gave the plaintiff such an interest in the land that he could maintain an action for the nuisance, if the owner could. In those cases the plaintiffs were in the actual beneficial possession of the lands under parol licenses from the owners, which amounted to a parol letting. They had, in fact, the rights of a tenant at will, and not merely the temporary rights of a traveler who is permitted to pass over a private way for his own pleasure or convenience. Moreover, the injuries complained of were to property rights claimed by the plaintiffs, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 752, 132 Am. St. Rep. 392, 113 S. W. 140, it was held that a teamster who attempted to use a sidewalk along a railroad freight depot as a driveway to reach the depot took the risk of injury from its being unsafe for that purpose. The court said: "It is argued that the way used by appellant was the only practicable way for wagons to reach the depot. Be that as it may, the city was not legally bound to provide a roadway for wagons to the railroad depot, and is not liable for a failure to do so. If the driver of the wagon saw proper to use ways not provided for such vehicles, he has no legal complaint against the city that they were not fit for the use to which he was putting them. 'A city's legal duty is not to furnish streets,' 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) even where they may be needed; but it is to keep such as it does furnish in a reasonably safe condition for use for purposes for which they are provided,—sidewalks for pedestrians; roadways for vehicles and horses."

It may be noted that in Baker v. Dedham, 16 Gray, 393, where the plaintiff's cow was injured in going through a passway under the highway, it was held that he could not recover. The court said: "The plaintiff has a private way passing under the highway in question, and this action is brought against the town for not keeping that way in repair. There being no statute requiring them to do this, the action cannot be maintained." B. B. B.

and not merely personal injuries occasioned by the defendants' violation of their proprietary duty to an adjoining landowner.

If, instead of being thrown from his carriage and injured, as alleged, the plaintiff, in attempting to pass from the private way to the highway, had observed the dangerous condition of the ditch, and had been put to some inconvenience in passing over it, or had come to the conclusion that the town was maintaining a nuisance at that place with reference to the use of the private way, would it be contended that, because he was upon the way by the permission of the owner, he was entitled to maintain a suit for his invasion of the owner's right of property? The mere fact that his damages might be small or nominal would not deprive him of the right, if he had it. Nor does the fact that he suffered serious injury have the effect of giving him the right. If anybody's right has been infringed, it is the landowner's right to the reasonable enjoyment of his property; and this is a right which he could not confer upon another without investing him with the title, or the right to the possession of the land or some part of it. The plaintiff's rights with reference to the nuisance were not greater after he got permission to use the private way than they were before. The existence of the private way was presumably an invitation to all persons to use it for proper purposes, but it did not invest them, when so using it, with a proprietary right in the land; one sufficient reason being that the parties did not intend it should have that effect. If the landowner had had the same experience in crossing the ditch that the plaintiff had, his action would be based upon the defendant's infringement of his right to the reasonable enjoyment of his land. After showing the fact of his lawful occupation of the land as an owner or tenant, and the injury to his reasonable enjoyment of the land by the defendant in permitting the nuisance to exist his right to redress would be established. But, in the absence of proof of such facts, he would fail in his suit, however great his injuries might be. Wood, Nuisances, § 853. Whether the facts of the particular case would sustain an action for negligence is a different and immaterial question in determining the plaintiff's right to recover for a nuisance affecting the reasonable enjoyment of the possession of real estate. So far as the plaintiff's declaration is based on his right as a mere licensee of the owner, the demurrer thereto, must be sustained; and it would seem that he could not recover as a traveler on the highway for the defendant's alleged negligence in suffering the uncovered ditch to exist. Drew v. Bow, 74 N. H. 147, 65 Atl.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

MOSLER SAFE COMPANY, Resp.,

v.

MAIDEN LANE SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY, Appt.

Building contract — delay by architect — good faith.

1. The question of the good or bad faith of the architect to whose satisfaction and under whose direction work upon a building is to be done, in failing to pass upon plans and drawing for changes in the work so that its completion is delayed, is immaterial in determining the responsibility of the owner for such delays, so as to prevent his taking advantage of provisions in the contract for stipulated damages for failure to complete the work within a specified time.

Damages — stipulated — delay in completing contract.

2. Liquidated damages, and not a penalty, are provided for by a contract for placing a safe and vault in a building within a specified time, and declaring that, whereas failure to complete the work within the time limited will cause serious loss, the precise extent of which might be difficult of estimation, therefore the contractor agrees to pay a specified amount for each day's delay; and the amount specified is not plainly disproportionate to the injury.

Same — owner's responsibility — effect on contract.

3. The right of the owner of a building to liquidated damages for failure to complete a vault within a specified time is abrogated if he is responsible for a substantial part of the delay, and he cannot therefore recover such damages for delay beyond the time for which he is responsible.

Same — provision for renewal — effect.

4. A provision in a contract for placing an improvement in a building, that if the owner shall require any deviation, the same may be made without annulling or invalidating the contract, will not operate to renew a right to liquidated damages for delay in completion of the work after the provision therefor has been abrogated by delays to which the owner materially contributed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for New York County, Part XII., in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the balance of moneys alleged to be due under contracts for the construction of certain vaults and safes within a specified time. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alfred A. Wheat and Frank A. Gaynor, with Messrs. Rollins & Rollins, for appellant:

The acts and omissions of an architect or superintendent in respect to all matters intrusted to his determination under construction contracts are not impeachable except for fraud or bad faith.

The court erred in charging that the defendant's entire claim for liquidated damages was abrogated if any substantial part of the delay was caused by the defendant or the architect, and in refusing to charge that the defendant was entitled to recover the damages for the delays not caused by the defendant or the architect.

Messrs. Benjamin N. Cardozo and Malcolm Sundheimer, for respondent:

Where a building contract provides that a building shall be completed by a designated date, and the owner permits the contractor to proceed with the work, and accepts the materials and labor thereafter, and the contractor fully performs his contract except as to the time provided for the completion thereof, the owner is estopped from interposing the delay as a defense to the action for the agreed price, and his only remedy thereafter is by a counterclaim or an independent action for the damages resulting from the delay.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, in this action, has sought to recover the balance of the moneys due under three contracts with the defendant, which provided for the construction, in one, of a fireproof vault, in another, of a fireproof and burglar-proof safe, and, in another, of a fire and burglar proof vault. These contracts were substantially the same in their general provisions, and each called for the completion of the work by a fixed date. Each contained an agreement for liquidating the damages in the event of noncompletion by the time fixed; the several agreements differing only in the amount. The agreement in the first contract reads "that time is of the essence of this contract, and whereas failure to thus complete the work within the time mentioned will cause serious loss and damage to the second party (the defendant), the precise extent of which might be difficult of estimation in money, the first party (the plaintiff) agrees to pay the sum of $25 per day to the second party as liquidated damages for each day's delay in the completion of said work." In the second and third contracts, the amount is fixed at $25 and at $150, respectively. The answer of the defendant to the three causes of action, founded upon these three contracts, admitted due performance by the plaintiff, except as to the time of completion, and set up counterclaims for the liquidated damages provided in each contract to be paid, upon the basis of the number of days which had elapsed after the date fixed for completion. There was no dispute as to the number of days' delay, which ranged from 117 days under the first contract, to 211 days under the second contract, and to 193 days under the third contract. At the trial of the action, there was much evidence bearing upon the subjects of the preparation and approval of the various drawings, designs, and detail plans, and of the conduct of the parties, and of the defendant's architect, with reference thereto. It was the contention of the plaintiff that it showed that the defendant delayed the progress of the work in deviation from the plans, and in unreasonable omissions to pass upon the drawings, and that, in such, and in other ways, it was prevented from completing the work by the latter's default. The defendant contended that the evidence did not show it to be responsible for the delay, and that, so far as the acts of its architect were concerned, he was superintending the work under the agreement, and had acted in good faith. As to the first cause of action for the fireproof vault, the plaintiff did not dispute its liability for the delay, and the jury was directed to allow the defendant its counterclaim in full. As to the other claims of the plaintiff, upon the second and third causes of action, the trial judge instructed the jury, in substance, that the defendant was entitled to recover damages, as stipulated in the contracts, for the delay in completing the work, unless they were satisfied that a substantial part of said delay was caused by its own acts or those of its architect. The jury returned a verdict in the plaintiff's favor, and the judgment thereupon entered has been affirmed by the unanimous vote of the justices of the appellate division. Upon this appeal by the defendant, we must presume that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury that the defendant was responsible for a substantial part of the delay in the completion of the contracts.

The correctness of the judgment below is attacked upon the ground that the court erred in its instructions to the jury upon the law, and the following rulings raised the question we are to consider: At the plaintiff's request, the trial judge charged as follows: "If any substantial part of the delay in the completion of said vault" (or of the fireproof safe in the other cause of action) "was caused by the wrongful acts of the defendant or its architect, or by alterations or deviation from the plans and specifications, or by the failure to approve drawings within a reasonable time, or by arbitrary and capricious acts, the entire cause for liquidated damages was canceled and abrogated, and the defendant is not entitled to recover the same." The trial judge refused to charge, at the defendant's request, that it was "entitled to recoup the liquidated damages for each and every day that the contract time was exceeded by the time of the actual performance, which was not caused by any act or fault of the defendant or the superintendent;" or that "if the jury believed that there was any delay occasioned by the arbitrary or unreasonable act of the defendant, through the action of the superintendent, or otherwise, then the jury must consider what would have been a reasonable time to complete, after allowing to the plaintiff the time in which it was delayed." To these rulings, and to others raising the same questions of law, the defendant excepted.

The appellant preliminarily contends that it was erroneous to submit to the consideration of the jury the acts of the architect, in passing upon the question of the responsibility for the delay, inasmuch as his acts were not impeachable except for fraud or bad faith. It is argued that he was acting throughout under the provisions of the contract, and in such a capacity, as between the parties, that his acts could not be questioned, unless so arbitrary and capricious as to indicate fraud or bad faith. Without discussing that point at any length, I think it will suffice to say that, while the contract did constitute the architect named therein the final arbiter in disputes "regarding the construction of the specifications," and "as to whether materials used and work done were according to their true intent and meaning," he was, in other respects, the agent of the appellant. It was provided that the work was to be done to his satisfaction and under his direction, and in determining upon the plans and drawings, or upon changes therein or in the work, he was the representative of the appellant. It was not necessary, if the jury believed that through any acts of his, or through his omissions to act within a reasonable time, substantial delays in the completion of the work were caused, that his conduct should indicate fraud or bad faith. The question was whether the appellant, through its architect or otherwise, was responsible for materially delaying the respondent in the completion of the work within the time specified. The question of the architect's good or bad faith was not material.

It having been conclusively determined that the defendant was responsible for a substantial part of the delay in the completion of the work, the principal question arises upon the instruction of the trial court, that thereby the right to counterclaim for the liquidated damages was abrogated. So far as I am aware, this court has not pronounced upon this precise question, and the courts below, in determining as they have, have followed (as I infer, in the absence of the expression of any opinion) the rule as it has been asserted in decisions of the courts in England and of the appellate division of the supreme court of this state. See Holme v. Guppy, 3 Mees. & W. 387, 1 Jur. 825; Dodd v. Churton [1897] 1 Q. B. 562, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 477, 76 L. T. N. S. 438, 45 Week. Rep. 490; Willis v. Webster, 1 App. Div. 301, 37 N. Y. Supp. 354.

That this was a valid provision of the contracts liquidating the damages to result from the contractor's delay, and not a penalty, I entertain no doubt, and, though a disputed question upon the trial, the respondent is not very seriously questioning it on this appeal. Parties to contracts have the right to insert any stipulations that may be agreed to, provided that they be neither unconscionable, nor contrary to public policy. No rule of law forbids them from agreeing between themselves with respect to the anticipatory damages which shall be occasioned by the failure to complete the contract within the time specified. When they have done so, their declaration in the event anticipated, that the sum fixed is a liquidation of the damages, or a penalty, is not conclusive, and its interpretation is for the court, having regard to the nature of the contract and the circumstances. It may be observed, generally, that whenever the damages flowing from the breach of a contract can be easily established, or the damages fixed are plainly disproportionate to the injury, the stipulated sum will be treated as a penalty. Where, however, the damages resulting from the breach would be uncertain or difficult, if not incapable, of ascertainment, then the agreement of the parties liquidating them in anticipation will be enforced. In Ward v. Hudson River Bldg. Co. 125 N. Y. 230, 235, 26 N. E. 250, 257, this question was discussed upon the authorities, and we considered it difficult to lay down any general rule applicable to all cases. It was said that, where parties "have stipulated for a payment in liquidation of damages, which are in their nature uncertain and unascertainable with exactness, and may be dependent upon extrinsic considerations and circumstances, and the amount is not, on the face of the contract, out of all proportion to the probable loss, it will be treated as liquidated damages." P. 235. I think that these contracts come well within the class of cases in which the presumable damage from the failure to complete the work contracted for by the date fixed would be uncertain, if at all capable of exact ascertainment. Time was considered to be of the essence of the contract, and it was so stated therein. It is inferable that, when making the contracts for the construction of these vaults and safes, the owner must have regarded it as most important that the investment of capital should be made productive at the earliest possible moment. It was in mind, presumably, that to agree to liquidated damages, covering each day's delay, would act as a spur upon the contractor, and would save to the owner the delays and expense of an action at law to recover the actual damage he might be able to prove. But it is obvious, as I think, that the very reason for sustaining the validity of an agreement for liquidated damages, in such contracts as the present ones, as a reasonable and fair provision, also, suggests how essential it is that the owner shall be able to show strict compliance on his part, and that the contractor's obligation has not been released nor affected by his interference or dilatory action. In requiring this agreement to pay liquidated damages, it is to be presumed that the appellant intended, when called upon to act, to co-operate with all possible diligence with the contractor, and that the latter's situation was such at the time, and its arrangements were so ordered as to enable it to complete the work within the time fixed. While such an agreement has not the harshness of a penalty, it is, nevertheless, in its nature such that its enforcement, where the party claiming the right to enforce has in part been the cause of delay, would be unjust. It is a reasonable view of the situation that denies, in such a case, the right to strict enforcement, and, where both parties are at fault with respect to the delay, remits the injured party to the remedy of an action at law, in which he can recover his actual loss from the contractor's failure to complete within what was a reasonable time. It was competent for the parties, anticipating mutations of mind and of conditions, to have provided against a forfeiture of the right to liquidated damages, by further agreeing that the architect was empowered to certify an extension of the time for completion, if the contractor was delayed in his work in certain specified events or by causes specified. With such a provision, the obligation to pay liquidated damages might be preserved and its commencement deferred to a substituted date. Without such a provision, where, by the mutual fault of the parties, the contractor's original obligation has been put an end to, how could he come under a new obligation to pay the liquidated damages from some subsequent date? Such an obligation could not be renewed except by some express agreement. Its nature forbids inferring its renewal. An apportionment of the fault is impossible under such a contract. Weeks v. Little, 89 N. Y. 566; Willis v. Webster, supra. The rule that there can be no apportionment of the damages for delays caused by mutual default has also been asserted in the Federal Courts. See Caldwell v. Schmulbach (C. C.) 175 Fed. 429.

In Willis v. Webster, a well-considered case, and one in which the question arose upon a substantially similar state of facts, it was forcibly said that where "liquidated damages are to be sustained after a given day, the plaintiff [contractor] is entitled to know with precision when he is laboring under such an obligation, and not be required to leave it to the judgment of a jury as to what is a reasonable time. It is impossible under the contract to apportion liquidated damages. Either the liability for the liquidated damage exists, or it does not. It cannot half exist, and half be waived. In the case at bar there was a definite contract which was abrogated by the acts of both parties; and it requires equally concerted action to breathe life into it again." Page 305 of 1 App. Div. In Halsbury's Laws of England (vol. 3, p. 243), the doctrine of 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the English cases is summed up in the following language: "Where the liquidated damages are stipulated for at so much per day or per week, there must be a definite date from which they are to run. If no such date is fixed by the contract, or if by the operation of intervening circumstances, the date fixed by the contract has ceased to be operative, and there is no provision in the contract under which another date can be substituted, all right to recover the sum stipulated for as liquidated damages has been put an end to, because there is no date from which the penalties can run." In Dodd v. Churton [1897] 1 Q. B. 562, which Lord Halsbury cites in support of the rule, the contract provided that the work should be completed by a certain day, and, in default of such completion, the contractor should be liable to pay liquidated damages. In construing the contract, Chitty, L. J., said: "The law on the subject is well settled. The case of Holme v. Guppy, 3 Mees. & W. 387, 1 Jur. 825, and the subsequent cases in which that decision has been followed, are merely examples of the well-known principle stated in Comyns's Digest, Condition L. (6) that, where performance of a condition has been rendered impossible by the act of the grantee himself, the grantor is exonerated from performance of it. The law on the subject was very neatly put by Byles, J., in Russell v. Sa da Bandeira, 13 C. B. N. S. 149, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 68, 9 Jur. N. S. 718, 7 L. T. N. S. 804. This principle is applicable, not to building contracts only, but to all contracts. If a man agrees to do something by a particular day, or in default to pay a sum of money as liquidated damages, the other party to the contract must not do anything to prevent him from doing the thing contracted for within the specified time."

The appellant founds an argument upon the provision of the specifications that, if the defendant should require any alteration or deviations, "the same could be made without annulling or invalidating the contract," and, in such event, that "an allowance shall be made for the same on one side or the other, as the case may be," by the architect, etc. I do not see that this affects the question differently. The provision operated to prevent the plaintiff from claiming that the contract was invalidated. It could not renew the obligation to pay liquidated damages, which had been put an end to by delays, for which the appellant was in part responsible. A provision of the contract in Dodd v. Churton, supra, was relied upon by the defendant, to the effect that any authority given by the architect for any alteration or addition, in or to the work, was not to vitiate the contract. It was held

"that this provision, however interpreted," did not reach the length contended for; that it did not "amount to a contract to do all the work, including any extras that may be ordered, within the time specified for the performance of the original work." "The provision," it was said, "is that the contract is not to be vitiated, i. e., that it is to stand; but that does not exclude the application of the principle stated in Comyns's Digest, to which I have referred."

The doctrine of the English cases, to which I have referred, and of the case of Willis v. Webster, 1 App. Div. 301, 37 N. Y. Supp. 354, decided by the supreme court of this state, is salutary and just, and I think we should approve of it. Where the parties are mutually responsible for the delays, because of which the date fixed by the contract for completion is passed, the obligation for liquidated damages is annulled, and, in the absence of some provision under which another date can be substituted, it cannot be revived. If the respondent failed to complete within a reasonable time after crediting the appellant's delays, then the latter had a cause of action for the former's neglect, and the measure of damages would be the actual loss proved to have been sustained.

For these reasons, I advise the affirmance of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM J. BARRETTE, Appt.,
v.

S. A. WHITNEY, Resp't.

(36 Utah, 574, 106 Pac. 522.)

Courts — probate — jurisdiction — distribution order — notice.

1. Where by statute probate proceedings are deemed to be proceedings in rem, and the court acquires jurisdiction of the res and all persons interested in the property

Note. — Notice of distribution in probate proceedings as jurisdictional.

For other annotation of collateral interest in the present connection, see note to Sly v. Hunt, 21 L.R.A. 680, on Conclusiveness of probate as res judicata; note to Re Killan, 63 L.R.A. 95, as to Remedy of distributee as to accounting of which he had no notice, and on which he did not appear; note to Re Sieker, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1058, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.)

by the notice given for the appointment of an executor or administrator, the giving of a notice of distribution is not jurisdictional, and therefore its omission will not subject the decree to collateral attack.

Same — notice — sufficiency.

2. The giving of proper notice for the appointment of an administrator brings into court all persons having an interest in the estate, for all purposes necessary for the settlement of the estate, including its distribution among the heirs of decedent.

Same — statutory requirements.

3. The mere fact that notices of the various steps in an administration proceeding are provided for by statute does not make them jurisdictional, so as to render the judgment subject to collateral attack in case they are not given.

Probate — distribution — notice — due process.

4. The legislature may within reasonable bounds, where probate proceedings are in rem, determine what shall constitute sufficient notice of the commencement of proceedings for the settlement of an estate, to give the court jurisdiction and to apprise those interested in the estate that the court will administer and ultimately distribute the property among the persons interested, without infringing the constitutional requirements of due process of law.

Same — collateral attack — right to appeal.

5. Anyone having an interest in an estate, although not named in the administration proceedings, may, by application to the probate court, make his interest appear, even after judgment, so as to qualify himself to appeal, and therefore there is no necessity for a collateral attack upon the judgment.

Real property — marketable title — decree — assumption of existence of unknown parties.

6. Title to real estate which depends upon a probate decree distributing a decedent's estate cannot be held to be unmarketable merely upon the assumption that some unknown claimant exists who will assert his claim, in the absence of any allegation that such claimant does exist, where all known interested parties were before the court when the distribution was made.

on Right to probate will on service of notice by publication.

As the inquiry which forms the subject of the present note is whether the omission of the prescribed notice of application for a decree or order of distribution is an error so fundamental that it will defeat the jurisdiction of the court, and render its order vulnerable to collateral attack, it does not deal with such questions as whether the omission of such a notice constitutes error.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to convey a marketable title to real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henderson, Pierce, Critchlow, & Barrette, for appellant:

A title is not marketable where it exposes the party holding it to litigation.

A decree of a probate court in any proceeding had before it in the course of the administration of an estate is binding only upon the parties who had notice of that proceeding.

Bresce v. Stiles, 22 Wis. 121; Long v. Thompson, 60 Ill. 27; Morris v. Hogle, 37 Ill. 153, 87 Am. Dec. 243; McGowan v. Smith, 22 Wash. 625, 61 Pac. 713; Wood v. Myrick, 16 Minn. 502, Gil. 447; Re Grider, — Cal. —, 21 Pac. 533; Hopkins v.

or whether personal notice is requisite to render such an order binding, or whether it is necessary to give any notice where the statute does not require it.

Although many courts hold probate proceedings to be in the nature of proceedings in rem, such proceedings are so treated for the purpose of rendering them binding on all the world where the required form of notice has been given, irrespective of the personal notice to the one who is attacking them; and no case other than BARRETTE v. WHITNEY has been found which takes the further step of holding that the giving of the prescribed notice of application for an order of distribution is not an essential prerequisite to the exercise of jurisdiction; the cases in which decrees rendered under such circumstances have been collaterally questioned uniformly holding them to have been made without jurisdiction.

In Neal v. Robertson, 55 Ark. 79, 17 S. W. 587, which was an appeal from a decree for distribution, it was said that, as to an heir to whom notice was not given, any order made would be coram judice.

In Re Grider, — Cal. —, 21 Pac. 532, a decree of partial distribution entered without notice was held a nullity as to the plaintiffs in an action brought by the children of testator to determine the interests of all parties to the property of the estate.

In O'Neil's Appeal, 55 Conn. 409, 11 Atl. 857, it was held that a decree of distribution made by a probate court on the application of an administratrix, which made no mention of a person entitled to participate as an heir to the estate, would not protect the administratrix in making payments to the persons named in the order, under a belief that she would be protected thereby, where such person had no notice of the proceeding to distribute, and the administratrix knew that such person was in existence and was an heir to the estate, and intentionally concealed and withheld such knowledge from the court.

In Wilson v. McCarty, 55 Md. 277, which was a petition for a final settlement and accounting, it was held that, to make a distribution an entire protection to an execu- 57 L.R.A. (N.S.)

tor or administrator, it is necessary that such action be taken and such notice be given as the statute provides to justify the court in making it.

In Shriver v. State, 65 Md. 278, 4 Atl. 679, a suit upon an administrators' bond, in which the administrators contended that they were protected by a distribution made in the orphans' court, it was held that, as it did not appear that the proceedings in the orphans' court were not ex parte, they afforded no protection to the administrators against the claim of a party excluded therefrom.

In Wood v. Myrick, 16 Minn. 494, Gil. 447, an action on an administrator's bond by one claiming as assignee of certain creditors' claims directed by the probate court to be paid, want of notice by publication or otherwise that the probate court was going to act upon any claim against the estate, or direct payment of any such claim, was set up as a defense. It was held that as the only persons interested in a decree of distribution are those who by law are entitled to claim a share of the estate, the decree itself operates directly upon the persons interested in the estate, and is an adjudication of their rights therein; that the proceeding therefore is not in rem, but in personam; and without notice prescribed by the statute, the court does not acquire jurisdiction of the persons interested in the estate, and consequently has no jurisdiction to make the decree; that as the want of jurisdiction goes to the power to make any decree whatever, a decree without notice is absolutely void, and affords no protection to the administrator for payments under it; and therefore that the want of notice might properly be set up as a defense.

In State ex rel. Morrison v. St. Gemme, 31 Mo. 230, which was a suit upon an administration bond, it was held that the action of a court in awarding certain property to the widow, who was the administratrix, could not be sustained as a decree of distribution where made without notice to those interested.

In Lilly v. Menke, 126 Mo. 190, 28 S. W. 643, 994, it was held that in the absence of McCann, 19 Ill. 112; Re Mitchell, 126 Cal. 248, 58 Pac. 549; Re McFarland, 10 Mont. 586, 27 Pac. 389; Neal v. Robertson, 55 Ark. 79, 17 S. W. 587; Abila v. Burnett, 33 Cal. 658; Shriver v. State, 65 Md. 278, 4 Atl. 679; Adams v. Adams, 46 N. J. Eq. 298, 19 Atl. 14; Re Leavens, 65 Wis. 440, 27 N. W. 324; Ruth v. Oberbrunner, 40 Wis. 238; Lilly v. Menke, 126 Mo. 190, 28 S. W. 643, 994; Burr v. Bloemer, 174 Ill. 638, 51 N. E. 821; Re Bunting, 30 Utah, 251, 84 Pac. 109.

Messrs. Van Cott, Allison, & Riter, for respondent:

A decree of distribution is a proceeding

notice to distributees, a judgment of distribution was clearly coram non judice as to them, and could not be the basis of recovery in a proceeding in equity to obtain partition of decedent's estate according to his last will and testament.

And in Baker v. Lumpee, 91 Mo. App. 560, which was an appeal from the denial of the motion to quash an execution issued against an executor on the application of a distributee for a share awarded by an order of distribution, it was held that, as it appeared that none of the distributees had notice of the order of distribution, the court did not have jurisdiction of the parties, and therefore that the order of distribution was void, and the motion to quash the execution should have been sustained.

In State ex rel. Brouse v. Burnes, 129 Mo. App. 474, 107 S. W. 1094, a suit on an administration bond, it was held that an order for distribution made at the final settlement of the executor's account was coram non judice, and void as to a grandchild whose existence was unknown to the administrator, and to whom no notice was given.

In Dewees v. Yost, — Mo. App. —, 143 S. W. 72, it was held that an order of distribution, including, among the property distributed, notes in testator's possession at the time of his death, of which he was supposed to be the sole owner, did not affect the interest therein of a co-owner not a party to the proceeding for distribution, its only effect being to transfer to the respective distributees the interest in the notes their decedent had at the time of his death; and therefore that the co-owner could not maintain an action against the estate upon the theory that the inclusion of the notes in the order of distribution amounted in law to the conversion of his interest in them.

In Adams v. Adams, 46 N. J. Eq. 298, 19 Atl. 14, which was a case of a bill filed by a widow to procure construction of the will of her deceased husband, which she claimed gave her a life interest in the residue of his estate, to which the executors set up in bar of the relief prayed a decree of distribution made by the orphans' court, it was held that, as the only notice given the widow was insufficient to bring her into court, the proceeding, as to her, was coram non judice. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) in rem; it may be made without any notice, unless the statute provides otherwise, in which case, if none is given, it is still conclusive against collateral attack; it can be questioned only on appeal or by direct proceeding, and a purchaser thereunder need not look beyond the decree itself, as the decree is conclusive on all the world.

In Van Houten v. Stevenson, 74 N. J. Eq. 1, 77 Atl. 612, it was held that a decree of distribution, made without the required statutory notice, that the executors as trustees under the will should take over from themselves as executors, and by way of distribution of the estate, a certain mortgage as payment or discharge of the balance coming to them as such trustees on distribution, was not conclusive, as against beneficiaries of the trust, that the security was then of the value at which it was turned over or distributed to the trustees.

In Re Killan, 172 N. Y. 547, 63 L.R.A. 95, 65 N. E. 561, it was held that a brother of an intestate who was not made a party to an accounting of the administrator, upon which a decree of distribution was made, might treat the proceedings in which the accounting was had as void, and institute a new proceeding to compel an accounting, without the necessity of coming in under the prior one by motion to open that decree; the position of the majority of the court being that, by the neglect of the administrators to cite persons unknown, the surrogate did not acquire jurisdiction judicially to settle the administrator's account and make distribution, and that the proceedings were therefore absolutely void as to the petitioner. The minority, however, took the position that the surrogate had jurisdiction of the fund to be distributed, and therefore of the question to be decided, and his jurisdiction could be attacked only directly in a proceeding for that purpose or by appeal; that orders and decrees in probate courts are not made between party and party, but are in the nature of judgments in rem, that are good as against all the world, even against the persons who are not cited.

In White's Estate, 163 Pa. 388, 30 Atl. 192, which was a proceeding by a grandson claiming under his grandfather's will, to compel an accounting by the executors, it was held that the finding by an auditor appointed to make distribution, that the provision made for the grandson in the will had been defeated by breach of a condition attached thereto, of which proceeding the grandson had not notice, was not binding upon him.

tribution of a probate court, confirming a partition made by joint devisees between themselves, was void as to the grantee of one of them, where due notice was not given, and therefore did not preclude him from maintaining a subsequent action for partition.

In Bresce v. Stiles, 22 Wis. 120, it was held in an action of ejectment that an order distributing an estate according to the provisions of a will was not binding upon children born after the making of the will, for whom no provision was made therein, and who consequently were entitled to take as in case of intestacy, where they were not parties to the proceeding, and had no notice thereof.
